

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

EX LIBRIS

Joseph A. De Chantigny

EVERYMAN

APRIL 18—OCTOBER 10

1913

EVERYMAN

HIS LIFE, WORK, & BOOKS

Edited by CHARLES SAROLEA

VOLUME TWO

LONDON : PUBLISHED BY
J. M. DENT & SONS, LIMITED

MCMXIII

HAZELL, WATSON & VINEY, LD.,
PRINTERS,
4-8, KIRBY STREET, HATTON GARDEN,
LONDON, E.C.

LIST OF CONTENTS

INDEX OF SUBJECTS

| | PAGE | | PAGE |
|---|--------------------|---|---------------------------|
| Alexandra's Cripples, Queen. By Annie Matheson | 242 | Correspondence (continued)— | |
| Antoinette, Marie, Before the Revolution. By Chas Sarolea | 262 | Balfour's Lineage, Mr. | 570 |
| Appassionata. By Dorothy Eyre | 167 | Balzac and Dumas | 498, 532, 562, 728, 825 |
| Archer, William | 393 | Bank Holidays? Why not Fifty-two | 441, 472 |
| Authors, Letters to Living. II.—William Wymark Jones. By Lewis Melville | 330 | Birth-rate, Apprenticeship and its Effect on the | 406, 438, 468, 498 |
| Author, The Position of the English. By Walter M. Gallichan | 234 | Birth-rate, The Declining | 347 |
| | | Books, The Use of, to Working Men | 89, 122, 154 |
| | | Borrow, George | 147, 249, 344, 374 |
| | | Boy Labour | 442 |
| | | Brain Degenerating? Is the Human | 19, 54, 87, 116, 149, 180 |
| | | Bright, John | 726, 790 |
| | | Brontë, The Letters of Charlotte | 598, 632, 795 |
| | | Canada and Canadian Policy | 214 |
| | | Canada and its Newspapers | 596 |
| | | Chesterton, G. K. | 404, 470, 500, 535, 564 |
| | | China and Opium | 634, 663, 726 |
| | | Churches, The Decline of the | 504 |
| | | Citizen, The Call of the | 22 |
| | | Civilisation, The Birth of a New | 186, 218 |
| | | Cloister and the Hearth, The | 218 |
| | | Cobbett's History of the Reformation | 147 |
| | | Colonies and Conscriptio, The | 696 |
| | | Conscription and the Workers | 148, 249, 276 |
| | | Continental Sunday, The | 338, 409, 472 |
| | | Correction, A | 218 |
| | | Countryside, The Needs of the | 216, 278 |
| | | Cromwell, Phillimore on | 91, 122 |
| | | Dumas' Place in Literature | 498, 532, 562, 728, 825 |
| | | Educational Reform | 10 |
| | | Emigration Phenomenon, The | 215, 278, 307 |
| | | Enterprise in Business | 20, 51, 88, 117, 146 |
| | | Euripides, Was a Woman-hater? | 19 |
| | | EVERYMAN'S Politics | 727, 758 |
| | | Evolution and Spiritual Doctrines | 500, 538, 633 |
| | | Fels, An Open Letter to Mr. Joseph | 628 |
| | | Foreign Missionaries and their Work | 729 |
| | | France, The Depopulation of | 755 |
| | | French a Religious People? Are the | 438, 470 |
| | | German Universities | 696, 820 |
| | | Goethe and the Common People | 280 |
| | | Guide to the Best Books. I.—History of the Papacy | 824 |
| | | Half-Timerdom, The Glorious Freedom of | 25 |
| | | Housing, The Case for National | 693, 724, 792 |
| | | Hyndman and India, Mr. | 276, 629, 695 |
| | | Indians, Mr. Lilly on | 376 |
| | | Industrial Scientific Management | 306, 376 |
| | | Institute of Chartered Accountants, Mr. Cobbett and | 404 |
| | | International Languages | 26 |
| | | Irish Protestants and Home Rule | 244, 310, 408 |
| | | Kinematograph and the Drama, The | 247 |
| | | Land Question, The | 629, 661 |
| | | Literature, Personality in | 404, 442, 507 |
| | | " The Business Man and | 474 |
| | | " The Villain in | 470 |
| | | Lloyd George Crusade | 185, 507 |
| | | London, Alone in | 825 |
| | | London to Paris, From | 407 |
| | | Man on the Iron Lines, The | 536 |
| | | Marcus Aurelius | 535 |
| | | "Mary Goes First" | 790 |
| | | Mast, The Man Before the | 599, 664 |
| | | Modern Fortresses Captured by Assault | 23 |
| | | Mont de Piété, The | 372 |
| | | Morality, International | 730, 790 |
| | | Newman, Cardinal | 26 |
| | | New Zealand and Defence | 595, 658, 693 |
| | | Nietzsche | 217, 281 |
| | | Pacifism and Imperialism | 119, 152, 184 |
| | | Paddock, The Dappled | 122, 154 |
| | | Paganism and Christianity | 24, 86, 152 |
| | | Paradox of Pathos | 570 |
| | | Parliament, The Decay of | 727 |
| | | Pawnshop, Private Usury and the Public | 276 |
| | | Pawnbroker? Shall we Abolish the | 439 |
| | | Phillimore on Cromwell | 91, 122 |
| | | Plimsoll Line | 728, 792, 822 |
| | | Poot-Laureate, The | 378, 407 |
| | | Protestant Protest on the Romanist Bias of EVERYMAN | 186, 213, 246 |
| | | "Rainless Wheat" | 370 |
| | | Romanism on the Decline? Is | 788, 824 |
| | | Romanist Bias of EVERYMAN | 186, 213, 246 |
| | | Russian Kindliness | 570 |
| | | " Police and the Press, The | 823 |
| | | Satanism | 600, 662, 690, 728 |
| | | Schools, Reforms in our Public | 691 |
| | | Serb, Greek and Bulgar | 503, 532 |
| Babu, In Defence of the. By an Indian Student | 422 | | |
| Back Road, The | 825 | | |
| Balfour, Arthur James | 521 | | |
| Balkan Barbarities | 808 | | |
| Balzac, Honoré de. By Chas. Sarolea | 424 | | |
| Bank Holidays? Why not Fifty-two | 355 | | |
| Barnett, Samuel Augustus. An Appreciation. By P. W. Wilson | 333 | | |
| Barrie, Sir J. M., Bart. By E. Hermann | 264 | | |
| Barristers, The Henchmen of. By E. O. | 491 | | |
| Bebel, Ferdinand August. By Sidney Whitman | 617 | | |
| Belgian Strike, Emile Vandervelde and the. By Chas. Sarolea | 40 | | |
| Belgium, The General Strike in. By Emile Vandervelde | 99 | | |
| Belloc, Hilaire. By J. K. Prothero | 585 | | |
| Bennett, Arnold. By Richard Curle | 11 | | |
| Benson, Mr. F. R., and the Stratford Festival. By C. B. Purdom | 75 | | |
| Besant, Mrs. Annie. By C. Sheridan Jones | 743 | | |
| Bluebells. By J. W. Marriott | 140 | | |
| Bobemia. In | 428 | | |
| Books, EVERYMAN'S Guide to the Best. I.—History of the Papacy | 779 | | |
| Books of the Week. 28, 61, 91, 124, 155, 186, 218, 251, 283, 315, 349, 378, 412, 444, 474, 508, 540, 570, 602, 637, 667, 698, 731, 762, 795 | 173 | | |
| Books, The Republic of. By Ernest Rhys | 173 | | |
| Books, The Use of, to Working Men. By J. R. Clynea, M.P. | 5 | | |
| Borrow, George. By E. Hermann | 73 | | |
| Brain Degenerating? Is the Human. A Criticism of Mr. Bland. By A. M. S. | 40 | | |
| Bridges, Robert. By E. Rhys | 456 | | |
| Bright, John. By R. B. W. | 697 | | |
| British History, Earl Percy's New Reading of | 711 | | |
| Brontë, The Letters of Charlotte. By Margaret Hamilton | 525 | | |
| Brooke, Augustus Stopford | 777 | | |
| Bulgar, Serb, Greek and. By David H. Low | 452 | | |
| Burns, John. Failure and Success. By P. W. Wilson | 493 | | |
| | | | |
| Call, The. By Will Ogilvie | 4 | | |
| Campbell, Rev. R. J. By E. Hermann | 201 | | |
| Canada and Canadian Policy. A Nation and a Navy. By Augustus Bridle:— | | | |
| I. | 131 | | |
| II. | 168 | | |
| Canada, Single-Tax Principle in Western. By F. J. Dixon | 685 | | |
| Canada, The Real. By G. C. Thomson:— | | | |
| Part I. | 391 | | |
| " II. | 429 | | |
| Carnegie Millions are Managed in America, How the. By J. L. C. | 556 | | |
| Carnegie Millions are Mismanged in Scotland, How the | 465 | | |
| Cecil Lord Robert, on the Decay of Parliament. By C. Sheridan Jones | 653 | | |
| Chesterton, G. K. By Richard Curle | 363 | | |
| Christianity and Socialism. By Dr. Dearmer | 818 | | |
| Church Census, A Novel. By Rev. Charles W. Crump | 402 | | |
| Church Union Question in Scotland, The. By Hector Maepherston | 170 | | |
| Cities of the World:— | | | |
| I.—Paris | 166 | | |
| II. | 198 | | |
| III. | 230 | | |
| IV. | 260, 812 | | |
| Civilisation, The Birth of a New. By Rev. Lord Wm. Gascoyne Cecil | 67 | | |
| Cobbett, William.—A Great Englishman. By F. E. Green | 66 | | |
| Conrad, Joseph. An Attempt at Appreciation. By Arthur L. Salmon | 461 | | |
| Correspondence:— | | | |
| Anglican Marriage Service, The | 504 | | |
| Anonymous Journalism | 532 | | |
| Apprenticeship and its Effect on Unemployment and the Birth-rate | 406, 438, 468, 498 | | |
| Australia | 86 | | |
| Author, The Position of the English | 312, 410 | | |

| | PAGE | | PAGE |
|--|--|--|------|
| Correspondence (continued)— | | Henry IV., The Murder of. By Henri Mazel | 528 |
| Sea, To See the | 503, 569, 602, 795 | Historic Cities of the World. By the Editor:— | |
| Social Reform, The Price of | 596 | Part I.—Paris | 166 |
| South African Farmers | 665, 690 | " II. " | 198 |
| Spelling Reform | 826 | " III. " | 230 |
| Suffrage Question, The | 221, 246, 340, 408, 412, 504, 536 | " IV. " | 260 |
| Sunday, Continental | 338, 409, 472 | History in the Making, 2, 34, 66, 98, 130, 162, 194, 226, 258, 290, 325, 354, 386, 418, 450, 482, 514, 546, 578, 610, 642, 674, 706, 738, 776, 802 | |
| Our English | 506 | Housing, The Case for National. By L. G. Chiozza Money:— | |
| Surplusage of Woman | 346 | I.—Housing as it is | 581 |
| Thompson, Francis | 474 | II.—Housing on a Large Scale | 611 |
| Turgenev, Ivan | 374 | India, England and. A Reply to Mr. Hyndman. By W. S. Lilly:— | |
| Typist, The | 23, 150 | Part I. | 259 |
| Ulster | 826 | " II. " | 294 |
| Usury, The Curse of | 373, 405, 468, 534, 568 | India, The Coming Catastrophe in. By H. Mayers Hyndman | 227 |
| Voluntary System, The | 760 | India, Two Books on | 27 |
| White Slave Traffic | 280, 345, 374, 405, 466, 500, 537, 569 | Industrial Scientific Management. By Joseph Fels | 196 |
| Wilde, Oscar. A Remonstrance | 243, 283, 342 | Inner Light, The. By Darrell Figgis | 269 |
| Wages and Labour Conditions | 243 | Interviews:— | |
| Wagner the Man, Richard | 368, 372 | Henry Arthur Jones on the Need for a National Drama. By C. Sheridan Jones | 522 |
| Woman in the Financial World | 346 | Lord Robert Cecil on the Decay of Parliament. By C. Sheridan Jones | 653 |
| Women, Surplusage of | 182 | Irish Protestants and Home Rule. By J. M. Hone | 163 |
| Worker, The Problem of | 52, 121, 151 | Jacobin, The Anti | 540 |
| Working Classes, The Abolition of | 8 | James, Henry. By J. Stephen | 649 |
| Countries of the World. Australia. By E. Hermann | 357 | Jones, Henry Arthur, on the Need for a National Drama. By C. Sheridan Jones | 522 |
| " " " Persia. By J. M. Hone | 586 | Jones, Wm. Wymark. By Lewis Melville | 330 |
| " " " Union of South Africa. By Liddell | 554 | Kinema, The. By Dr. Percy Dearmer | 46 |
| Country? Town or. By Edgar Appleton | 367 | Kinomatograph and the Drama, The. By Arthur Owen Orrett | 200 |
| Dance, The Rebirth of the. By Herman Scheffauer | 392 | Labourer Lives, How the. By F. E. Green | 451 |
| Dawn, The Meaning of. By J. W. Marriott | 707 | Land Problem, The, and Mr. Lloyd George | 869 |
| Dillon, Dr. Emile. A Great Irish Journalist. By William Lathey | 44 | Laureateship, The Importance of the. By Capricious | 548 |
| Donne, The Poetry of. By Prof. George Saintsbury | 200 | Literary Notes, 12, 44, 82, 114, 178, 233, 298, 329, 364, 399, 428, 458, 489, 527, 552, 588, 622, 648, 681, 717, 754, 776 | |
| Drama, The Kinematograph and the. By Arthur Owen Orrett | 433 | Literature, Personality in. By Daniel Corkery | 362 |
| " The Religious. By Rev. James Adderley | 110 | The Villain in. By C. Sheridan Jones | 394 |
| " Sex and the. By D. E. Oliver | 612 | Liselotte. A German Princess at the Court of Louis XIV. By the Editor:— | |
| " and Social Reform. By Arthur Owen Orrett | 523 | Part I. | 103 |
| Education and the Working Man. By Cyril E. Roberts | 497 | " II. " | 141 |
| Ethics and Religion. By W. E. Orchard | 361 | Lloyd George, The Land Problem and... | 809 |
| Eliot, George. By C. Sheridan Jones | 195 | Lloyd George Crusade, The. By P. W. Wilson:— | |
| Emigration, The New. By L. G. Chiozza Money:— | 228 | I.—The Demand of the Able-bodied Workers | 35 |
| I.—The Colonial Advertising for the Public | 259 | II.—The Wage Problem | 72 |
| II.—Striking at the Heart of the Empire | 294 | III.—The Taxation of Land | 101 |
| England and India. By W. S. Lilly:— | 683 | IV.—The Schools and the Children | 274 |
| I. | 497 | Lodge, Sir Oliver. By H. Stanley Allen, M.A., B.Sc. | 713 |
| II. | 132 | London, A Countryman in. The Life of a Bricklayer's Labourer. By Thomas Holmes | 326 |
| English Novel, The | 497 | London Dines, How. By John K. Prothero | 688 |
| Ethics, Education and Religion. By W. E. Orchard | 744 | London Termini. By G. Alexander | 647 |
| Ethics in an Age of Locomotion. By G. F. Barbour, D.Phil. | 779 | London to Paris, From. A National Highway. By G. Alexander | 334 |
| Everyman at the Theatre. "Mary Goes First" and the Party System. By Clifton York | 678 | Makers of Modern History. I.—Robespierre. By Chas. Sarolea | 387 |
| EVERYMAN'S Guide to the Best Books. I.—History of the Papacy | 807 | Man and His Work:— | |
| EVERYMAN Reading Circles—Their Function and Organisation | 805 | I.—The Man with the Pen. By C. Sheridan Jones | 419 |
| Fabre, Henri, the Field Naturalist | 488 | " II.—The Man on the Iron Lines. By C. Sheridan Jones | 454 |
| Feminism, The Collapse of. By Margaret Hamilton | 303 | " III.—The Man before the Mast. By C. Sheridan Jones | 483 |
| Flaubert, Gustave | 645, 677 | " IV.—The Man on the Road. By C. Sheridan Jones | 518 |
| Forest Music. By J. W. Marriott | 76 | " V.—The Man behind the Footlights. By C. Sheridan Jones | 550 |
| France, The Depopulation of. By W. S. Lilly | 102 | " VI.—The Miner. Prize Essay. By J. E. Ashmore | 579 |
| French Page:— | 145, 206 | " VII.—The Man in Blue. By C. Sheridan Jones | 614 |
| Joseph de Maistre on the Inequality of the Sexes | 240 | " VIII.—The Civil Servant. Prize Essay. By H. A. Postlethwaite | 643 |
| "La Philosophie de mon Oncle Benjamin." By Claude Tillier | 266 | " IX.—The Foreign Missionary. Prize Essay. By Frank D. Jones | 675 |
| "La Mort de Napoléon." By Louis Adolphe Thiers | 332 | " X.—The Composer. Prize Essay. By F. T. Souden | 709 |
| "Mirabeau" | 368 | " XI.—The Male Teacher. Prize Essay. By John E. Stewart | 739 |
| "Maximilien Robespierre" | 398 | " XII.—The Anglican Clergyman. Prize Essay. By Rev. S. C. Carpenter | 771 |
| "Le Secret de la Sagesse." By Honoré de Balzac | 436 | Man, The Average | 360 |
| "Jean Valjean." By Victor Hugo | 460 | Mary II., Queen of England | 625 |
| "L'Onde et l'Ombre." By Victor Hugo | 492 | Masterpiece for the Week:— | |
| "Daniel de Foe" | 530 | Augustine, St., The Confessions of. By Prof. J. S. Phillimore | 560 |
| "Michel-Ange." By H. Taine | 549 | Austen, Jane. "Pride and Prejudice." By W. R. Thomson | 365 |
| "Raphael" | 583 | Boswell's "Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson." By Liddell Geddie | 746 |
| "Pecksniff et l'Hypocrisie Anglaise" | 621 | Brontë, Charlotte. "Jane Eyre" | 13 |
| "La Cité d'Antiquité" | 656 | " " "Villette." By Liddell Geddie | 526 |
| "Un Portrait français de Samuel Johnson." By H. Taine | 684 | Burney, Fanny. "Evelina." By Anna Branson | 301 |
| "l'Avènement de la Démocratie" | 716 | Canton, William. "A Child's Book of Saints." By E. Hermann | 331 |
| "Le Meurtre de Thomas Beket" | 748 | Chaucer. "Tale of Thopas." By Liddell Geddie | 811 |
| "Le Pélerinage du Chrétien" | 778 | Dickens, Chas. "The Pickwick Papers." By Hugh Sinclair | 397 |
| "Les Derniers Jours de Dryden" | 814 | Dostoevsky's "The Idiot." By Richard Curle | 459 |
| "Un Portrait du Puritain" | 107 | | |
| "Edmund Burke" | 138 | | |
| "La Mort de Louis XVI." By M. Mignet | 723 | | |
| Future State, Considerations touching our. By Maurice Maeterlinck:— | 360 | | |
| I. | 686 | | |
| II. | 786 | | |
| Galsworthy's New Play, "The Fugitive" | 657 | | |
| German Page:—Nietzsche, Aphor. 40, Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft, and Heine, "Ich Grolle Nicht" | 232 | | |
| German Student, A. By A. G. Sheridan | 428 | | |
| " University Education, The Other Side of. By E. A. Parker | 517 | | |
| Germany Leads, Where. University Education. By G. Waterhouse | 517 | | |
| Goethe, Johann von | 517 | | |
| Golden Syrup. By Dora L. Mackinnon | 517 | | |
| Guardians of Coasts, The. By Dorothy H. Brown | 517 | | |

| | | |
|--|-----|--------------------|
| Masterpiece for the Week (continued)— | | PAGE |
| Eliot, George. "Adam Bede." By Margaret Hamilton | ... | 267 |
| Galt. "Annals of the Parish." By Hector Macpherson | ... | 241 |
| Gissing, George. "New Grub Street." By John K. Prothero | ... | 490 |
| Hardy, Thomas. "Tess of the D'Urbervilles." By Margaret Hamilton | ... | 714 |
| Hawthorne, Nathaniel. "Blithedale Romance." By C. Sheridan Jones | ... | 77 |
| Kempis, Thomas à. "The Imitation of Christ." By Mons. R. H. Benson | ... | 171 |
| Malory. "Morte d'Arthur." By Vida D. Souder | ... | 650 |
| "Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, The Meditations of." By Prof. J. S. Phillimore | ... | 421 |
| Meredith, George. "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel" | ... | 108 |
| Moore, George. "Esther Waters" | ... | 202 |
| Pascal's "Thoughts." By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 784 |
| Roade, Charles. "The Cloister and the Hearth." By C. Sheridan Jones | ... | 139 |
| Stevenson, R. L. "Weir of Hermiston." By J. Stephen | ... | 589 |
| Virgil. "The Æneid." By Prof. J. S. Phillimore | ... | 42 |
| Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." By Florence G. Bidler | ... | 624 |
| White's "Natural History of Selborne." By Liddell Geddie | ... | 674 |
| Meynell, Mrs. Alice. By E. Rhys | ... | 680 |
| Missionary, The Case for the. By Dr. Percy Dearmer | ... | 359 |
| Morality, Private and Public. By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 547 |
| Murray, George Gilbert. By E. H. | ... | 14 |
| Muse in Exile, The. By Gilbert Thomas | ... | 113 |
| Mysticism. By Dr. Percy Dearmer | ... | 457 |
| Nan, The Tragedy of | ... | 718 |
| Napoleon, The Real. By Chas. Sarolea:— | | |
| Part I. | ... | 74 |
| " II. | ... | 106 |
| Newspaper Man Powerless in England? Why is the. By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 485 |
| Nietzsche, Friedrich. By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 136 |
| Outcast, An. By R. Fraser | ... | 657 |
| Pacifism and Imperialism. By Enrico Corradini | ... | 36 |
| Papacy, History of the | ... | 779 |
| Pathos, The Paradox of. By Gilbert Thomas | ... | 496 |
| Peasant's Plight. The Land Hunger. By F. E. Green | ... | 575 |
| People and Puppets | ... | 347 |
| Pilgrims of Watling Street, The. By W. H. L. Watson | ... | 775 |
| Plimsoll Line, The Tragedy of the. By our Special Commissioner | ... | 552, 594, 616, 652 |
| Poetry:— | | |
| April Gold. By Arthur Stanley | ... | 43 |
| Cathbad's Prophecy. By Ruth Duffin | ... | 4 |
| Cleopatra's Needle. By Thomas Sharp | ... | 625 |
| Den Unbekanntem Gott. Trans. from Nietzsche by S. F. Butchart | ... | 228 |
| Disinherited, The. By Vorley Wright | ... | 742 |
| Evening Calm. By George S. Astins | ... | 750 |
| Grains that run through, The. By John Carlton | ... | 710 |
| Heine, From. Trans. S. F. Butchart | ... | 196 |
| In Memoriam, George Meredith. By Horace Shipp | ... | 111 |
| Moon-Path, The. By E. W. Alexander | ... | 39 |
| Music of the Heart, The. By John Carlton | ... | 646 |
| Once, My Playmate. By Austin Priestman | ... | 10 |
| On the Poor of London. By H. Belloc | ... | 593 |
| Sonnet. By William Wordsworth | ... | 852 |
| To a Dead Love. By Lilian Brierley | ... | 559 |
| To Faïmmetta (with a Gift of Flowers). By Reginald L. Hine | ... | 397 |
| To his Lady's Bridesmaids. By Reginald L. Hine | ... | 433 |
| To the not Inconstant Moon. By Thomas Sharp | ... | 425 |
| Poetry and the Public. By Dudley Clark | ... | 582 |
| Poor Live, How the— | | |
| The Shoemaker's Story. By Thomas Holmes | ... | 359 |
| A Wharf Labourer's Story. By Thomas Holmes | ... | 292 |
| Portraits and Character Sketches. Portraits by W. H. Caffyn— | | |
| Archer, William, Portrait of | ... | 385 |
| " Character Sketch of | ... | 393 |
| Balfour, Arthur James, Portrait of | ... | 513 |
| " Character Sketch of | ... | 521 |
| Balzac, Honoré de, Portrait of | ... | 417 |
| " By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 424 |
| Barrie, Sir J. M., Bart, Portrait of | ... | 257 |
| " By E. Hermann | ... | 264 |
| Bebel, Ferdinand August, Portrait of | ... | 609 |
| " By Sidney Whitman | ... | 617 |
| Belloc, Hilaire, Portrait of | ... | 577 |
| " By J. K. Prothero | ... | 585 |
| Besant, Mrs. Annie, Portrait of | ... | 737 |
| " By C. Sheridan Jones | ... | 743 |
| Borrow, George, Portrait of | ... | 65 |
| " By E. Hermann | ... | 73 |
| Bridges, Robert, Portrait of | ... | 449 |
| " By E. Rhys | ... | 456 |
| Brooke, Augustus Stopford, Portrait of | ... | 769 |
| " Character Sketch of | ... | 777 |
| Campbell, Rev. R. J., Portrait of | ... | 193 |
| " By E. Hermann | ... | 201 |
| Eliot, George, Portrait of | ... | 353 |
| " By C. Sheridan Jones | ... | 361 |
| Flaubert, Gustave, Portrait of | ... | 481 |

| | | |
|--|-----|------|
| Portraits and Character Sketches (continued)— | | PAGE |
| Flaubert, Gustave, Character Sketch of | ... | 488 |
| Goethe, Johann von, Portrait of | ... | 225 |
| " Character Sketch of | ... | 232 |
| James, Henry, Portrait of | ... | 641 |
| " By J. Stephen | ... | 649 |
| Lodge, Sir Oliver, Portrait of | ... | 705 |
| " By H. Stanley Allen, M.A., B.Sc. | ... | 713 |
| Meynell, Mrs. Alice, Portrait of | ... | 673 |
| " By E. Rhys | ... | 680 |
| Murray, George Gilbert, Portrait of | ... | 1 |
| " By E. Hermann | ... | 14 |
| Robertson, Sir J. Forbes, Portrait of | ... | 801 |
| Synge, J. M., Portrait of | ... | 545 |
| " By J. M. Hone | ... | 555 |
| Turgenev, Ivan, Portrait of | ... | 289 |
| " By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 296 |
| Vandervelde, Emile, Portrait of | ... | 34 |
| " By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 40 |
| Wagner, Richard, Portrait of | ... | 161 |
| " By J. Cuthbert Hadden | ... | 169 |
| Webb, Mrs. Sidney, Portrait of | ... | 97 |
| " By C. M. Lloyd | ... | 105 |
| Price, The. By C. B. Purdom | ... | 520 |
| Prison, Why I went to. By George Lansbury | ... | 741 |
| Propitiation. By Doris L. Mackinnon | ... | 612 |
| Proverbs (Selected). By William Blake | ... | 273 |
| Railway Carriage, In a. By H. Leather | ... | 590 |
| Railways, The Nationalisation of. By Emile Vandervelde | ... | 803 |
| Reading, A Lay Sermon on the Art of— | | |
| Part I. | ... | 48 |
| " II. | ... | 84 |
| Recall, The. By Mary Bradford Whiting | ... | 174 |
| Religion, Education, Ethics and. By W. E. Orchard | ... | 497 |
| Reviews:— | | |
| Books of the Week. (See under B.) | | |
| Bosanquet, B., LL.D., D.C.L. "The Value and Destiny of the Individual" | ... | 250 |
| Bumpus, T. Francis. "The Cathedrals and Churches of Rome and Southern Italy" | ... | 78 |
| Capes, Bernard. "The Pot of Basil" | ... | 602 |
| Crosse, Gordon. "The Religious Drama" | ... | 433 |
| Donne's Poetical Works. Edited by H. J. C. Grierson | ... | 44 |
| Dostoevsky, Fyodor. "The Idiot" | ... | 459 |
| Flaubert, Gustave. "Temptation of St. Anthony" | ... | 488 |
| Fuller, Sir J. Bampfylde, K.C.S.I., C.I.E. "The Empire of India" | ... | 27 |
| Gray, H. B. "The Public Schools and the Empire" | ... | 584 |
| Harrison, Sidney. "V.V.'s Eyes" | ... | 347 |
| Hirst, F. W. "The Six Panics" | ... | 547 |
| Johnston, Sir Harry, G.C.M.G., K.C.B. "Pioneers in India" | ... | 27 |
| Legros, Dr. C. V. "Fabre, Poet of Science" | ... | 807 |
| Lewis, Georgina King. "John Greenleaf Whittier: His Life and Work" | ... | 58 |
| "Pascal, Pensées de." Texte de Brunshvigg | ... | 784 |
| Saintsbury, Prof. George. "The English Novel" | ... | 683 |
| Sandars, Mary F. "Princess and Queen of England: The Life of Mary II." | ... | 625 |
| Santayana, Prof. G. "Winds of Doctrine" | ... | 37 |
| " Thompson, Francis, The Works of" | ... | 426 |
| Tomlinson, H. M. "The Sea and the Jungle" | ... | 327 |
| Trevelyan, G. M. "The Life of John Bright" | ... | 697 |
| Warrick, M.A., Rev. John. "The Moderators of the Church of Scotland" | ... | 59 |
| Watson, William. "The Muse in Exile" | ... | 113 |
| Whibley, Chas. "Essays in Biography" | ... | 165 |
| Wrench, G. T. "Lord Lister: His Life and Work" | ... | 666 |
| Wyndham Papers, The | ... | 540 |
| Rio, Rolling down to | ... | 327 |
| Road that Leads to Nowhere, The. By Llewenn Macartney | ... | 101 |
| Robespierre. By Chas. Sarolea | ... | 387 |
| Robespierre, Carlyle on. Prize Essay. By W. K. Anderson | ... | 722 |
| Romanism on the Decline? Is. By Hector Macpherson | ... | 749 |
| Rung, The First. By Munroe Clark | ... | 203 |
| Russia, Freedom in. By Dr. Percy Dearmer | ... | 323 |
| Russian Police and the Press, The. By George Raffalovitch | ... | 773 |
| Russian Prison, From a. By Helen Voronoff | ... | 486 |
| Satanism, The Literary Side of. By Bernard Hamilton | ... | 519 |
| Schools and the Children, The. By P. W. Wilson | ... | 274 |
| Schools, Reforms in our Public. By Emeritus Prof. H. A. Strong— | | |
| Part I. | ... | 584 |
| " II. | ... | 626 |
| Serb, Greek and Bulgar. By David H. Low | ... | 452 |
| Sex and the Drama. A Reply. By D. E. Oliver | ... | 110 |
| Sex Antagonism, The Bogey of. By Prof. J. Arthur and Margaret R. Thomson | ... | 780 |
| Shaw, G. Bernard. By Richard Curle | ... | 204 |
| Shaw's "Lion," Bernard. By C. B. Purdom | ... | 679 |
| Silhouette | ... | 463 |
| Single-Tax Principle in Western Canada, The Growth of the. By F. J. Dixon | ... | 685 |
| Social Reform and the Drama. By Arthur Owen Orrett | ... | 612 |
| Socialism, Christianity and. By Dr. Dearmer | ... | 818 |
| Spring. By Dorothy Eyre | ... | 140 |
| Stories, Short:— | | |
| Claretie, Jules. "Boum-Boum" | ... | 592 |
| " "Tuyet" | ... | 208 |

| Stories, Short (continued)— | PAGE | | PAGE |
|--|------|--|------|
| Criquetot, Pierre. "The Curé of Saint-Crespin" ... | 400 | Thus Spake Zarathustra—on the Links. By W. R. T. ... | 620 |
| Daudet, Alphonse. "The Secret of Old Cornille" ... | 619 | Time Legends, Old ... | 602 |
| "The Man with the Brain of Gold" ... | 144 | Topical, The Trail of the ... | 313 |
| Foley, Chas. "How Marriages are Made in France":— | | Town or Country? By Edgar M. Appleton ... | 554 |
| I.—"The Romantic Marriage" ... | 432 | | |
| II.—"The Summary Marriage" ... | 464 | Usury, the Curse of. Shall We Abolish the Pawnbroker?:— | |
| Foley, Chas. "The Lie" ... | 557 | I. ... | 291 |
| Goodchild, George. "Caravan Days" ... | 49 | II. ... | 324 |
| Green, F. E. "The Sheep" ... | 817 | | |
| Ibanez, V. Blasco. "The Mannequin" ... | 80 | Vamberg, Arminius. By John McEwan ... | 761 |
| Mason, A. C. "Shadow-Goblins" ... | 236 | Vandervelde, Emile, and the Belgian Strike. By Chas. Sarolea ... | 40 |
| Maupassant, Guy de. "My Uncle Sosthène" ... | 176 | Verdi, Giuseppe. By J. Cuthbert Hadden ... | 816 |
| "The Necklace" ... | 16 | | |
| Mérimée, Prosper. "Mateo Falcone":— | | Wagner, Richard. ... | 169 |
| Part I. ... | 336 | Wanted—Consumers' Leagues. By Our Special Commissioner ... | 781 |
| II. ... | 369 | Waterloo, The Battle of. Part II. By Hilaire Belloc ... | 3 |
| Scheffauer, Herman. "The Shadow-Slayer":— | | Webb, Mrs. Sidney. By C. M. Lloyd ... | 105 |
| Part I. ... | 720 | Women at Work. By Margaret Hamilton:— | |
| II. ... | 752 | VIII.—The Sweated Worker ... | 6 |
| Theuriet, André. "Little Gab's Journey" ... | 494 | IX.—The Domestic Servant ... | 38 |
| "Ravageau" ... | 272 | X.—The Canvasser ... | 70 |
| "The Spider" ... | 112 | XI.—The Woman in Politics ... | 134 |
| "Uncle Léchaudel" ... | 304 | Woman in the Financial World. By Lucy H. Yates ... | 205 |
| Stratford Festival, Mr. F. R. Benson and the. By C. B. Purdom ... | 75 | "The Curse of the Plain. By S. H. E. L. ... | 516 |
| Suffrage Question, Some Thoughts on the. By E. H. Shillito, B.A. ... | 164 | Women, The Surplusage of. By A. D. ... | 270 |
| Sunday. The Continental. By Rev. James Adderley ... | 237 | Working Man, Education and the. By Cyril E. Roberts ... | 523 |
| Surgeon. A Great ... | 666 | "Men, The Use of Books to. By J. R. Clynes ... | 5 |
| Synge, J. M. By J. M. Hone ... | 555 | | |
| | | Yeats, William Butler. By J. M. Hone ... | 328 |
| Theatre Movement, The National. By William Archer ... | 299 | | |
| Thompson, The Works of Francis. By E. Hermann ... | 426 | | |

INDEX OF AUTHORS

| | PAGE | | PAGE | | PAGE |
|------------------------------------|-------------------------|---|------------------------------------|--|----------------------------|
| ADDERLEY, Rev. James ... | 237, 493 | GALLICIAN, Walter M. ... | 284 | POSTLETHWAITE, H. A. ... | 643 |
| ALEXANDER, E. W. ... | 39 | GEDDIE, Liddell ... | 526, 586, 682, 746, 811 | PRIESTMAN, Austin ... | 10 |
| ALEXANDER, G. ... | 394, 647 | GOODCHILD, George ... | 49 | PROTHERO, John K. ... | 490, 585, 688 |
| ALLEN, H. Stanley, M.A., D.Sc. ... | 713 | GREEN, F. E. ... | 66, 451, 615, 817 | PURDOM, C. B. ... | 75, 520, 679 |
| A.M.S. ... | 40 | | | | |
| ANDERSON, W. K. ... | 722 | HADDEN, J. Cuthbert ... | 169, 816 | RAFFALOVITCH, George ... | 773 |
| APPLETON, Edgar ... | 554 | HAMILTON, Bernard ... | 519 | R. B. W. ... | 697 |
| ARCHER, William ... | 299 | HAMILTON, Margaret ... | 6, 33, 70, 134, 268, 525, 714, 805 | RHYS, Ernest ... | 173, 456, 681 |
| ASHMORE, J. E. ... | 579 | HEINE ... | 196 | ROBERTS, Cyril F. ... | 523 |
| ASTINS, George S. ... | 750 | HERMANN, E. ... | 8, 14, 73, 201, 264, 331, 426 | | |
| | | HINE, Reginald, L. ... | 397, 483 | SAINTEBURY, Prof. George ... | 44 |
| BANERJEE, P. C. ... | 423 | HOLMES, Thomas ... | 292, 326, 383 | SALMON, Arthur L. ... | 461 |
| BARBOUR, G. F., D. Phil. ... | 132 | HONE, J. M. ... | 163, 323, 357, 555 | SAROLEA, Chas.— | |
| BELLOC, Hilaire ... | 8, 593 | HYNDMAN, H. Mayera ... | 227 | 40, 74, 106, 136, 141, 202, 296, 387, 421, 485, 547, 784 | |
| BENSON, Monsignor R. H. ... | 171 | JONES, C. Sheridan— | | SCHIEFFAUER, Herman ... | 367, 720, 752 |
| BLAKE, William ... | 273 | 77, 139, 361, 394, 419, 454, 483, 522, 550, 614, 653, 743 | | SCUDDER, Vida D. ... | 650 |
| BRANSON, Anna ... | 301 | JONES, Frank D. ... | 675 | SHARP, Thomas ... | 425, 625 |
| BRIDLE, Augustus ... | 131, 168 | | | SHELDON, A. G. ... | 6-6 |
| BRIERLEY, Lillian ... | 559 | LANSRURY, George ... | 741 | SHILLITO, E. H., B.A. ... | 164 |
| BROWN, Dorothy H. ... | 617 | LATEY, William ... | 707 | SHIP, Horace ... | 111 |
| | | LEATHER, H. ... | 590 | SINCLAIR, Hugh ... | 896 |
| CARLTON, John ... | 646, 710 | LILLY, W. S. ... | 359, 294, 645, 677 | SOUDEN, F. T. ... | 709 |
| CARPENTER, Rev. S. C. ... | 771 | LLOYD, C. M. ... | 105 | STANLEY, Arthur ... | 43 |
| CECIL, Lord William Gascoyne ... | 67 | LOW, David H. ... | 452 | STEPHEN, J. ... | 569, 649 |
| CLARETIE, Jules ... | 208, 592 | | | STEWART, John E. ... | 739 |
| CLARK, Dudley ... | 582 | McEWAN, John ... | 761 | STRONG, Emeritus Prof. H. A. ... | 584, 626 |
| CLARK, Monroe ... | 203 | MACKINNON, Dora L. ... | 428, 612 | | |
| CLYNES, J. R., M.P. ... | 5 | MACPHERSON, Hector ... | 170, 241, 749 | THEURIET, André ... | 112, 272, 304, 494 |
| CORREY, Daniel ... | 362 | MAKTERLINGER, Maurice ... | 107, 133 | THOMAS, Gilbert ... | 113, 496 |
| CORRADINI, Enrico ... | 36 | MARRIOTT, J. W. ... | 140, 392 | THOMSON, G. C. ... | 391, 429 |
| CRUQUETOT, Pierre ... | 400 | MASON, A. C. ... | 236 | THOMSON, Prof. J. Arthur ... | 780 |
| CRUMP, Charles W. ... | 402 | MAUPASSANT, Guy de ... | 242 | THOMSON, Margaret R. ... | 780 |
| CURLE, Richard ... | 11, 204, 363, 459 | MAZEL, Henri ... | 16, 176 | THOMSON, Rev. W. R. ... | 365 |
| | | MELVILLE, Lewis ... | 523 | | |
| DAUDET, Alphonse ... | 144, 619 | MÉRIMÉE, Prosper ... | 330 | VANDERVELDE, Emile, M.P. ... | 99 |
| DEARMER, Dr. Percy ... | 46, 323, 359, 457, 818 | MONEY, L. G. Chiozza, M.P. ... | 336, 369, 195, 226, 581, 611 | VORONOFF, Helen ... | 486 |
| DIXON, F. J. ... | 685 | | | | |
| DUFFIN, Ruth ... | 4 | NIETZSCHE ... | 238 | WATERHOUSE, G. ... | 657 |
| | | OGILVIE, Will ... | 4 | WATSON, W. H. L. ... | 775 |
| EDITOR, The ... | 108, 166, 198, 230, 260 | OLIVER, D. E. ... | 110 | WHITING, Mary Bradford ... | 174 |
| EYRE, Dorothy ... | 140, 167 | ORCHARD, W. E. ... | 497 | WHITMAN, Sidney ... | 617 |
| | | ORRETT, Arthur Gwen ... | 200, 613 | WILSON, P. W. ... | 35, 72, 100, 274, 333, 493 |
| FELS, Joseph ... | 195 | PARKER, E. A. ... | 786 | WORDSWORTH, William ... | 582 |
| FIDLER, Florence G. ... | 624 | PHILLIMORE, Prof. J. S. ... | 42, 419, 560 | WRIGHT, Henry ... | 365 |
| FROGGS, Darrell ... | 260 | | | WRIGHT, Vorley ... | 742 |
| FOLEY, Charles ... | 432, 464, 557 | | | W. R. T. ... | 620 |
| FRASER, R. ... | 657 | | | YATES, Lucy H. ... | 205 |
| | | | | YORK, CLIFTON ... | 744 |

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 27. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED.
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1913

One Penny.

GEORGE GILBERT MURRAY
NATUS 1866

For Biographical Sketch, see p. 14.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of George Gilbert Murray | 1 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 2 |
| The Battle of Waterloo. Part II.—By Hilaire Belloc ... | 3 |
| Cathbad's Prophecy. Poem—By Ruth Duffin | 4 |
| Literary Competition | 4 |
| The Call—By Will Ogilvie... .. | 4 |
| The Use of Books to Working Men—By J. R. Clynes, M.P. | 5 |
| Women at Work. VIII.—The Sweated Worker—By Margaret Hamilton | 6 |
| Countries of the World. XII.—Australia—By E. Hermann | 8 |
| "Once, My Playmate." A Japanese Child-Verse By Austin Priestman | 10 |
| Arnold Bennett—By Richard Curle | 11 |
| Literary Notes | 12 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. Charlotte Brontë's "Jane Eyre" | 13 |
| Professor Gilbert Murray—By E. H. | 14 |
| The Necklace—By Guy de Maupassant | 16 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? | 19 |
| Was Euripides a Woman-Hater? | 19 |
| Educational Reform | 19 |
| Enterprise in Business | 20 |
| The Call of the Citizen | 22 |
| Modern Fortresses Captured by Assault | 23 |
| The Typist | 23 |
| Paganism and Christianity | 24 |
| The Glorious Freedom of Half-Timerdom | 25 |
| International Languages | 26 |
| Wages and Labour Conditions | 26 |
| Cardinal Newman | 26 |
| Two Books on India | 27 |
| Books of the Week | 28 |
| List of Books Received | 30 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT has not been conspicuous for energy of late, and it is likely that the week will end as it began, in a general air of languorous lassitude. The Committee of the Cabinet has been considering the right handling of certain important Bills, pending which the House has been marking time. The Revenue Bill showed a tendency to drag, and no very overwhelming desire for its smooth and rapid progression was manifested. This somnolent mood may, however, break into something less placid over the official Opposition amendment to the Plural Voting Bill. Mr. Crooks' Minimum Wage resolution ruffled it for an appreciable space, and then minds (if not heads) nodded once more. A generation ago such a resolution would have been opposed "on principle," whatever that might mean in such a connection. To-day everyone admits that a minimum wage of 30s. would be "most desirable," and then calmly proceeds to ask whether it is practicable and in the interest of the workers. The "social conscience" has come to stay, and has transcended all party distinctions.

The suspicion that Canada is being treated de haut en bas by the British Government, and that Mr. Winston Churchill is a belated reincarnation of Lord North, has raised a storm which, centring in Ottawa, has reverberated from Halifax to Vancouver. The Canadian Press teems with discussions, rallying cries, pacifications, and miscellaneous advice. The Ottawa Citizen taunts the Canadian Liberals with not knowing the difference between a dinghy and a dread-nought. The Winnipeg Tribune counsels moderation. The Toronto Globe is inflammatory. The London Advertiser takes up the cudgels for Canadian manufacturers and working men whom it sees branded with the stamp of inferiority. And through the hubbub of comment and outcry comes the reasonable voice of the Montreal Herald (Liberal), telling Canadians that "it will not be comfortable with Canada's dignity, nor make for the strengthening of the Imperial tie, if we become so supercritical of what the members of the British Government say regarding us, that they will be afraid to open their mouths . . . for fear of their motives being misinterpreted."

President Woodrow Wilson is making history somewhat rapidly, and his deliverance at the Democratic Congress is likely to have deep-going consequences. An interesting sidelight is thrown upon his personality by a writer in the Ohio State Journal, who comments upon the conference between the President and Senator La Follette, who had not visited the White House for three years. "Such an experience," says this writer, "would not be possible under a political régime inspired by a clamour for official plunder and the flesh-pots of politics. But, above these considerations, these great, earnest, candid men can meet to talk over the public welfare without suspecting each other of seeking a selfish advantage."

The Belgian political strike, involving 500,000 workers, appears distinctly barbarous to a people like ourselves, who look with suspicion upon anything like "unconstitutional" procedure. One is apt to forget that there are Constitutions which make constitutional protest impossible, and that the Belgian electoral system is one of them; also that ever since 1893 the Belgian democracy has used every peaceful means in its power to secure its end. To act constitutionally in this case means to attempt to use the very machinery which is the cause of the trouble as a means to remove it—an obviously impossible proposition. It were short of the mark, however, to see in this strike merely a crusade for "One man, one vote." It is Democracy against Clericalism; the bursting of a long pent-up flood of resentment and wrath; the meeting of two opposing principles and "life-systems." That the strike is doomed to failure is a foregone conclusion. For one thing, the State owns the railways, and the Government will see to it that they and the port of Antwerp are kept open. For another, such a strike is bound to deplete Labour to the point of inanition before it has so much as scratched the hide of Capital.

"Latin America for Latin Americans" is becoming something more than an idle tag in the great Republics of the South: Projects of militarisation are in the air, and writers in the South American Press cry shame upon the short-sighted policy of statesmen whose horizon is bounded by the commercial well-being of their people, whereas the very existence of Latin America depends upon "an alliance of the Latin American nations," based upon a uniting and consolidating of military forces. The Preusa (Buenos Aires), one of the most influential organs of South America, stands for a progressive naval policy, and shrewdly points to the United States as an example of a peace-loving nation up to the knees in military preparation. "The States which are most avowedly pacifist are also most generous in their military expenditure," declares the Preusa. This new movement, led by the Argentine Republic, is fraught with momentous possibilities, and will cause a flutter among European capitalists.

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO * * * BY HILAIRE BELLOC

PART II.

UPON the next day, June 17th, this is what happened:—

The Prussians, defeated at Ligny, retired towards Brussels; so by a parallel line did Wellington with his Anglo-German-Dutch force. The two halves of the line Napoleon had pierced were each in being, and each remained in the neighbourhood of the other as it fell back. After the Prussians, to watch them and see what they were doing and whither they retired, Napoleon sent Grouchy with a very large body of men; weakening his army (lessened as it already was after the losses of the two battles) by nearly a third. Grouchy's instructions were, of course, not only to watch the Prussians, but to prevent them joining Wellington, who was retiring by that parallel line, only a few miles off. On that Saturday evening the Prussians drew up round a little town called Wavre, due south-east of Brussels, while, only eight or nine miles off, Wellington put his army in line that same evening upon a low ridge in front of the village of Waterloo, which is very little short of due south of Brussels. The two commanders, whose united forces amounted to close upon the double of the whole French Army (and much more, of course, than double what Napoleon commanded, now that Grouchy was away), awaited the attack of the morrow; but the only one immediately in front of Napoleon was Wellington, in his position on the ridge.

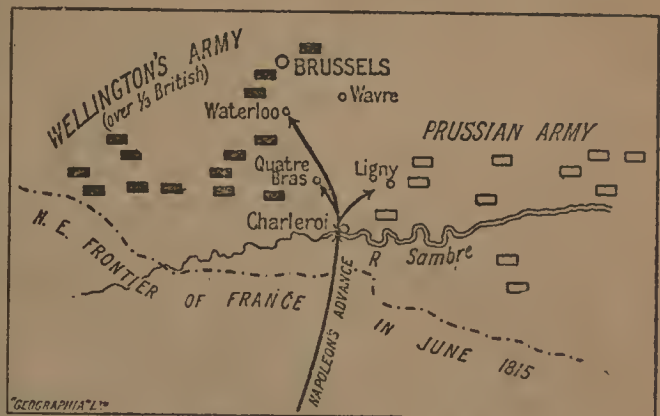

Napoleon delivered his main attack upon the line Wellington had taken up a little after one o'clock in the afternoon. The same morning the Prussians had begun to advance their troops across country from Wavre westward towards the Waterloo ridge, in aid of Wellington. If Wellington had not had a promise that the Prussians would do this he would not, of course, have risked an engagement, for his British and Dutch and German troops, all combined, were somewhat inferior in numbers, and greatly inferior in guns, to the force with which Napoleon faced him.

The Prussians could not bring the whole of their great force across country to help Wellington in one body. They could only bring it bit by bit, and it was their freshest and first army corps, the Fourth, which Blucher thus led to the aid of Wellington upon that morning of Sunday, June 18th.

Napoleon then began the attack on Wellington's as yet unaided line a little after one. The success or failure of this attack would depend upon three things: the power of Wellington's command to hang on until the Prussians should arrive upon the scene, the hour by which the Prussians could manage to come, and Grouchy's ability or inability to intercept the Prussians, and prevent them coming up at all. Neither Grouchy nor Napoleon knew on the Sunday morning whither the main Prussian body had retired or whether they were near Wellington or far off. If Grouchy should discover in time that the Prussians had retired on Wavre, and should step in between them and Wellington, it was hopeless for Wellington to fight. Even if Grouchy did not find out what the Prussians had done, and allowed the Prussians to come up unmolested, it was essential that they should come up pretty early in the day; and Wellington would not have accepted battle with an inferior force unless he had been distinctly promised that Blucher would appear upon the field somewhere between one or two o'clock. As a fact, Blucher did not appear with the first of his troops until between four and five, and they did not begin to make an impression until somewhat later.

Meanwhile, from one o'clock, when the big artillery attack began—at the latest, from half-past one, when the first infantry attack was delivered—Wellington's line on the ridge had to stand the assaults of the French. There was at least four hours' fighting before the relief afforded by the arrival of the Prussians began to be felt. That arrival made, of course, all the difference to what was left of the day. Napoleon's forces were increasingly taken up with this new pressure upon their right flank. The whole of the north-eastern horn of the battle was pushed in to meet the increasing force of the Prussian attack, and still the Anglo-Dutch line on the hill held. Just before sunset a last desperate attempt was made to break that line by a charge of the Guard. This charge failed, largely through the action of the Commander of the 52nd, Colbourne, afterwards Lord Seaton; and before it was twilight the combined pressure of the Prussians upon the French right flank, with the failure of their attempt to break the Anglo-Dutch line, had decided the action. The whole French line gave way, and a little before darkness—the retreat of Napoleon's forces became a rout, which was pursued for more than twelve miles through the night towards the French frontier.

That, as best as I can tell it within a very short compass, is the strategical and tactical story of the Battle of Waterloo, and the more people will keep in mind those main lines, the better for popular history.

It is of some interest, though of no practical value, to consider what would have happened if, for any one of the three reasons I have mentioned, Napoleon had succeeded upon the field of Waterloo. Suppose, that is, that Grouchy had found out the line of the Prussian retreat; or supposing the Prussians had not come up in time (they were badly late as it was), or supposing Wellington's line had not held.

Well, as to the first two suppositions, the answer is not very difficult. If Grouchy had found out that Blucher had retired upon Wavre and was close in the neighbourhood of Wellington, why, then he would have "held" the Prussians, and Wellington would never have fought the action of Waterloo at all. The Prussians would have retired upon Brussels, and Wellington would have retreated again to effect his junction with them in front of or behind that town. If, again, Blucher had come up later than he did, Wellington would have broken contact, and put an end to the battle. He was, as a fact, engaged in the preliminaries of this, on the supposition that the Prussians might fail, when their pressure began to be felt; and he would have been a very bad general, instead of a good one, if he had hesitated for a moment upon that conclusion, supposing the Prussians to have failed him.

As to the last supposition—what would have happened if the Anglo-Dutch line had broken before the Prussians came up? I think the answer is this: Napoleon would have reached Brussels. The Prussians would have retired upon Cologne; but the forces converging upon France were far too considerable to have permitted Napoleon any enduring success. He would, I think, quite certainly have been beaten in some final manner within a very few months of that occupation of Brussels; nor do I think that he could possibly have recovered at home during the short intervening space of time the prestige which the retreat from Russia, the destruction of the Grand Army, and the catastrophe of Leipzig had ruined for ever.

CATHBAD'S PROPHECY

O KING, I stood upon the outer rath
 In the wild airs of night, and marked the stars.
 The wandering moons, pointing with fingers pale
 Down the vast spaces of the windless deep,
 Chanted their secret runes. I, Cathbad, heard:
 They told me Deirdre's tale—a tale whereat
 Many shall weep when Deirdre's self shall be
 As dust upon the indifferent wind. I saw
 The story of her days, who lies this night
 In her first baby slumber, knowing not
 She shall be sought by kings. Her face shall bring Exile on princes, and the sound of wars
 Shall follow her. Deirdre, O King, shall be
 A flame of beauty in the wastes of time,
 Lovely and perilous. For her shall fall
 Great heroes and bright candles of the Gael;
 Her eyes shall lead them over alien seas,
 Her voice entreat them down the ways of Death.
 And at the last, O King, a lonely grave
 Shall be her share—a little grave apart
 Hide her sad beauty from the eyes of men;
 Above her passionate heart the swinging tides
 Shall fret the salt sea-sand, and o'er her rest
 Wild winds of ocean raise the funeral keen.

RUTH DUFFIN.

LITERARY COMPETITION.

The Editor of EVERYMAN offers a prize of Two Guineas for the Best Essay on "The Woman Teacher—Her Life and Labour," the essay not to exceed 1,800 words. All entries for this competition should be addressed to the

COMPETITION EDITOR,
 21, Royal Terrace,
 Edinburgh,

and must reach him not later than May 1st. It is recommended that essays be typewritten.

THE CALL

By WILL OGILVIE

FOR nearly three years he had lived in Scotland, picking up, one by one, the broken threads of an existence which he had abandoned almost in boyhood; when the memories born of his ten years' exile forced themselves upon him—as they did at times—he set them firmly aside. He had made his choice, and he meant to abide by it.

At first, in the glamour of new friendships, in the glow of renewed acquaintance with the sports and pastimes of his youth, the cry for wider spaces and more understanding comradeship was stifled in his heart. Then came a close and intimate sorrow, a period of soul-sickness and despair; and then, again, at the door of his heart the old, insistent knocking, and the loud, incessant call that would not be denied.

As the winter waned he sat by his fire, gazing dreamily into the towers of flame, and seeing there the rose-red camp-fires of the Past. In the dim hour before the lamps he boarded the golden ship of Fancy, and crossed in the shadow of its purple sail the wide seas of the world. The familiar surroundings of his new life grew faint, and faded away. In their place was the glitter of innumerable stars through pointed gum-leaves, the enwrapping mystery of a Southern night. Only a few feet from him the forest of scrub closed in, dark and impenetrable, full of the silence that is louder than sound. Against the background of trees the myall-logs burned redly.

His ears were full of the distant melody of horse-bells; a horse, parted from its companions, neighed across the darkness—and across the world.

The dim outlines of many cattle lying at rest forced themselves upon his vision. A myall-log dipped in the centre, crashed down, and broke into sudden flame, driving the shadows back upon the forest and glinting on the horns of the nearest steers. One beast rose, restless, stretched itself, and wandered moodily off camp; another followed, and another.

The man stirred uneasily in his chair, and woke with a start to the familiar surroundings of his room. He sighed as Memory, passing, brushed him with her warm, soft wing.

He was awake now, wide awake; but the tinkling horse-bells did not cease to sound. Their melody, mingled with the voices of old comrades, permeated every tingling sense. Through the sounds a Bush Wind blew softly, full of the wail of weird things known only to Nature's sorrow.

Night after night the Bush called to him in his dreams, and all the day her half-forgotten glamour wrapped him round. His sports seemed trivial and tame, his labour insufficient. More and more he hated the narrow fields, the uneventful ways, the sights and sounds of a life so planned and ordered that its very order seemed a menace of misfortune, so guarded and remote that it seemed to be in the imminent shadow of danger.

Longing gave place to fear. The call became more than a love-summons, it became a command, even a threat; a bugle call demanding instant obedience. And it was under the spell of this strange, absorbing fear that the ship was chosen and the die was cast.

To-night his camp-fire flashes, far out beside a Western river, a golden sword-blade on the darkness. He is one with the wind-swept gum-boughs, and kin to the glittering stars. The voices of the great, mysterious Bush play on his thrall'd heart to-night—and for ever. He dare not leave her; nor would he if he dared.

THE USE OF BOOKS TO WORKING MEN

BY J. R. CLYNES, M.P.

IN the matter of making excellent use of brain and time, one of the best things which workmen could do is this: give to good book-reading during the coming years all the precious time they waste on staring at the flashy headlines and absorbing the worthless parade of newspaper rubbish which make up much of the news of the day. Let a working man ask himself what he remembers of the things he read in the papers last week, and what there is worth remembering till next week.

There is a probability of Parliament being called upon during the present Session to deal with another Education Bill, and it is said that, unlike previous ventures in this field of political action, the new Bill will arouse no sectarian conflict, but will be framed to enable the workers' children to secure the best education, and reach positions which are now impossible to them. I do not hesitate to say that Parliament would do more good if the Session were used in passing a law to compel working men to read Shakespeare, Shaw, Balzac, and William Morris. It is a good thing to educate the children, but a bad thing to let the parents cease to think, or think in the wrong way.

Any fundamental or substantial change in the economic structure which will help the working class to rise above their present level may be a long way off, and any mere change in our educational system to afford a better ladder for a few to climb to higher positions will leave unchanged the great mass, who will not be rescued by extended Universities and the better training of teachers. Much as I would welcome educational reform, I would more readily welcome a change in the disposition of workmen which would cause them to make a better use of their time now. Good book-reading would be no cure for labour unrest. Labour unrest would be increased, though better expressed and more scientifically directed if workmen used to a greater extent the intellectual levers of Ruskin, Dickens, Meredith, and Masefield—to throw in only a few uneven names.

Reading may not make thinkers, but it broadens knowledge and ripens men's capacity for action. It enlarges the toleration of masses of men, and it supplies many a joyful recompense after the labours of the day.

To those who adduce the difficulty of cost when thinking of books of popular present-day writers, the answer is that the older masters, who remain masters, afford books in plenty that are almost as cheap as waste-paper.

A book to a workman who is devoted to reading is not what it is to a reviewer or an author. Many a good book is as a gateway leading from a long round of drudgery and effort to obtain the means of daily bread. I would not have books intended to make men content with evil conditions, or submissive to them. The more men read usefully and well, the less will they yield to either an excess of authority or to under-payment in the matter of reward for their work.

Workmen need not now regard books as things devoted to the doings of society, or the interests of the nobility or well-to-do. Many of the best literary efforts illumine the daily lives of common folks, without whose service the rest of men and monarchs would not be sure of their daily bread. Let every workman who wants to feel the breeze of the sea and know the lives and understand the tribulations and pleasures of our fisher-folks read Stephen Reynolds' "Poor Man's House," and he will only set it aside as a book to be read again.

The long hours or bad conditions under which many men are employed may incline some to say that book-reading is a continuation of men's labour. They are wrong; for any time given to the task will yield greater return, in better forms of pay, than they can secure by any similar time placed at the disposal of an employer. Most manual work is monotonous, distasteful, or irksome. The subdivision of labour, production by piece-work, the use of machinery, and the pressure and speed incidental to modern trade and commerce are all very exacting. These are additional reasons why a man should taste some joys of existence by means of the mental recreation and pleasure which so many great minds can readily afford him.

By years of effort workmen are able to get little improvements in their condition, but these scarcely enlarge the margin of household comforts to an extent which compares with increasing necessities. The one department in which all workmen should ensure increase is the department of thought and outlook.

I am not arguing for a fireside life at a time when the season may call for a healthy country ramble, but many such a ramble would be the better if the workman carried with him Whitman's "Song of the Open Road." If the road is impossible, because the man is already tired with work, or for reasons of time or money, it will cost him little to sit and secure the delights of Belloc's "Path to Rome." To read it will the better fit him for any future journey, and enable him to see himself and nature on a larger scale.

In a recent number of EVERYMAN the book of Mr. W. R. Lawson, dealing with our schools, was referred to. Most things, it was argued, were wrong with our education. Committees all over the country were disappointed with the results of the arduous labours of schoolmasters and the enormous expenditure incurred in our educational system. Even those who, with good reason, assert the existence of the difficulty show some diffidence when asked for a remedy; but there should be no diffidence in directing the energies of organisations and men, to encouraging book-reading as indispensable to the life of many who are guilty of a corroding neglect.

There are men who sneer at the small talk of women, and who consider that their conversation is made up of chatter about fashions, dress, or domestic trifles of no account. Have these men kept their ears open when many of their fellows are talking? At what level is their conversation? How often do they hear them talking about the things that matter, or of the great stores of knowledge and life-action which lie upon the shelves of libraries, and which are so seldom seen in the homes of the most useful social servants and wealth-producers in the country? The smallest talk of women is less pitiable, and certainly more excusable, than the talk of many men. This reflection cannot apply to thousands of honourable exceptions; but it does apply to many who, despite every hardship, could make far better use of their reading time. Working men want many things which books could help them to get. And, if not, a good book was never a bad ornament.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

VIII.—THE SWEATED WORKER

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

THE case of the sweated worker cries out for immediate attention, and is of clamant importance to the community at large. The majority of women employed in the sweated trades work in their homes under conditions of unspeakable misery and squalor. The children before and after school are pressed into the service, but the united earnings of an entire family, working all day and half the night, do not permit of the purchase of sufficient food—let alone the common decencies of everyday life. "The Song of the Shirt," Tom Hood's immortal tragedy, is being enacted here in our city of to-day, and it is not women only who pay the price, working their fingers to the bone, but the little children, whose eyes, that should smile on the glad world, grow dim, whose limbs are stunted, whose hearts are bowed down with the cruel discipline of work.

And now let us see the number and variety of sweated trades in London only. It has been said of late that sweeping reforms have taken place in the dressmaking business, that the better-class firms have their goods made on the premises, in large, airy, and commodious workrooms. In many cases this is true. There still remains the fact, however, that in the East End women are employed to make ladies' skirts (lined) at 2s. 6d. a dozen, while long coats, cut in the latest fashion, are paid for at 7d. apiece.

Nor is this the lowest figure. In the course of their investigations the British Federation for the Emancipation of Sweated Women discovered that coats are put out at the rate of 4d. each, and that trousers are paid for at 1d. a pair. One unfortunate creature that the society's officers interviewed worked at this rate eighteen hours out of the twenty-four in the endeavour to keep herself and her four children. These trousers are sold in the retail shops at 10s. to 13s. a pair, and some of the coats find their way into fashionable establishments in the West End, where they are marked from two to three guineas.

The tailoring trade, however, does not touch the lowest depths of penury. In a room in Hoxton, stripped of every remnant of wainscotting, torn off for fuel, with pieces even hacked off the door, in the vain attempt to get a little warmth from the sullen, smoking grate, I found a mother and three children, the eldest six and the youngest three. Their little faces pinched, their eyes heavy, their fingers moved with a dexterity and swiftness wonderful to see. The baby handed lengths of wire to the mother; the other two were more advanced, and contributed a fair share to the weekly exchequer. They were making artificial violets, and the contrast between the dainty little blossoms in deep purple and pale mauve and the wretchedness of the apartment struck home like a knife.

Sixpence a gross was the payment the flower-makers received—sixpence for one hundred and forty-four! You can see flowers identical in shape and pattern in the shop windows to-day—masses of soft colour, graceful, innocent-looking things. After I left the Hoxton garret I felt an impulse of loathing towards them. Day in, day out the mother sat, and the heap of spring-like blossoms grew beside her. The children had a respite sometimes. The eldest was driven off to school by an inspector; the younger babies went early to bed. But the poor mother worked on, with nothing to hope for, to live for, but the children whom at such a sacrifice she worked to feed.

The art of buttonhole-making is one acquired in its perfection by long practice and experience; yet at this moment girls and women work buttonholes in shirts at the same rate per gross as the violet-maker receives. The calico is hard, and wears the fingers, rasping the flesh; but the sweater has little care for the flesh of his victims. He farms out his work, and receives with the left hand 100 per cent. in excess of what he pays with the right.

The list is not yet finished. The cards of hooks and eyes, all neatly stitched in place, and numbering 384 eyes and as many hooks—we have all bought them, and never given a thought as to who stitched them there, or what they were paid for doing. A penny a card is the price, and in some instances the worker has to find the thread. Children's clothes are made at a figure that, at first sight, seems impossible. The small boy's sailor suit that most young mothers have attempted at some time, cutting out with pride, and stitching away with love and happiness—two-pence is what the woman in the slum receives for the whole thing, and her earnings average from 4s. to 5s. a week.

There is no respite for the sweated worker. She dare not idle for an hour. She has no time to clean the wretched room in which she slaves; the children must go unkempt; herself in rags. The one breathing space she gets is when she takes the weekly toll of work and receives the few poor shillings she has slaved to earn. She dare not stop, because, if once she ceases, the home, held together on so frail a tenure, will go. The children, deprived of the scanty food procured, fall sick. Worse than all, she may lose the employment that demands so terrible a bondage. For, no matter how low the pay, how severe the conditions of the sweated worker, there is always an army of unemployed pressing from behind, and for every one that falls out, overtaxed and overstrained, there are fifty to take her place.

The majority of sweated workers are married women. The young girls employed, as a rule, commence by helping their mother, and, having once accepted the treadmill of ceaseless effort, find it difficult to break away. They have no chance in which to apply for work in a factory, and a situation as domestic servant is for them an impossible paradise. Without training, insufficiently fed, indescribably housed, the sweated worker is chained to her task as surely as the galley slaves of old.

Box-making is one of the few industries of the East End that is not confined to the home. The wages earned, though low, compare favourably with those above quoted. Of late years the rate has gone up from 1½d. to a minimum of 3d. an hour. This is owing to the strenuous efforts of the Box-makers' Union, which has laboured unceasingly to improve the conditions and increase the pay of the women workers. The hours are fifty-eight a week, and a quick, clever hand can earn from 14s. upwards, according to the class of work she adopts. Fancy boxes, the dainty sort of things you buy your chocolates in, are paid for at a higher rate, as are cigarette and cardboard cases for holding scent.

"My young man's out of work, so what am I to do?" I have heard the phrase time and again from a woman working her fingers to the bone at a starvation rate. The husband—her young man, as she calls him—is on the tramp, looking for a job. There must be a meal ready for him when he returns, a handful of fire in the grate, a cup of tea upon the hob. And the children, how can they go without food? What can the poor mother know or care of Trade Union rates? One's heart bleeds for them as they answer your questions. They must work early and work late, losing their youth, their looks, their very womanhood, in the insuperable task of earning the daily bread.

Combination is the best remedy for sweating. Hampered, as the pioneers of the women's unions undoubtedly are, by the factor of the married woman, the strides they have already made are considerable. Even the chain-makers of Cradley Heath have ameliorated to some extent the misery of their lives by combination, while the women upholsterers have secured a notable advance in wages and shorter hours of work per week.

Some of the less-known trades are terribly underpaid. Who would have supposed that the innocent-looking doll, reposing in a shop window, admired and loved by all the children who pass, was in any way connected with the horrors of this system? Yet the modelling and making of dolls' heads is a recognised branch of East End industry. Sixpence a dozen is the price—a price that seems to recur throughout the annals of the patient slaves with an appalling regularity.

If the toys of a happy and innocent childhood are not free from the taint of the sweater, what is to be said of funeral trappings—the last offerings of respect and veneration human nature can pay to the beloved dead? Four and sixpence a week is the average amount earned by workers employed at making coffin and hearse furniture—furniture, let it be realised, sold by the sweater at a huge profit either to a middleman or direct to firms of undertakers.

You are fond of a pretty blouse, and note a shop that is selling them cheap. Cheap or dear, the risk is run that the garment is sewn with a woman's tears. Three-halfpence apiece is the sum paid for the plainer kind, rising to 2d. and 3d. for the more elaborate variety. Bedspreads command a higher tariff; they are paid for at 4½d. apiece.

We all of us know and appreciate those handy boxes of hairpins of assorted size and shape. Women, working hard all day, manage to make the munificent sum of 4s. weekly, and boxing them!

Four shillings! That, with the help of the children and, on occasions, of the husband, may mount up by another 3s., making in all a family exchequer of some 7s. Out of this pittance the rent has to be paid, the food bought, some show of clothing purchased, an occasional pair of shoes or boots bought cheap at a stall on Saturday night. A desperate struggle, a hand-to-hand fight to keep body and soul together. Such a combat, indeed, as would never be continued but for the generosity of neighbours, the unfailing kindness of the poor to the poor. Is the top floor front in funds and cooking a dinner, she cannot enjoy it unless the lodger below, less fortunate than herself, shares the repast. There is a communism in the slums undreamt of in more prosperous sections of society. In times of trouble, when the landlord, impatient for his rent, distrains on the poor bits of furniture left in the garret, friends gather round and help the family to tide over the time until a few necessary articles can be purchased. Sickness enlists faithful service; hours stolen from sleep are lavished on the sufferer; such apologies for luxuries as can be obtained are offered to the invalid.

So wonderful is the sympathy the poor possess, so keen their enthusiasm for helping each other in the struggle towards better things, that from their pittance they will subscribe freely and generously when occasion arises, without a thought of their own necessities. At the time of the great dock strike collections were made for the men in all parts of London. Nowhere was the response more eagerly met than in the East End of London. In the districts of Hoxton and Bethnal Green no less than £30 was raised—in farthings!

But for the fellowship that exists among the very poor they could hardly endure their existence. Everywhere the trail of the sweater is discovered—the paper bag in which you buy your eggs or carry home the feather for your new hat may have been made at starvation rates. Sixpence—once again the sum appears—is the price per thousand, and in some instances paste has to be provided at the workers' expense. At the time that beaded shoes were fashionable, 9d. a dozen pairs was the highest figure, and in many cases the pattern was intricate, and strained the eyes as well as tiring the hand. Match-boxes fetch 3d. a gross; buttons are carded at 3s. per 100 gross.

If women would combine—women of all classes and occupations—to bring this system of sweating to an end, how many lives would be brightened, how many lives would be spared. A small amount of capital would be sufficient to enable the sweated workers in the flower-making and kindred industries to start a co-operative workshop, and, instead of starving for the sweater, work for themselves, and supply the warehouses and shops direct.

But without such help and assistance the sweated workers can do very little. Those unions, as I have shown, have made considerable headway against the sweater, but, as I pointed out, there still remains a vast army of women, with "eyelids heavy and red," who, from the dawn of the morning till dark at night, sit over their task, the crack of the whips of hunger and destitution in their ears.

Slaves of as cruel a system as ever white man imposed on black, they are silent for the most part, and piteously uncomplaining.

"I've only three left now, miss," said a sad-eyed woman when I asked after her poor, sickly little children. "I had eight once, but bad times came, and they died one after the other. I was out of work at the time, and my young man was in hospital. But I'm doing better now, and we're getting on fine."

Her smile hurt one; her courage was a reproach. Getting on fine—with five children in the grave and a sick husband and three babies to support! The attic was terribly bare and gaunt, but the truckle bed was clean; the table had been scrubbed and the floor swept. She had been working since five that morning, and when I saw her it was past two. She had snatched but a few minutes to give the children their dinner of bread and dripping, and to eat a crust herself. And the net result of her labour was exactly 6d. She had stitched seventy-five sacks, for which she was paid at the rate of 4d. for fifty!

Fourpence for fifty, and she was going on fine! Incalculable heroism that can find a gleam of brightness in a life so drear! Seventy-five sacks, and she hoped to complete the hundred by the end of the afternoon. And for this she wore out her life, stitching in the bleak attic, while the children huddled round the dying fire.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

XII.—AUSTRALIA

By E. HERMANN

I.

WHEN it is remembered that Australia covers 2,948,366 square miles, forming more than one-fourth of the whole area of the British Empire, and that, although five-thirteenths of its area lie within the tropic of Capricorn, it exhibits almost every variety of climatic conditions, it will be seen that a comprehensive and summary exposition is extremely difficult, if not impossible. Larger than the United States without Arctic Alaska, and more than three-fourths of Europe, and about twenty-five times as large as the United Kingdom, Australia is habitable by white men in every part, not excluding the so-called Australian desert. Three distinctive geographical features will strike the observer at his first look at a good map. The coastal line is remarkably small in proportion to the whole area, there are no considerable ranges of high snow mountains, and there are neither lakes of any size nor rivers connecting the coast-line with the interior. The last two characteristics bring one face to face with the crucial problem of irrigation. The future of Australia hinges upon the question of water conservation, and, though it is a land of short memories for misfortunes, the recent unprecedented succession of good seasons has not availed to make thoughtful men forget the desolating seven years' drought of fifteen years ago. At present most agriculturalists pin their faith to artesian water bores. Subterranean water is found over huge areas, and scientists surmise an inexhaustible supply. Such borings are expensive, however, and the nature of the springs still obscure. Moreover, as one goes farther inland, the water contains too much soda for purposes of irrigation, and grows increasingly brackish towards the heart of the great "desert."

II.

The configuration of Australia has been compared to an inverted saucer. There is, to begin with, an outer coastal rim, some forty miles deep, of rich alluvial soil. Broken by Spencer's Gulf, and degenerating into sandhills on the edge of the Bight, this belt reappears on the western coast and runs northward. Above it there rises the great dividing range, at no point more than 250 miles from the sea, and falling precipitously seawards in places, with bold, wild escarpments. Starting at the northernmost point of Australia, Cape York, it runs southward, achieves mingled charm and grandeur in the Barrier ranges of Queensland and the Blue Mountains of New South Wales, and reaches its greatest elevation in Mount Kosciusko, king of the Australian Alps and chief centre of winter sports. It breaks off at the boundary of Victoria and New South Wales, and, while it reappears in the west, it does not follow the alluvial rim northward. Behind the dividing ridge is the great central plain, forming the bottom of the saucer. Following the three divisions, we get three types of country—green pastures and well-wooded slopes on the coastal rim, rolling downs and dense, high forest land on the range, and a treeless plain in the centre, unattractive to the eye, but a serious rival to the wheat-fields of Canada. On the south coast one might imagine oneself in pastoral England. On the uplands the eucalyptus stands in free, open spaces, and rank creepers hug the roots of towering trees; the desert plain is instinct with the blankness and loneliness of vast spaces in a wild and virgin land.

III.

The dividing range explains the climate, or rather climates, of Australia. The sea breezes strike the eastern shore, hence the abundant rainfall along the coast. They are checked by the range, hence the scanty rainfall on the plains, which depend on the monsoons and western trade winds. Thus, while the rainfall in Sydney has averaged fifty inches over forty-two years, that of Western New South Wales averaged only nine. Add to this the lack of lakes, rivers, and snow mountains on the plain, and the magnitude of the irrigation problem jumps into instant view. So formidable is the drought spectre that it was declared a few years ago that Australia could never support a population at all commensurate to its size. But this gloomy armchair theory collapsed at the first impact of solid facts, as demonstrated, for example, by a writer in the Australian journal, Life. To begin with, he showed by a most ingenious map that the maritime belt alone would hold more than all Europe, minus Russia, and, further, that the rest of Australia contained more than twice the amount of land, with a rainfall of over twenty inches—that is, a rainfall allowing of excellent agricultural results—than Canada. Moreover, agriculture can be carried on with a rainfall of only twelve inches, while fifteen inches yield distinctly good returns, which adds half a million square miles to the credit balance of Australia. The gloomy theorists also left the quite extraordinary recuperative power of Australian soil and stock out of their reckoning.

IV.

With the granting of responsible government to the several States, Australia passed from the amorphous agglomeration of a "colony" to the articulated organism of a nation. The people gripped the land, and in doing so discovered their power of grip. They did not excoGITATE theories of State Socialism, but they realised by degrees that the most important of Australia's undeveloped resources was its population, and that a man is of more value than a sheep. That they gave an idealistic and spiritual connotation to that value cannot be asserted; but they recognised from the start that a man's body and brain and powers of enjoying the good things of life, material and artistic, are bigger assets than wool and coal and precious ore. The Federation of 1901 at once strengthened and controlled this new national spirit, giving it increased volume, but pruning its excrescences. To the Federal Senate and House of Representatives came men who were "big guns" in their own State, but had never realised that the conflicting claims of neighbour States affected the problems of each, and that a wise and generous dovetailing of interests was the only chance of solid success. The reaction upon State Parliaments was marked, and the Australian M.P. of to-day has a wider outlook and far more tolerance and general savoir-faire than his predecessor.

V.

To speak of Australian politics is to say "Labour Government" in these days. The Australian Labour party is Federalist in sympathy, has learnt to think imperially, and is solidly protectionist. It is not anti-Capitalist as a whole, believes in a modified form of conscription, and has little patience with Socialism of the doctrinaire type. Above all, it represents the people in the most full and real sense. It grew out of that new ideal of social progress which responsible government had called into being, and out of that characteristically Australian preference of ease to wealth which is largely the outcome of climatic conditions. Averse to any "high-falutin'" idealism or abstract social doctrines, the common-sense Australian worker decided that work at fair wages, pleasant, healthy conditions, and ample leisure were vastly preferable to enormous returns at the price of sweated or excessive labour; and he took care to send men to Parliament who would stand for this ideal. That the Labour party has made mistakes will be readily admitted. It has tended to perpetuate the Caucus—a necessary evil in the day of a party's weakness, but a pernicious incubus in the day of its strength. It was at one time guilty of a selfish and short-sighted immigration, or rather anti-immigration, policy—now a thing of the past. Its narrow definition of "Labour," and its exclusive insistence upon the rights of one class, entailed undeserved and unnecessary hardship upon the small tradesman and manufacturer. But, whatever its sins of commission and omission, its reign has synchronised with a period of unprecedented national prosperity, and, as a matter of fact, there is less paternal legislation in Australia to-day than in the home country. Wages Boards, Industrial Courts, and Trades Halls look formidable on paper, but it must not be forgotten that in a new and sparsely populated country legislation must needs be called in to do what is effected by economic compulsion in older countries, and in reality the Australian industrial law is no more stringent than, if as stringent as, our own.

It remains, however, that the Australian has an enviable faith in legislation, and uses it freely and audaciously pro bono publico.

VI.

The Labour party is commonly identified with what is known as the White Australia policy; but there are, in fact, very few thoughtful and unprejudiced men in Australia, whatever their political convictions, who do not stand for the ideal of a White Australia. To make the question of imported coloured labour an economic one is to miss the real issue. No one denies that the country could be developed far more rapidly with the aid of coloured labour; but Australia has made up her mind that no economic advantage can compensate for the degradation of both coloured and white which such slave-labour brings, and that a White Australia means political, social, and moral salvation, and is worth any sacrifice. And events have proved that the sacrifice was not nearly as great as was anticipated. When the Kanakas were deported from the sugar district of Queensland, mill-owners declared that the industry would be ruined, in spite of the compensating Government bounty. Instead of this, the yield rose by 593,340 tons within a year. As a matter of hard fact, there is hardly a spot in Australia where the white man cannot work and thrive.

VII.

One of the unhealthy symptoms of Australian development is the growth of large cities on or near the coast-line, and the drift of the population to these centres. There are few really progressive country towns, and the State capitals are tending towards an undesirable congestion. Of all the State capitals, Sydney captures the imagination most completely. Brisbane has its own charm—mostly a matter of gorgeous flowering shrubs clustering round wooden houses on "stilts," and undulating river-banks, every hillside hung with villas, glorious to see from a launch when the purple Judas-tree is in bloom. Melbourne is reminiscent of an American city, with its chequer-board street-planning, its bustle, and its taut, well-groomed women. Adelaide is a sleepy city of gardens and churches, with a comfortable air of unostentatious well-to-do-ness. Fremantle is a derelict city, the stream of life having deflected to Perth, which is the real capital of Western Australia, and has not a few attractions, notably a bracing climate, with cool nights, even at the height of summer. But one has seen them all before—or, at any rate, something like them.

Sydney suggests nothing but itself. And this is not merely due to the fact that Sydney Harbour is one of the seven beauties of the world, and that no invasion of fat Philistinism can make its garden suburbs anything but interesting. It is rather that Sydney exhibits more explicitly than any of the other centres the emergence of a new type of life and character, fundamentally British, yet strangely un-British. It is a type not a little Greek—modern Greek, that is, and one had almost said Levantine—in its relaxed and seductive grace, hedonistic tendency, artistic instincts, and scant capacity for moral indignation. Yet it is even more unlike any Southern type than it is unlike the British. It is, in fact, a new thing—a strangely intricate and fascinating woof of iridescent threads on a warp of British homespun. It is a young, yeasting life poised on the perilous edge of a transition, pregnant with every eventuality, and not without indications of disaster ahead. What part the new capital of Canberra will play in this evolution is an interesting but futile speculation. We are being told that Canberra will be smokeless, dustless, slumless, odourless, mudless, and free from deleterious gases; that its streets will be as spotless as a Dutch kitchen, and its buildings hermetically sealed against dust; and that it will combine beauty with efficiency. Whatever type such a nuisanceless city may produce, it is fairly safe to predict that its denizens are not likely to err on the side of strenuousness and self-denial.

VIII.

Misprized for generations, and used as little more than a dumping-ground for our failures and derelicts (a heartless policy from whatever point considered,

INDEX AND BINDING CASES OF VOL. I.

THE Publishers, after careful consideration, have decided not to issue the Index in the form of a supplement to the present number, as originally intended. Only a certain proportion of readers would have any use for the Index, so it has been decided to issue the Title-page and Index to Vol. I. as a separate publication, which will be sent post free to any reader on application accompanied by 4d. in stamps.

Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 8d. The first volume of EVERYMAN will be ready next week, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d. net, carriage paid 4s. Numerous applications have already been received, and all those desirous of obtaining the first of what should prove a long series of interesting volumes should write at once to the EVERYMAN Publishing Dept., Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

and a foolish one as well), Australia is at last being recognised as a country of unparalleled resources and possibilities. No area of equal size contains so much wealth and such a variety of wealth, and the Government is doing much to develop these rich resources.

A policy of close settlement is rigorously pursued; railways and forest telephones go with, or rather precede, the settler; irrigation works are multiplied; expert instruction and advice are extended to agriculturalists and pastoralists; an up-to-date system of national education, with free entry for clergy of all denominations, is the rule, and free railway passes are granted to scholars living at a distance. A more stringent grading of wheat and a closer supervision of dairy output are still desiderata, but there are indications of an improvement in both these directions. Whether, with all these promises of a great future, Australia will merit its title of "God's own country" depends on its men. The nation is still in the crucible. Saxon and Celt, Teuton and Scandinavian have contributed the main elements of that seething mass—the first two in great preponderance. What will emerge is in the lap of the gods. We see but indications.

The up-country worker, be he boss or "hand," gives one side of the medal; the easy-going, pleasure-loving harbour-lounger another. There is a strange mixture of fierce independence and the habit of "leaning"—be it against a wall or a Government. One can trace the beginnings of an indigenous art and literature and a nascent interest in the spiritual world. Perhaps the least auspicious symptoms are an insane lust of pleasure and a Gallio-like mood, fostered by languorous suns. This tepid temper emerges in the characteristic answer of the Australian school-boy, who, on being asked which he preferred, Puritan or Cavalier, admitted that the Puritans were altogether too religious, but added, with calm objectivity, that he guessed even that was better than too much drink.

Certain it is that Australia's greatest and most immediate need is more population. It is hard to realise, indeed, that the present population of all Australia is less than that of London. And, whatever else may go to the shaping of the Australia that is to be, her future depends very largely on the kind of human material the Mother-country will contribute to her fabric within this generation.

"ONCE, MY PLAYMATE."

A Japanese Child-Versé.

RIYOSHI was my greatest friend,

But now he never comes to me;

Yet when I go my nets to mend

I hear him calling, out at sea.

So when the waves come up the bay

I tell them all about my fun,

And whisper secrets every day;

The waves run back when I have done.

And sometimes, when I'm gone to bed,

The waves bring secrets back to me,

And tell me what Riyoshi said,

And how he always waits for me.

AUSTIN PRIESTMAN.

ARNOLD BENNETT * * * BY RICHARD CURLE

I.

WHENEVER I take up one of Mr. Bennett's novels I feel at once the enormous sense of relief which comes from the knowledge that one won't be bothered by some fevered ethical problem. For Mr. Bennett has not this passion for reforming the world which has seized hold of so many of our best writers. His view of the novel is really a much wider one. In his hands it actually is a great slice of existence. He is not there to prove a case, to show up something or other, to preach in the guise of fiction; he is there to unroll the mysterious and trivial lives of ordinary people. In his three most famous works, "The Old Wives' Tale," "Clayhanger," and "Hilda Lessways," this realistic, impersonal, unexaggerated method becomes very impressive. One just seems to be watching familiar figures passing through the long years of their rather futile and weary lives. The illusion is so powerful as to be almost mesmeric. The air of genuine reality is astonishingly convincing. It's not so much that the people themselves are real (they are, but not overwhelmingly) as that the whole thing is so real, so perfectly balanced, such a complete structure of even and tireless imagination. I think that one is apt to accept all this in Mr. Bennett's work too much as a matter of course. It's so obviously sound that one is inclined just to say, "That's precisely the sort of life these people would live," without realising how very remarkable is the art that can induce this feeling of certainty.

II.

For Mr. Bennett conceals himself with rare cunning. His work is seldom tuned to a higher key than that of balanced narrative. He avoids purple patches, all showing of himself, all philosophic outbursts. And yet he deals with the hidden secrets of the heart. Much more does he resemble Balzac than Dumas. As a story-teller, pure and simple, he can be very effective (witness such a book as "Buried Alive"); but in his finest work he is something much grander—the designer of prose epics. For this is his foremost quality, that his great novels read like epics. They cover all the years of life, all the changes, all the history. In his canvasses people appear and die out, people grow old, people are born, and with it all one sees ever the unchanging face of time. There appears no valid reason why a novel by Mr. Bennett should not cover a hundred years and twenty thousand pages. If it did, I'm certain it wouldn't cease to be absorbing, just because I'm certain that life itself wouldn't cease to be absorbing.

III.

And Mr. Bennett is not a mere humdrum observer. He is far too taken up with life to be that. He writes with assured vivacity, with intense zest, and he makes us understand things through the glow of his own comprehension. His books, in spite of their subdued tones and their moderation, are nevertheless tonics against ennui. For he causes very commonplace affairs, very usual people, to be exciting. It's easy enough to make the South Sea Islands thrilling, but it's not so easy to make the Potteries thrilling. But that's what Mr. Bennett has accomplished, and there lies one of his triumphs. Who can read about old Mr. Shushions, about Clayhanger's love affair, about Sophia's desertion, about Sarah Gailey's illness, about Hilda's awakening, without feeling moved? These are just random examples. And it is not only the personality of the people; it is the personality of the place. That curious atmosphere of the Five Towns is a creation—one is sensible of its dogged, old-fashioned, "canny," sordid spirit—a hard atmosphere, but deeply individual.

IV.

Perhaps it is a mistake to dwell so long on these three books, considering the vast body of Mr. Bennett's other work. For he must be the author of something like forty volumes. He, himself, divides his work into novels, fantasias, short stories, belles-lettres, drama—a formidable list. Some of it is on a distinguished level and some of it is not; but all of it has been dimmed more or less (dimmed in a literary sense, though probably not in a commercial one) by the shining brightness of his three masterpieces. A comparatively unknown work like "Leonora," for instance, is really a capital novel, and would have made for most people a considerable and deserved reputation. And then there are such books as "Anna of the Five Towns," "The Card," and so on. . . .

As a critic, Mr. Bennett, it is well known, used to write week after week in the New Age, under the pseudonym of "Jacob Tonson." His criticisms were particularly just, perspicacious, and unfanatical, although, in my opinion, he was now and then carried too far by the glamour of the ultra-modern. This lack of fanaticism is, of course, obvious in all that he does. He is that scarce and valuable thing, an original man without cranks. All his work is irradiated by a splendid sanity. And thus in his criticism one always knew what to expect—freedom from the stupidities of convention, and, generally speaking, a vital appreciation of literature. If only someone could induce Mr. Bennett to republish a selection of these New Age papers he would be doing a service.

V.

A minute ago I was mentioning the name of Balzac, and really one might institute a suggestive comparison between Balzac and Mr. Bennett. For there is affinity between them, though I daresay it wouldn't stand too precise an analysis. It's the affinity of a sort of universal inquisitiveness in regard to life, and of a colossal, concrete energy. Mr. Bennett's attitude to his characters is, in some ways, very like that of Balzac. Both men give one the impression of being interested in their creations to an extent far beyond any mere literary interest. One can easily picture Mr. Bennett wishing to consult Clayhanger on some point or other, just as one can realise how natural it was for Balzac to murmur on his death-bed that he would have been saved had a certain doctor of his novels been present. This unfeigned interest in their creations is one of the chief reasons that render the novels of Balzac and of Mr. Bennett so engrossingly and so intimately alive.

VI.

And, like Balzac, Mr. Bennett is a realist of a type that is romantic without being at all poetical—a man-of-the-world attitude not too common amongst authors. Certainly he has not Balzac's teeming brain, and he is not so creative an artist; but, all the same, he approaches much nearer to Balzac in his outlook and in his technique than he does to the Russians for whom he has such enthusiasm. For he has none of the Slavonic melancholy, and his psychology is invariably normal. Like Balzac, he is touched by the prodigality of life without being oppressed by its disasters. He is far more the recorder than the theoriser, far more the studious dissector than the compassionate sympathiser.

"Clayhanger" and "Hilda Lessways" await their sequel, and meanwhile Mr. Bennett has written an entertaining book on the United States, and started a new series of adventures of "the card." One cannot help doubting the wisdom of such unceasing productive energy. There were signs of staleness in "Hilda Lessways." Everyone has to pay the penalty of staggering labour if that labour is quite unremitting. Now that Mr. Bennett's fame is so secure, so well-founded, should he not devote himself entirely to that work in which his highest ability is most evident and most unchallenged?

LITERARY NOTES

NO musician, not even Beethoven, has been written about so much as Richard Wagner, the centenary of whose birth will be auspiciously commemorated next month. The literary cairn to the composer of "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser" is now of formidable proportions. Recently I had occasion to look through the bibliography of Wagner, and was surprised at the number of works bearing upon practically every aspect of his career. Of course, the fact ought not to go unrecorded that Wagner himself bore no small part in the rearing of the cairn. Ten substantial volumes of criticism, all of which have been long available to English readers, and an autobiography which extends to nearly a thousand pages, afford a fair idea of his literary industry.

And this bibliography is by no means closed. English Wagner literature is to receive important additions next month. There is, first of all, a new study of "Wagner: as Man and Artist," by Mr. Ernest Newman, which Messrs. Dent are to publish. Then we are to have a biography from the pen of Mr. John Runciman, with whose trenchant musical criticisms readers of the Saturday Review are familiar. Messrs. Bell will publish the book. Lastly, Mr. G. D. Gribble is bringing out, through Messrs. Everett, "The Master Works of Richard Wagner: a Study of their Plots, Legendary Sources, and Musical Characteristics." I ought to add that Messrs. Smith, Elder have just published "The Ring of the Nibelung of Richard Wagner," a translation of the poem by Randle Fynes which attempts to reproduce the spirit rather than the letter of the original.

"Katharine Tynan," who is now living near her birthplace in Co. Dublin, is announced to have completed a first volume of reminiscences, in which the subject of Home Rule bulks largely. The industry of this gifted poet and popular novelist is really amazing. Her first book, which contained verse, was published in 1885, and since then she has written about sixty works, mostly novels, which surely gives her an indisputable claim to be regarded as the most prolific among British women writers. Andrew Lang wrote about the same number of volumes, but he was as versatile as he was industrious.

There has been quite a record demand for Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's new book, "Social Environment and Moral Progress." I am not surprised, for not only has the author been a close student of social science for many years, and is therefore well entitled to expound it, but he has written the book when verg-ing on the age of ninety. This fact of itself would, I imagine, create a demand for the book. Is there another man alive who has written a book at so advanced an age?

* * *

Messrs. Harrap have launched a new series of histories, the first volume of which ("Ancient Greece") is ready. "Great Nations" is the title of the new series, which will endeavour to revive the real life of the past, and show how the great men and women of other ages still deeply influence the present by their deeds and thoughts. Political and military events will receive their proper place and proportions in the structural framework, but more attention will be given to great achievements in art, literature, science, and other civilising influences. Each volume will run to about 450 pages, and will be sold at 7s. 6d. net.

* * *

We are shortly to have a biography of Matthew Gregory Lewis, better known as "Monk Lewis," a sobriquet earned by a rather unsavoury romance, "Ambrosio; or, the Monk," which was published in 1795, when the author was only twenty. Lewis's career ought to provide first-class biographical material. He met Goethe at Weimar, was the friend of Byron, Shelley, and Scott, and wrote many sensational plays and novels. Then he entered Parliament, made two voyages to the West Indies, and became the owner of two large estates in Jamaica. He died in 1818 of yellow fever in the Gulf of Florida, and was buried at sea. Lewis's "Life and Correspondence" was published in 1839, and is long out of print. There is room, therefore, for a new biography.

* * *

Messrs. Sampson Low announce a work which promises to be rather interesting. It is entitled "Major Greville, V.C.: a Tale of the Great Boer War," and has been written by Senator G. G. Munink, a Boer who fought against Great Britain, and was taken prisoner. He was even reported to have lost his life at Elandsлагте. Lord Selborne and other eminent men have read the manuscript, and express warm approval of the novel, the most striking chapters of which are said to be those in which the author describes, from the Boer side, the fiercest battles in the war.

* * *

Next month will witness the issue of the first number of a new literary and artistic monthly. The Blue Review will be edited by Mr. Middleton Murry, who has gathered round him some able contributors. Mr. Gilbert Cannan, Mr. Frank Swinnerton, and Mr. Hugh Walpole are to be associated with the literary side of the journal. Artistic criticism will be in the hands of Mr. Albert Rothenstein, and Mr. Edward J. Dent will be responsible for the musical criticism. Mr. Martin Secker will publish the journal, which, I trust, will have a prosperous career.

* * *

A work which will assist writers and public speakers who are often at a loss for the exact word to use is always sure of a welcome. Something of the kind has been brought out by Messrs. Putnam. "Synonyms, Autonyms, and Associated Words" is a manual of reference which ought to afford practical guidance in the expression of ideas through the use of an exact and varied vocabulary. Mr. Louis A. Flemming, the compiler, has contrived to arrange the contents so that by turning to the word that one thinks of first, it is possible to find almost instantly any word that may be desired.

X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S "JANE EYRE" *

THE publication of "Jane Eyre" dates a new era in literature. The leading fictionists of the 'forties had tabooed uncovenanted love from the master motives of the English novel. The plot was cribbed, cabin'd, and confined until Charlotte Brontë took possession of the reading world with a whirlwind. The little governess, who had lived the greater part of her life in the lonely parsonage of Haworth, surrounded by the wide and lonely stretch of moorland that swept right up to the village, as if resenting the encroachment of mankind upon its solitudes, produced a work of fiction unique and challenging; a work that owed its inspiration to none of the founts of literary greatness, that launched a challenge in the world, flung down a gauntlet that has proved the herald of innumerable fights.

Charlotte Brontë was the first novelist who dared to portray the force of passion in a woman, strong and unafraid, pure and unashamed. The very strength of Jane's love for Rochester convinces one from the moment suspicion first enters the mind as to the identity of the woman hidden in the locked room, that, though she loves him, she will not yield to him. When the inevitable moment of discovery is reached, and suspicion is realised in the fact that the secret woman is Rochester's wife, Jane justifies our faith, and though her heart breaks she will not allow the issue between right and wrong for a moment to confuse her judgment. The medium the author chose for the portraiture of passion was an insignificant little creature, insignificant from a physical standpoint, but with an incomparable vividness of spirit, vitality of character, and unconquerable will. It is the triumph of character, the vindication of that aristocracy of temperament that is the salt of humanity.

The book was greeted with a storm of execration, Charlotte was accused of an attempt to undermine morality, and the relations between Rochester and Jane were hotly canvassed. But the innate power of genius surmounted in triumph all obstacles, and "Jane Eyre," in face of the masterpieces with which it was contemporary, scored a success which remains unimpaired to this day.

But it is not in the portrayal of passion alone, in the protest of woman's right to feel and to express the strongest and most potent of emotions, that Charlotte Brontë is remarkable. Her presentment of the suffering of Jane, the imaginative, highly strung child of intense nervous susceptibility under the rule of Mrs. Reed, is a revelation of child psychology. Nowhere else do we find such an intimate knowledge of the power the "terror that walks in darkness" exercises over a young mind. Take the inimitable description of Jane's sufferings when, by order of her aunt, she is locked in the red room as punishment for her contumacy in resenting the tyranny of her cousins, John and Eliza.

"Daylight began to forsake the red room; it was past four o'clock, and the beclouded afternoon was tending to drear twilight. I heard the rain still beating continuously on the staircase window, and the wind howling in the grove behind the hall; I grew by degrees cold as a stone, and then my courage sank. . . . And now, as I sat looking at the white bed and overshadowed walls—occasionally also turning a fascinated eye towards a dimly gleaming mirror—I began to recall what I had heard of dead men . . . revisiting the earth to punish the perjured and revenge the oppressed; . . . my heart beat thick, my head grew hot; a sound filled my ears which I deemed the rushing of wings: something seemed near me; I rushed to the door and shook the lock in desperate effort."

It will be remembered that Bessie, the kindly nursemaid, hurries to Jane and unlocked the door. Mrs. Reed—the embodiment of our childish belief of ogres and their desperate power—thrust the child back into the haunted chamber, and the little creature, engulfed in a sea of icy terror, falls into a fit.

The author is not always in a tense mood; she occasionally relaxes, and, with a quiet humour that finds its fullest expression in the characters of the inimitable curates in "Shirley," falls into a lighter vein. There is bitter satire as well as humour in the sketch of Mr. Brocklehurst. Take the memorable interview between him and poor Jane:

"Do you say your prayers night and morning?" continued my interrogator.

"Yes, sir."

"Do you read your Bible?"

"Sometimes."

"With pleasure? Are you fond of it?"

"I like Revelation, and the Book of Daniel, and Genesis and Samuel, and a little bit of Exodus, and some parts of Kings and Chronicles, and Job and Jonah."

One can see the small child, with the grave face and earnest eyes, quietly studying the man with the large features and pompous soul.

"And the Psalms? I hope you like them?"

"No, sir."

"No? Oh, shocking! I have a little boy, younger than you, who knows six psalms by heart. And when you ask him which he would rather have, a gingerbread nut to eat, or a verse of a psalm to learn, he says: "Oh, the verse of a psalm! Angels sing psalms," says he. "I wish to be a little angel here below"; he then gets two nuts in recompense for his infant piety."

The life at Lowood in the Institute over which "Brocklehurst" is written large wrings the soul. So vivid, so vital is the creation of Jane, that we see her, understand her, agonise over her childish sorrows, rejoice in her simplicity of spirit and warmth of heart that confines such ardent pleasure in the quiet things of life. Rochester, we know, is melodrama pure and simple, but melodrama infused with flashes of reality. His courtship of Jane is relieved by touches of pure comedy, and the proposal in the garden is written with a charm and tenderness that blots out remembrance of stilted sentences and turgid phrases.

"A waft of wind came sweeping down the laurel walk and trembled through the boughs of the chestnuts; it wandered away—away—to an indefinite distance; it died. The nightingale's song was then the only voice of the hour; in listening to it I again wept. Mr. Rochester sat quiet, looking at me gently and seriously. Some time passed before he spoke; he at last said:

"Come to my side, Jane, and let us explain and understand one another."

"I will never again come to your side; I am torn away now, and cannot return."

* Everyman's Library.

"But, Jane, I summon you as my wife; it is you only I intend to marry. . . ."

"You, Jane. I must have you for my own, entirely my own."

Unable to believe him, she questions again and yet again, and, when at last she yields, does so in a passion of surrender.

The culmination of Jane's love, as will be remembered, results in the tragic dénouement upon her wedding morning. The author keeps alive an undercurrent of suspense, winding in and out the thread of the story, the dull, grey thread of tragedy against the glowing colours of romance. And then, at the rails of the altar, where Rochester, daring everything, admitting nothing, has taken the girl he desires more than all else, she learns the truth.

It is on the return of the wedding party when he invites them all—the solicitor, the brother-in-law, and poor Jane herself, to visit the mad woman who is his wife, that Rochester suddenly rises to reality. He is infused with the fire of genius, and stands out for all time as counsel for the defence on the charge of unlawful but consuming passion.

"This is my wife," said he. "Such is the sole conjugal embrace I am ever to know—such are the endearments which are to solace my leisure hours! And this is what I wish to have" (laying his hand on my shoulder): "This young girl, who stands so grave and quiet at the mouth of hell, looking collectedly at the gambols of a demon, . . . look at the difference! Compare these clear eyes with the red balls yonder—this face with that mask—this form with that bulk; then judge me, priest of the Gospel and man of the law, and remember, with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged!"

It is a masterly touch that makes Jane feel no sense of injury or indignation against him. Consumed with misery, doomed to see the ruin of a woman's tenderest hopes, she finds it in her heart to feel for Rochester such a gush of compassion, of tender pity, and healing regret, as washes out the sting of bitterness, and leaves only a vast sorrow behind. Again and again he pleads with her that she is the one woman meant for his wife, advancing every argument and appeal likely to influence her. Each time she repulses him, and finally, unable to bear the strain of conflict any longer, steals away as friendless, and even more penniless than when she entered his house.

Her meeting with Diana and Mary Rivers, and their brother, St. John, is told in a convincing fashion that robs it of any appearance of strained effect; indeed, the most remarkable thing about "Jane Eyre" is that the palpable improbabilities and occasional infringements of taste that occur in the course of the narrative do not seem to matter in the least. The effect of St. John's influence on Jane, the narrowing sense that springs from his personality, the limitations he imposes on her outlook in life are wonderfully suggestive.

But Jane's inherent vitality asserts itself; she breaks away from him and makes her way back to her "master," and discovers he is desolate indeed.

His wife is removed, by a novelist's pardonable licence, having set fire to the hall, and Rochester, true to his character of melodramatic hero, loses his sight in attempting to rescue her. And so the story closes, and Jane finds a home in the heart of the man she has loved.

"I know what it is to live entirely for and with what I love best on earth. I hold myself supremely blessed—blessed beyond what language can express; because I am my husband's life as fully as he is mine.

No woman was ever nearer to her mate than I am: ever more absolutely bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh." And in those poignant words lie the eternal vindication of Jane Eyre—and her author.

PROFESSOR GILBERT MURRAY

GEORGE GILBERT AIMÉ MURRAY was born in 1866 in Sydney, New South Wales, his father, the late Sir Terence Aubrey Murray, being President of the Legislative Council of New South Wales. Leaving Australia at the early age of eleven, he was educated at the Merchant Taylor's School, London, and entered St. John's College, Oxford, where he had a distinguished student career. He was elected Fellow of New College in 1888, and a year after appointed Professor of Greek at the University of Glasgow. In 1908 he became Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford, an appointment he still holds.

Professor Murray soon made his mark as a writer of rare and individual insight bottomed in consummate scholarship. His earliest work, "A History of Ancient Greek Literature," was followed by two plays—"Carlyon Sahib" and "Andromeda"—both published and acted. Joint author of "Liberalism and the Empire," he soon returned to his first love, and gave us a succession of characteristically "live" translations of Greek dramas, most, if not all, of which were staged in due course, mainly at the Court Theatre. The present writer remembers an accomplished and meticulous Greek scholar, who could "taste" the subtle gradations of the original, going as near enthusiasm as a somewhat cold and phlegmatic habit would allow him in his appreciations of Professor Murray's Englishing of the "Hippolytus" and "Bacchæ."

But it is with his "Rise of the Greek Epic," now in its second edition, and his latest book, "Four Stages of Greek Religion," that Professor Murray has gripped the larger public; not, indeed, by "playing down" to it, but by seizing upon the universal and human in the world of Greek thought and culture. In brief, his books are alive, and life must ever call to life. He gives us not the glory that was Greece, but the glory by which Greece still lives, and which, in dying, she bequeathed to her conquerors. Professor Murray writes out of a sensitive and recreating imagination, flashing a penetrative light into those dark caverns of Greek life which the torch of mere index-learning cannot reach. He tells us that his "Four Stages of Greek Religion" aims largely at the "filling of interstices" left dark by other interpreters; but how much does such a filling of interstices contribute to the understanding of the whole? A mere brief flash—a single, vital phrase, perhaps—and a whole continent of obscure interpretation lies open to the light. Nowhere is this luciferous quality so apparent as in Professor Murray's treatment of the Hellenistic age—that age of sick disillusionment and "failure of nerve," to use Professor Bury's memorable phrase, when the Greek soul, bankrupt of its Olympians, sought blind and desperate alliances with every form of emotional mysticism. Compared to the feat of vitalising this blank and sterile period, the handling of the final struggle between Paganism and Christianity is comparatively easy. But here also there is the fresh evocative touch that makes familiar country a new creation. Professor Murray stands as the type of a new scholarship which is not an esoteric professional amusement, but part of the very stuff of life.

E. H.

AN EXCEPTIONAL OPPORTUNITY TO COMMENCE TAKING "PUNCH"

FOR a short time new subscriptions will be accepted on the extremely advantageous terms of SIXTY-FIVE issues of "PUNCH" and the "Punch Almanack" (which ordinarily cost 19s. 6½d. postpaid) for 13s. 6d.

FOR this small payment you will receive for fifteen months all that is best in humorous journalism—the best jokes, the best cartoons, the best black-and-white illustrations, and the most polished and humorous literary work.

The special offer is for a first order only, and is made to induce you to place a commencing order for the regular delivery of the paper.

By taking advantage of the present occasion you will save nearly 50 per cent. on your outlay

USE THIS ORDER FORM TODAY

Order Form

The Secretary, "PUNCH" Office,
10 Bouverie Street, London, E.C.

DEAR SIR,—I accept your Special Offer to New Subscribers, and enclose remittance for 13s. 6d. I am not at present a Subscriber to "PUNCH," and have not been purchasing it regularly from any Newsagent.

Please send the 65 Issues of "PUNCH" and the "PUNCH" ALMANACK for 1914 to my address as under.

Name

Address

If specially desired, arrangements can be made to make the delivery by hand, at the same price, within the ordinary delivery limits of any Book-stall or Bookshop.

THE NECKLACE * * * BY GUY DE MAUPASSANT

SHE was one of those pretty and charming girls, born, as if by an error of destiny, into a working-class family. She had no dowry, no expectations, and allowed herself to be married to a petty clerk in the Office of Public Education.

Not being able to adorn herself, she was plainly dressed, and as unhappy as one out of her element, for women have neither caste nor family, their beauty, their grace, and their charm making up for birth and parentage. Their natural delicacy, their instinctive elegance, their vivacity of spirit, are their only criterion, and this makes the daughters of the people the equals of the grandest ladies.

She suffered continually, feeling herself born for every delicacy and luxury. She suffered from the shabbiness of her home, the bareness of the walls, the worn chairs, the ugliness of the upholstery. All these things, which another woman in her station would not even have noticed, tortured and annoyed her. The sight of the little Breton girl who cleaned her small house awakened in her vain regrets and lost dreams. She dreamt of silent halls carpeted with Eastern rugs, and lighted with tall bronze candelabra, and two tall footmen in knee-breeches dozing in two large arm-chairs, drowsy with the warmth of the stove. She dreamt of spacious drawing-rooms upholstered in old silk, of fine cabinets containing the choicest bric-à-brac, and of elegant little perfumed rooms suitable for five o'clock gossip with the most intimate friends.

When she sat down to dinner at the round table, with a cloth three days old, opposite her husband, who uncovered the tureen, declaring delightedly, "Ah! What good soup! I know nothing better than that," she would dream of fine dinners, with glittering plate, and tapestries peopling the walls with ancient personages, and strange birds in the midst of a forest in fairyland; she would dream of exquisite dishes served in beautiful vessels.

She had no dresses, no trinkets, nothing. And she loved but those; felt she was made for them. She had a rich friend, a convent companion, whom she no longer visited, as she suffered so much on her return. She would cry the whole day, of chagrin, regret, despair, and sorrow.

Now, one evening her husband returned home, highly elated, holding a large envelope in his hand.

"See," said he, "here is something for you."

She quickly tore the paper and drew out a printed card, which bore these words:—

"The Minister of Public Education and Mme. Georges Ramponneau request the pleasure of M. and Mme. Loisèl's company on the evening of Monday, 18th January, at the Minister's residence."

Instead of being delighted, as her husband had hoped, she threw the invitation spitefully on the table, muttering:

"What do you think I can do with that?"

"But, my dear, I thought you would have been pleased. You never go out, and this is really a splendid chance for you. I have had a lot of trouble to get it. Everybody wants an invitation; it is very select, and it is not every clerk who gets one. The whole official world will be there."

She looked at him angrily, and declared with impatience:

"What have I to put on my back that I could go there with?"

He had not thought of this, and stammered:

"There's the dress with which you go to the theatre. It seems very nice. I—"

He stopped, astonished and bewildered at seeing her crying. Two large tears rolled slowly down from the corners of her eyes to the corners of her mouth. He stammered:

"What's wrong? What's wrong?"

Then, with a strong effort, having conquered her feelings, she replied, in a calm voice, while drying her cheeks:

"Nothing. Only I have no dress, and, consequently, do not wish to go to this entertainment. Give the card to some friend whose wife is better dressed than I am."

He was grieved, and continued:

"Let us see, Matilda. How much would it cost to get a suitable dress, one that could also be used on other occasions; something nice and simple?"

She thought for a few seconds, calculating and thinking of a sum she could ask without risking an immediate refusal and a startled exclamation from the economical clerk.

At length she answered, hesitatingly:

"I do not know exactly, but I think that with 400 francs I might manage."

He paled a little, for he had reserved exactly this sum to buy a gun and make up a sporting party among some friends who were going to shoot larks on the plain at Nanterre.

Nevertheless, he said:

"Good. I shall give you the 400 francs. But you must get a really pretty dress."

The day of the ball drew near, and Madame Loisèl seemed sad, uneasy, and anxious. Her dress, nevertheless, was ready. Her husband said to her one evening:

"What's wrong? You have been quite strange these last three days."

And she replied:

"I'm annoyed at having no jewellery, not a stone, nothing to wear. I shall have such a poor appearance. I almost wish I were not going to that party."

Then he said:

"But you can wear some natural flowers. They are very smart at this season. For ten francs you could get two or three magnificent roses."

She was not, however, convinced.

"No. There is nothing more humiliating than to have a poor appearance among rich women."

Then her husband cried:

"But you are stupid! Why not go to Madame Forrestier and ask her to lend you some jewellery? You know her well enough to take such a liberty."

She gave a cry of joy.

"That's true. I had not thought of that."

On the morrow she visited her friend and related her distress.

Madame Forrestier went to her wardrobe, took out a large box, brought it, and opened it, saying to Madame Loisèl:

"Choose, my dear."

She looked first at some bracelets, then at a rope of pearls, then at a Venetian cross of gold and stones of exquisite workmanship.

She tried on the ornaments in front of the mirror, hesitatingly, not being able to decide which to take, which to leave, always asking again:

"Have you nothing else?"

"Yes. Look for yourself. I do not know exactly what will please you."

All at once she discovered in a box of black satin a superb diamond necklace, and her heart began to beat violently. Her hands trembled as she took it. She put it around her neck on the top of her dress, and looked at herself in ecstasy.

Then she asked, hesitatingly, full of dread:

"Could you lend me that? It would do alone."

"Oh, yes; certainly."

She fell on her friend's neck and kissed her effusively, then went off with her treasure.

The day of the party arrived. Madame Loisël was a great success. She was the prettiest of all, elegant, graceful, smiling, and transported with joy. Everyone admired her. The Minister took notice of her.

She danced enthusiastically, passionately, intoxicated with the pleasure of it, no longer thinking of anything in the triumph of her beauty, in the glory of her success, in a sort of mist of happiness created by all this homage, all this admiration.

She left about four in the morning. Her husband, since midnight, had been dozing in a small drawing-room with three other gentlemen whose wives were also enjoying themselves.

He threw the wraps which he had brought for her departure over her shoulders—plain garments of everyday life, the poorness of which contrasted with the elegance of the ball dress. She felt this, and wished to hurry away, in order not to be noticed by the other women, who were wrapped in rich furs.

Loisël stopped her.

"Wait now. You will catch cold outside. I am going to call a cab."

But she would not listen, and went quickly down the staircase. When they had reached the street he could not find a cab, and they went to look for one, calling after the cabmen who were passing at a distance.

They went down towards the Seine, despairing and shivering with cold. At last, on the embankment, they found one of those old growlers that are never seen in Paris until night comes, as if they were ashamed of their wretchedness during the day.

It conducted them to, their door, in the rue des Martyrs, and they mounted sadly to their home. For her it was ended. And he was thinking of the fact that he must be at the office at nine o'clock.

She took off the cloak that covered her shoulders before the glass in order once again to see herself in her glory. But suddenly she uttered a cry. She had no longer the necklace around her neck.

Her husband asked:

"What is it that's wrong?"

She turned towards him distracted.

"I have—I have—I have lost Madame Forrestier's necklace."

He jumped up dismayed.

"What! How? It isn't possible!"

They searched in the folds of the dress, in the folds of the cloak, in the pockets, everywhere. They could not find it anywhere.

He asked:

"Are you quite sure you had it when you left the ball?"

"Yes. I felt it in the vestibule of the residence."

"But if you had lost it in the street we would have heard it fall. It must be in the cab."

"Yes. That's probable. Did you take the number?"

"No. And you, did you notice it?"

"No."

They looked at each other dejectedly. At last Loisël said:

"I shall go over the road we came on foot and see if I cannot find it."

He went out. She remained in her ball dress, without strength to lie down, sitting dully on a chair, spiritless and unable to think.

Her husband returned about seven o'clock. He had found nothing.

He went to the police office, to the newspapers in order to offer a reward, to the cab companies' offices, everywhere that one could think of.

She remained the whole day in the same state of collapse caused by this fearful catastrophe.

Loisël returned in the evening with a pale, drawn face; he had discovered nothing.

"We must," said he, "write your friend that you have broken the clasp of the necklace, and that we are having it repaired. That will give us time to get it back again."

She wrote to his dictation.

At the end of the week they had lost all hope.

And Loisël, aged by five years, declared:

"We must think how we can replace this necklace."

The next day they took the box that had enclosed it and went to the jeweller whose name was inside.

He consulted his books.

"It was not I, madame, who sold this necklace; I merely furnished the case."

Then they went from jeweller to jeweller, searching for a similar necklace to the other, racking their brains, both sick with sorrow and anguish.

They found, in a shop in the Palais Royal, a necklace of diamonds that seemed to them exactly the same as that for which they were searching. It was priced at 40,000 francs. They could have it for 36,000.

They asked the jeweller not to part with it for three days. And they made it a condition that he would take it back for 34,000 francs if the other were found before the end of February.

Loisël possessed 18,000 francs that his father had left him. He borrowed the remainder.

He borrowed, asking a thousand francs from one, five hundred from another, five louis from this one, three louis from that one. He granted bills, made ruinous pledges, and did business with usurers of all descriptions. He mortgaged the whole course of his existence, risked his signature, without knowing even if he could honour it, and, haunted with nightmare of the future, by the dark misery that was going to fall on him, by the prospect of all the physical privations and all the mental tortures, he went to fetch the new necklace, depositing 36,000 francs on the jeweller's counter.

When Madame Loisël took back the necklace to Madame Forrestier, the latter said to her in an icy tone:

"You might have brought it back sooner. I might have needed it myself."

She did not, however, open the case, as her friend had dreaded. If she had noticed the substitution what would she have thought? What would she have said? Would she not have taken her for a thief?

Madame Loisël now knew what it was to lead a penurious life. She took up her part, nevertheless, at once heroically. This terrible debt must be paid. She would pay it. They dispensed with the maid and changed their house, taking an attic under the roofs.

Of all Booksellers, or from
SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD.,
 1, AMEN CORNER, LONDON, E.C.

WHO'S WHO IN MUSIC. A BIOGRAPHICAL RECORD OF CONTEMPORARY MUSICIANS.
 Compiled and Edited by H. SAXE WYNDHAM and GEOFFREY L'EPINE. Large cr. 8vo, cloth, 6s. net;
 Leather, 8s. 6d. net.

This first edition of the work contains about 1,000 biographies of the leading British, American, Continental, and Colonial Musicians, including Concert and Opera Singers, Concert Agonists, Critics, Managers, with detailed accounts of their careers. There are many other features of interest and value.

MRS. GASKELL: HAUNTS, HOMES, AND STORIES.
 By Mrs. ELLIS H. CHADWICK. New and Cheaper
 Edition, with additions and some new illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 33 illustrations, 5s. net.

This new edition has been brought up to date, and all available information regarding the author of "Cranford" has been included. This is the first and only biography of one of the greatest and most famous of Victorian novelists.

THE EMPIRE OF INDIA.
 By Sir BAMPFYLDE FULLER, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., formerly Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, with 26 full-page plate illustrations and map. 7s 6d. net. Uniform with other volumes in the "ALL RED" Series on AUSTRALIA, by the Hon. B. R. Wise; NEW ZEALAND, by Sir Arthur P. Douglas, Bart.; CANADA, by W. L. Griffith; SOUTH AFRICA, by W. Basil Worsfold; and THE BRITISH WEST INDIES, by A. E. Aspinall.

THE IMMOVABLE EAST. STUDIES OF THE PEOPLE AND CUSTOMS OF PALESTINE.

By PHILIP J. BALDENSPERGER. With Biographical Introduction by FREDERIC LEES. With 24 full-page plate illustrations and map.
 7s. 4d. net.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS,
 Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc. 6s.

Times.—"There is breathless excitement and fun in the tale. The chapter telling how Tamburlaine carries his half-dead master all the way from Dublin to Ardhoroe without a rest is full of a tremendous galloping movement that is over-mastering."

Manchester Guardian.—"The real hero, Tamburlaine, is not a man but a horse, quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted."

DAISY DARLEY;

or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily News.—"A clever, attractive book. Mr. Ryan has made a genuine success in his delightful sketches of the subsidiary characters."

THE LOST MAMELUKE (SHORTLY).

By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

A thrilling, vigorous narrative of Egypt in the days of the Mameluke ascendancy.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

She became acquainted with the rough work of the house, the odious drudgery of the kitchen. She washed the dishes, wearing her pink nails on the greasy pots and bottoms of the saucepans. She washed the dirty linen, the shirts and the dusters, and put them out on the line to dry. She went down to the street each morning with the dust-bin, and carried up the water, stopping at each landing to take a breath. And, dressed like a working woman, with a basket on her arm, she went marketing, to the fruiterer, the grocer, and the butcher, husbanding, sou by sou, her wretched income.

It was necessary to meet bills every month, renew others, and to obtain extensions.

Her husband worked in the evenings, making out accounts for a tradesman, and often at night he would do copying work for five sous a page.

This life lasted for ten years.

At the end of ten years they had paid up everything, including the charge for interest and the accumulation of super-interest.

Madame Loisël had now an aged appearance. With the household drudgery she had become a strong, hard, rough woman. Unkempt, with rough hands and her skirts tucked up, and speaking loudly, she would wash the floors. Sometimes, when her husband was at the office, she would sit at the window and dream of that evening at the ball, when she had been so beautiful and so admired.

Now, one Sunday, when she had gone for a walk in the Champs Elysées for a change after the drudgery of the week, she noticed, all at once, a woman who was taking a child for a walk. It was Madame Forrestier, still young, still beautiful, still attractive.

Madame Loisël felt moved. Would she speak to her? Yes, certainly. Now that she had paid everything, she could tell her all about it. Why not?

She approached her.

"Good morning, Jeanne."

The other did not recognise her, and, astonished at being addressed thus familiarly by this common-looking woman, stammered:

"But—madame—I do not know you. . . . You must be mistaken."

"No. I'm Matilda Loisël."

Her friend uttered a cry.

"Oh! My poor Matilda, how you are changed! . . ."

"Yes, I have had hard times since I saw you last, and, really, it was all on your account."

"My account? . . . How that?"

"You will remember the diamond necklace you lent me to go to the Minister's ball?"

"Yes; what about it?"

"Well, I lost it."

"What! I'm sure you brought it back to me."

"I really brought back another one exactly the same. And we have been paying for it these ten years. You can understand that for us, who have nothing, this was not an easy matter. . . . At last it's finished, and I'm thankful it's done with."

Madame Forrestier stopped.

"You say you bought a diamond necklace to replace mine?"

"Yes. You never noticed it, then; they were so exactly the same."

And she smiled with pleasure and pride.

Madame Forrestier, greatly moved, took her by both hands.

"Oh! My poor Matilda! But mine were imitation. They were worth at most five hundred francs!"

CORRESPONDENCE

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?
To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent Mr. Hubert Bland, in his article on "The Degeneration of the Human Brain," seems to assume that intellect is evolutionary and cumulative, and says that if "most clever men married clever women . . . something would be done towards the increase of brain-power, both in quantity and quality." This is not so. However clever the child of a genius may be, it can never reach the intellectual height of its parent. As a proof of this statement we find that the world's geniuses have sprung from common or normal stock in nearly all cases, and that while their children have in nearly all cases been clever, and even experts in a particular line, yet they have never displayed the genius of their parents.

Hereditary, certainly, genius may be, but not cumulative.—I am, sir, etc., W. H. DARRACOTT.

Walthamstow, E., April 11th, 1913.

WAS EURIPIDES A WOMAN-HATER?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As a student of criticisms of Euripides, may I be allowed to quote some opinions which contradict Prof. Phillimore's conception of Euripides' teaching concerning women? For instance, the head master of the King's School, Ely, E. H. Blakeney, who was a distinguished Greek scholar, says, in his preface to "Alcestis": "Euripides has been called a woman-hater, perhaps with some show of reason. But, after all, one may take leave now and then to doubt the poet's own sincerity in this regard, while, in many instances, much of his invective is due to rhetorical exaggerations, dramatic necessity, or the circumstances of the play. It is, of course, obviously unfair and unjust to accredit a dramatic poet with the sentiments of his characters."

The comment of Sophocles on the statement that Euripides hated women was, "In his tragedies, yes. Certain it is that, woman-hater or no woman-hater, scarcely any poet has drawn pure, self-sacrificing, affectionate women with truer grace or simpler tenderness than the author of the 'Alcestis' and the 'Iphigenia.'"—I am, sir, etc., L. J. HENRY.

Salford.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Priestman deplores the condition of our elementary education, and quite rightly, too, for who, after carefully considering the returns for all the output on the part of educationists throughout the country, can feel satisfied? He declares that "the only path to social or any other regeneration" lies in the education of our children. Here I quite agree with Dr. Priestman, but is his suggested curriculum at all likely to sweep away the defects of present-day schemes? Is such a curriculum at all likely to bring about the much-desired social regeneration? He claims that the characteristics of every child can alone be satisfied by the "spontaneous song, dance, and dramatic action." Of course, the characteristics of every child should be satisfied, but surely a school education, stretching over a period of nine years, ought to do something more for a child than satisfy his characteristics; and something more can be done without turning Standard I. or any other standard into a "prison house."

The Best of the World's Books

SEND A POSTCARD for any of the following:—

200-PAGE CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, English and Foreign,
in all classes of Literature at GREAT
REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

SELECTED AND CLASSIFIED LIST (144 pp.) OF

THE BEST BOOKS

On all subjects, at the Lowest Cash Prices.

CATALOGUE OF

THE NEWEST BOOKS

Arranged under subjects and offered at the Lowest Prices charged by any bookseller.

A New List of Six-Shilling NOVELS

By the Best Writers,

From 1/- each.

All Books Delivered Free in London & Suburbs.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

THE LARGEST BOOKSHOP IN THE WORLD.

First in 1847—Foremost in 1913.

Bohn's Popular Library

The pioneer Series of Cheap Reprints in new and distinctive format.

One Shilling Net

First list of 20 Volumes. Just published. At all Booksellers.

Strongly bound in cloth.

1. Swift (J.)—Gulliver's Travels.
- 2-4. Motley (J. L.)—Rise of the Dutch Republic.
- 5-6. Emerson (R. W.)—Works: Vol. I.—Essays and Representative Men.
Vol. II.—English Traits, Nature, and Conduct of Life.
- 7-8. Burton (Sir R.)—Pilgrimage to Al-madinah and Mecca.
9. Lamb (C.)—Essays.
10. Hooper (G.)—Waterloo: The Downfall of the First Napoleon.
11. Fielding (H.)—Joseph Andrews.
- 12-13. Cervantes—Don Quixote.
14. Calverley (C. S.)—The Idylls of Theocritus, with the Eclogues of Virgil.
15. Burney (F.)—Evelina.
16. Coleridge (S. T.)—Aids to Reflection.
- 17-18. Goethe—Poetry and Truth from my own Life.
19. Ebers' Egyptian Princess.
20. Young's Travels in France.

Write to-day for a copy of the prospectus containing a history of the famous Bohn's Libraries from their inauguration to the present day.

G. BELL AND SONS, LTD
Portugal Street, London, W.C.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL. By AUGUSTIN FILON. Royal 8vo. With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 15s. net.

WILHELM MEISTER'S THEATRICAL MISSION. By GOETHE. Translation of Goethe's lost MS., only recently discovered. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A SURVEY OF THE WOMAN PROBLEM. From the German of ROSA MAYREDER by H. SCHEFFAUER. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

NEWEST NOVELS 6s.

THE LIFE MASK. By the Author of "He Who Passed"

THE WEAKER VESSEL - - - E. F. Benson

GROWING PAINS - - - - - Ivy Low

GUTTER BABIES (Illustrated by Lady Stanley)

Dorothea Slade

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO? (2nd Imp.) Elizabeth Robins

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY

Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D.

A SERIES OF GREEK AND LATIN TEXTS, WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION ON THE OPPOSITE PAGE.

Mr. Heinemann begs to announce the publication, this week, of 5 new volumes:

(1) THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS II. (2) APPIAN III.
(3) JULIAN I. (4) SOPHOCLES II. (5) QUINTUS SMYRNAEUS.

Full particulars post free on application to Sec., Room J.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 publishers and periodicals at highest prices. You write—We sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic, Original, Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

THE LITERARY MONTHLY: A Journal of Life and Letters. Price 2d. everywhere, or 3d. post free from editorial office, 8, Broad Court Chambers, Bow Street, London, W.C. April issue contains a brilliant study of contemporary French literature, by Harold Butterworth; a pen picture of Winchester, and usual features.

"A PIECE OF NEW CLOTH. A story of Christian Socialism, by James Adderley. Cloth, 1/- net. "Of deep interest to all who have the social problem at heart, and particularly well calculated to provoke thought in those whose social conscience is still dormant."—Homiletic Review. HUNTER & LONGHURST, 9, Paternoster Row.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

You can test our NEW POSTAL LESSONS in

RUSSIAN

For the modest sum of ONE SHILLING.

Send P.O. 1/- and we will send you a wonderful Specimen Lesson, with details of all Correspondence Courses.

If you want to learn FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, LATIN or GREEK, you cannot afford to neglect the Eversley System, which is SIMPLE, SCIENTIFIC and INTERESTING.

Write: Director, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

The education suggested by Dr. Priestman would be excellent, provided that the child was to be prepared for what Rousseau would be happy in calling the "State of Nature," but, unfortunately, we are born into a state of highly complex civilisation which makes certain demands from all who enter. If school life is to be of any use to a boy, it must prepare him for the grim struggle he will be compelled to undergo—otherwise it is of little use.

To prepare a boy for complete living is the work of the schools of our country, and consequently a boy ought to leave school, after spending nine years within its walls, capable of applying himself to the work by which he has chosen to earn the wherewithal for living, and also capable of spending his leisure moments with pleasure and profit. To place a boy in this very desirable position, methods of a drill character must be employed at some stage in the process, and many psychologists are agreed that there is a period when drill methods result in very little harm and, I think, considerable good. The period to which I am referring is that just preceding the period of adolescence—the period of stability. This is the period when a boy can undergo a certain amount of drudgery, which, if not mastered at this period, will be wholly neglected, with the lamentable result that the boy will never know the pleasure derivable from most studies after the student has mastered many early and necessary drudging lessons. I am not advocating a period when the child may be treated harshly, for from experience I know that the child, under a sympathetic teacher, can be enjoying school life while, at the same time, he is gaining acquaintance with facts and memorising them, with the result that when he comes to the age of reason he has a foundation of facts (carefully selected) upon which to reason. While we must remember what the child is we must keep in mind what we would have him become.

Finally, sir, why should the school be a veritable fairyland? Ought not boys from eleven to fourteen to be encouraged to apply themselves to the performance of a difficult task? Why should we merely satisfy his characteristics and then turn him into the world? Should we not bridge the gulf between the school and workshop routine? I agree with Dr. Priestman when he condemns rigid routine for lower classes, but certainly think it folly not to encourage a boy, by all the means in our power, to apply himself to a task the completion of which involves many hours of not altogether pleasant labour.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. S.

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The hope that one may look to EVERYMAN for enlightenment on the fundamental questions of the day is confirmed by the article in your last issue on "Enterprise in Business—an Omission in the Socialist Argument." The writer is as clear in his demonstration that enterprise is a quality independent of the present economic system as he is direct in his exposure of some common Socialist sophistries.

Now I have little doubt that among the readers of EVERYMAN there are many to whom the Socialist argument appeals with great effect. Though not yet sufficiently informed to reach a decision, they are strongly influenced, and unless speedily shown where lie its sophistries and fallacies will soon abandon their present state of suspended judgment, throw in their lot with the party of revolution, and do what they can to make its principles and policy prevail. The ordinary denunciations by Conservative and Liberal politicians do not avail against the facile exposition, the evident conviction, and the abounding enthusiasm of Fabian authors and Labour leaders; whilst, if serious argument in favour of the capitalist position exists, it certainly is not greatly in evidence. Very welcome, then, would be the appearance in EVERYMAN of a reasoned statement of the issues, a reduction of the problem to its simplest terms, and a clear presentation of the objections to the Socialist solution.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. A. FINCH.

Birstall, Leeds, March 31st, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I compliment very highly the writer on this subject in your issue of March 28th?

As the head of a large federation of traders, I have for the last fifteen years been drawing attention to the difference that enterprise makes between the active and passive sections of the community; and I thank your contributor for his admirable putting of the case. But when I come to his concluding section, where he attempts to prove that enterprise is compatible with and assisted by Socialism, without informing us what he means by the term, I differ, and I think your contributor differs with himself; and I would like very much to know how he reconciles such statements as "well may the leaders of business be called the captains of industry, and such captains of industry must be prepared to face ruin and bankruptcy in the industrial battle." There is not much of "the security of Socialism" about these expressions.

Then we have an admission that politics and economics may crush enterprise. But is not Socialism more or less a doctrine of economics? And though agreeing that the birth of enterprise is possible, the crushing of it under any Socialism of which we have experience would be inevitable, as the wreckage of all such systems prove. The statement that enterprise has been found compatible with most different political conditions is not to the point. The value of enterprise is mainly that it may become the possession of larger numbers of individuals rather than of a few exceptions. I should not myself call scientific investigation enterprise except under certain conditions; and what is meant by the modern State is not made quite clear. If it refers to present conditions in this country, then there is nothing that I can think of that needs so much the check of business principles, which some may call capitalism, as the enormous increase in local and Imperial taxation that is at present proceeding.

The definition of Socialism given me the other day was that it was really individualism, because every man possessed his own Socialism. But may I suggest that we are all Socialists as well as all individualists; and that both terms represent half-truths intended to balance each other in the steady progress which should be deliberately conducted on the business principle of seeing a net profit when the transaction is completed; not necessarily a profit of increased wealth in all cases, but increased wealth is, no doubt, a compelling object; and for the assurance of attaining that object, your contributor even would change his viewpoint; but the world never has, and probably never will give that assurance. But should it by any possibility—of which history gives no hint—be brought about, the security would mean stagnation, and enterprise, without risk or danger, would cease to have the meaning that your contributor gives to it with such generosity and ability.

—I am, sir, etc.,
S. T. NICHOLSON.

Hull.

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers" scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech";

ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A.
(the well-known Actor),
on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech";

J. L. GRIFFITHS
(U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking";

A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S.
(President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing";

ALBERT CREW
(Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings";

GENERAL EDITOR,
A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law).

But "The Book of Public Speaking" is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World's Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

Lord Rosebery
Lord Beaconsfield
H. H. Asquith
A. J. Balfour
W. E. Gladstone
Sir Edward Clarke
Andrew Lang
D. Lloyd George
Winston Churchill
Mark Twain
Speeßer Leigh Hughes
Sir Henry Irving

Joseph Chamberlain
Max O'Rell
R. Waldo Emerson
Harold Cox
Woodrow Wilson
G. Bernard Shaw
Charles Dickens
John Bright
Chauncey Depew
Sir A. Conan Doyle
Sir Edward Grey
Earl Halsbury

Lord Fisher
Abraham Lincoln
Justin McCarthy
Viscount Milner
M. Poincaré
Whitelaw Reid
Theodore Roosevelt
Philip Snowden
Ian Maclaren
Augustine Birrell
Sir A. W. P. Negro
Etc., etc.

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

FREE BOOKLET.

The Publishers have prepared an interesting Illustrated Booklet—which they will send free—describing the work and their offer to deliver the complete work as published for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

To the CANTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge and without any obligation on my part, full particulars of "The Book of Public Speaking."

Name.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address.....

A NEW CONVERSATION BOOK FOR 1913.
"TIME IS MONEY."

MOTORISTS! TOURISTS! Busy people in general, whose time is money, should not visit France or Italy without immediately procuring a copy of Augusta Ayliffe's Languages for Busy People. 3/6 net. "TIME IS MONEY," 3/6 net.

In French, English, Italian (side by side).

(N.B.—The Italian translation is by Professor Emma Davio, Rome.)

"A practical guide for foreigners without any ridiculous sentences."

—New York Herald, Paris.

"A little book calculated to prove very useful to the English traveller in France and Italy, and vice-versa to natives of these Latin countries in England."

—Daily Mail, Paris.

"Time Is Money" is exceptionally well adapted for the traveller, and for use as a conversational book for students of French, English, or Italian. A most useful section is the pages devoted to the translation of the menu of one of the popular Restaurants Duval in Paris.

Of all Booksellers in France, Italy, England, or direct by post from the Author and Publisher: Augusta Ayliffe, 53 rue d'Amsterdam, Paris; or Augusta Ayliffe, Dursley, Glos. England, for 3/7.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A.

5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverbill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

PLAYS WANTED!—We are being constantly asked, by Managers and Producers, for good Plays and Sketches of every description. Let us submit YOURS. Honourable dealing and lowest fees. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, Strand, W.C.

THE POETRY REVIEW. Edited by STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

Published on the 1st of each month. 6d. net.

The April issue contains:—A Survey of Canadian Poetry, by Bernard Muddiman of Ottawa; The Master: A poetic drama, by W. G. Hole; Matthew Arnold Revalued, by G. Duncan Grey, LL.D.; The Tonic of Byron, by the Editor; A Ballad, by the Duchess of Sutherland, etc., etc., etc.

THE POETRY REVIEW appeals to all interested in Poetry and "The Vanishing Gift." Any difficulty in obtaining copies should be reported, with details, to the Secretary.

THE POETRY SOCIETY, CLUN HOUSE, SURREY STREET, LONDON, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.

SWINBURNE

An Estimate

By

JOHN DRINKWATER

Crown 8vo. 5/- net

MORNING POST: "From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume, passages will be found which will reward a reader, even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

THE CALL OF THE CITIZEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In every article advocating the enfranchisement of women much is made of the fact that women are the mothers of men. My experience is that "the bearers of the men who can and must defend their country" do not care one jot whether they vote or not. It is, generally speaking, those "potential mothers"—who will probably never be mothers, owing to the excess of the female over the male population, selfishness, physical unattractiveness, and other reasons—who are so loud in clamouring for this vital necessity on behalf of their child-bearing sisters!

I am also at a loss to discover the uplifting tendency of woman's influence—so often spoken of by advocates of women's suffrage—in the recent actions of the militant section. More harm is done to innocent, and also poor people, by intercepting their letters (which may contain matter of an urgent nature) than will be counterbalanced by the good that might accrue if women were enfranchised for half a century. It is callous, and it is cowardly. If the militant crusade were an organisation to assist in the suppression of the sweating system, slums, and other evils, it might receive some sympathy; but why is it necessary that women should get the power to vote before they will deign to use their energies in that direction?

It is getting extremely awkward to distinguish between those women who wish to be known as our "equals," and the remainder—fortunately, the majority—who are our superiors, for we do not wish to treat the former class in a different way than our male equals. Let them display their independence and equality, and not cry out that the "mere man" is less polite than he used to be. Apologising for taking up so much of your valuable space, I am, sir, etc.,

VOTER.

Bournemouth.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I agree with "Lumen" that Lady Frances Balfour's article, "The Call of the Citizen," is vitiated by its omission of any reference to Suffragette militancy. He asks whether the militant tactics are due to the greater knowledge and freedom extended to women, and I should like, if I may, to say a few words in reply.

There is a saying that "the appetite grows by what it feeds on," and applying this to the position of women, is it not possible that the greater knowledge extended to them has opened their eyes to visions of wider freedom still ahead? Tired of broken promises and vacillation on the part of Cabinet Ministers, the militants have resorted to attacks upon property in the hope of concentrating public attention upon the question of the extension of the franchise to women, a question which they consider vital to the interests of the community. They must be admitted to have succeeded in this, but at the same time they have brought upon themselves the fury of a large section of the people.

They consider that the social, economic, and political position of women is still very far from being what it should be, and have resorted to their present methods in order to force the pace. Whether their methods will be successful in this time alone can tell, but the Government does appear to be more amenable to such pressure than to the simple justice and logic of a case. Witness the Railway and other strikes. The strikers might have waited until the Greek Kalends to obtain a rise in wages or a settlement of their claims, if they had not caused considerable inconvenience to the public. And the strikers, having the franchise, have not the same excuse as the women.

To ask constitutional Suffragists, who only succeeded in arousing a very mild interest in what had come to be regarded as quite an academic question, until the advent of the militants; to ask them to suppress militancy is to ask of them the impossible. What the Government, with all its resources, and some of them very ugly and barbaric resources, has failed to do, the constitutional Suffragists cannot possibly do. What they can do is to bring pressure to bear upon the Government to introduce a Government measure conferring votes upon women—the one and only way to settle the matter.—I am, sir, etc.,

HENRY LYNCH.

New Southgate, April 9th, 1913.

MODERN FORTRESSES CAPTURED BY ASSAULT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In one of your "Notes of the Week" in the current issue of EVERYMAN you refer to the storming of Adrianople as "the solitary instance of a first-class fortress being carried by assault." I think this is an oversight. Kars, in 1877, ranked as a first-class fortress. It was protected (in addition to older fortifications) by an outlying circle of forts and redoubts planned by European engineers, and the position was, besides, naturally strong. After a brief bombardment with forty-eight guns on November 11th, which produced no effect of importance, the Russians decided to attempt an assault, and successfully stormed the place by moonlight on the night of November 17th. The attack cost them the loss of over 2,000 men.

I think we are all apt to underestimate an earlier exploit coming at the end of a long siege, the successful assault of Sebastopol by the French and English troops. It was impossible to invest the place, and its capture was effected by pushing the trenches close up to the works that were the key of the southern front, and carrying them by storm.—I am, sir, etc.,

London, April 7th, 1913.

A. H. A.

THE TYPIST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read Margaret Hamilton's article on "The Typist" in No. 25 of EVERYMAN, and would hasten to point out one or two flagrant errors therein.

(1) "It is a notable fact," says the writer of this article, "that the average intelligence of the typist is lower than that of factory, shop, or domestic workers." I would like to ask her from whence or whom she has derived this "fact." From some individualist employer (whose name is legion) who requires the maximum amount of brains for the minimum salary? Often the munificent sum of 12s. 6d. a week inclusive of overtime is considered quite a sinecure by these gentlemen. That sum might procure an automaton, but it never will procure brains!

(2) Margaret Hamilton further states that "the faculty of observation is developed in those callings mentioned above, which call for individual enterprise, judgment, and decision. The tapping of a typewriter is neither inspiring nor stimulating; the intelligence of the operator falls into a mechanical groove from which it is with difficulty aroused." I wonder where the average typist would be in these strenuous times who has no "judgment, enterprise, or decision"; when she must perforce take down dictation under

THE ONLY MAGAZINE OF ITS KIND.
SECOND ISSUE NOW READY.

FAITH AND DOUBT

A Magazine of Discussion.
ILLUSTRATED. MONTHLY, PRICE 6d. NET.
(Postage 2½d.)

SOME OF THE CONTENTS OF NO. 2 (April):

- | | |
|--|--|
| Prof. J. DICK FLEMING, D.D. "What I Believe and Why—The Divinity of Jesus Christ." | R. S. FORMAN, B.A. "What I Doubt, and Why—The Divinity of Jesus Christ." |
| Prof. J. WRIGHT BUCKHAM, B.A., D.D. "Theology in the Poets." | Prof. WALTER M. PATON, M.A., Ph.D., D.D. "The Personal Attitude of Religious Teachers." |
| KRISTOFER JANSON. "Religious Views of Björnson and Ibsen." | Prof. WILLIAM A. CURTIS, M.A., B.D., D.Lit. "Scholars of the Age—Robert Flint." |
| Rev. B. E. FAIRBAIRN. "Leading Theological Institutions—Headingley College, Leeds." | Rev. E. W. LEWIS, M.A., B.D. "A Letter from Great Britain." |

Etc., etc., etc.

WHAT THE CRITICS SAY OF NO. 1:—

- The DAILY CHRONICLE says: "The average man is always concerned with religion, either as a believer, a doubter, or a reviler of its claims. The desire for religious discussion rests on the eternal interest about the great unknown which follows death. Thoughts like these are behind the idea of the magazine entitled Faith and Doubt."
- The CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH says: "The first number of Faith and Doubt, a new weekly monthly of exceptional interest, has just reached us. It reflects religious minds of both hemispheres, and the names of Rev. R. J. Campbell, Dr. Orchard Prof. Harnack, rise up to greet the eye with those of Dr. Lyman Abbott and Dr. Wendt. The inspiring idea of this original periodical is one which has often been voiced in our columns, that the average man, when not distracted by the din of the battle for bread, is interested in religion."
- PUBLIC OPINION says: "Faith and Doubt, of which the first number has just been issued (6d.), seeks to give the widest publicity to the verdicts of the highest scholarship of our time, so that the man in the street, as well as teachers and preachers, may know them."
- The CHRISTIAN WORLD says: "We are certainly disposed to give a hearty welcome to Faith and Doubt. It is certainly a great thing that all points of view are to be admitted, and that both Faith and Doubt, both orthodox and heterodox, are to be allowed to speak. After all, this is the supreme test of any religion."

PRICE 6d. NET (Postage 2½d.).
Subscription 8s. per annum, post free.

Of all Booksellers.

THE SEMINARY PRESS,
21, Paternoster Square, London.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The Settef Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

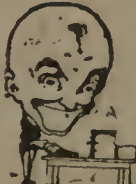

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the PLEX DUPLICATOR. Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stenels, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof. Complete outfit, foolscap size. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete. A. R. QUADRUPEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

Swift Sure

Before deciding on a new suit—see how smart we can make your old one.

The "Achille Serre Process" of cleaning and tailor pressing restores the freshness and shape of a suit like magic. All spots and stains are removed and the suit is returned looking as good as new.

It only takes FOUR DAYS— and costs but 3/9.

We collect and deliver free from nearest Branch or pay carriage one way on all orders sent direct. Write for Illustrated Booklet and address of nearest Branch or Agent.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

35

ARE YOUR NERVES HEALTHY?—If not, let me explain an inexpensive, drugless treatment. Banishes depression, sleeplessness, irritability, brain-fag, lassitude. Restores youthfulness.—Write "Specialist," c/o EVERYMAN, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months: no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

THE WILL and the WAY.

Where there's a will there's always a way. Everyone knows this, and realises that it is the will that bothers most people. If they could only develop their will-power, self-control, and self-reliance, they know they would find their way to success. There is an easy, practical, scientific, sure means of developing your Will-Power, in the Concentro Course—"Scientific Concentration." A great number of students in every part of the civilised world are developing their will by means of this famous system of training. They are also developing, steadily and surely, their powers of Attention, Observation, Memory Speaking, Thinking, and obtaining marvellous control over both mind and body. Every Concentro student receives personal direction, according to their requirements, through the Concentro Report system. Editors of well-known Journals recommend "Scientific Concentration." Learn what it will do for you, by sending to-day for their Free Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

A GENTLEMAN who has spent some years in Spain studying the language, gives lessons in Spanish (either in classes of not more than ten, or by individual tuition). Terms moderate.—Apply Box 408, EVERYMAN, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

WESTBOURNE PARK BUILDING SOCIETY.

ABSOLUTE SECURITY FOR SAVINGS. INTEREST.—3 to 5 per cent. according to class of investment—Paid Half-yearly—free from Income Tax Deduction. Prospectus, etc., of—C. JOHNSTON BURT, F.C.I.S., Sec.

Office 136, WESTBOURNE TERRACE, LONDON, W.

the most trying circumstances, in a hurried, disjointed manner, her employer sometimes pacing his office furiously, often smoking a pipe, not infrequently holding a telephone conversation whilst he is dictating his mail. It is for her to know what is at the back of her employer's mind (to have that initiative which Margaret Hamilton says the typist possesses in such a very low degree), in order that the letters may clearly and aptly express what her employer really wishes to say: for woe betide the girl who types a literal transcription of her shorthand notes!

Granted that "the tapping of the typewriter is neither stimulating nor inspiring," I absolutely disclaim that any machine has the power "to cause the intelligence of the operator to fall into a mechanical groove," even such, apparently to Miss Hamilton's notion, insentient creatures as typists. Intelligence is not an element present and absent at intervals. Where it exists it is a permanent force.

(3) In regard to the dictaphone, Margaret Hamilton is in gross error when she affirms that "the number of typists able to realise how to use the instrument are few and far between." The working of same could not possibly be anything but simplicity itself, even to the meanest intelligence. Many firms—indeed, most of the larger business houses—use this instrument. I know a firm who have at least forty dictaphones, and the majority of the operators are juniors (who have had no education beyond that of a board school), and they manipulate the machine successfully, for salaries ranging from 10s. to 15s. per week. Many expert shorthand writers now find themselves, when seeking a post, faced with the cry, "We are not prepared to pay a large salary, as we use the dictaphone," rendering shorthand quite unnecessary.

Lastly, I fail to see why, "after a period of hard work, the typist finds herself faced with a future arid of ambition." Is the future of the typist any greyer than that of any other working woman? Indeed, there are very many occupations where life is harder and the conditions more unfavourable. If her future be grey it is her own fault entirely, since happiness is not the exclusive possession of any particular class. Life holds as much for the typist as for other individuals.—I am, sir, etc.,
OLIVE SEARLE.

PAGANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—We have grown accustomed to hearing from the pulpit the Greeks accused of sensuous enjoyment, but when such accusations appear in EVERYMAN, which professes to stand for the best that classical Greek stood for, it is time to protest.

In Homer we are first introduced to the Greek as Achaians, the period being about 1300 B.C. We find them a highly civilised and cultured people dwelling in the fertile regions of the Peloponnesus, and having their stronghold at Mycenæ. In respect of the status of their women their civilisation was in advance of that of the classical period, and in some respects of modern times also. They gave us the religion of the hearth and abhorred polygamy, which was practised by the Jews and barbarians around them.

Homer, in the parting between Andromache and Hector, has given us an example of married love which the whole of literature has never surpassed.

In religion also the cultured Achaians were less superstitious than the Hellenes of a later period. They had advanced beyond the old beliefs. They were greater than their gods, and knew it. But at this point we lose sight of them, except what the archæologist has discovered for us, for the Dorians came and overthrew this fine civilisation and settled in Sparta. Then came darkness and stagnation for several centuries, until light began to break over Attica, and Athens became the cradle of civilisation and school of all the world. It is round this period that the best literature of our time has gathered. It is still too early for us to comprehend the magnitude of our debt to classical Greece, or the work she accomplished during the short time that was allotted to her. "We find it generally admitted that the seeds of Western civilisation are mostly to be found in Greece, and not elsewhere. Yet it is curious how seldom Greek literature is regarded from this point of view as an embodiment of the progressive spirit, an expression of the struggle of the human soul towards freedom and ennoblement." "If we hold sacred the earliest source of that virtue or manliness which is the morality of the free European citizen, it is not to Palestine, but to Greece, we must make our pilgrimage." "The ideal of modern life may be summed up in the phrase, 'Christian Hellenism.'" The Greeks of the classical period were far too busy working for posterity and preparing the way for Christianity to be troubled with ennui. How the sides of the Athenians would have shook with laughter could Aristophanes or Euripides have known that some barbarians of a grossly materialistic age would have accused them of ennui or sensuous enjoyment! The Greeks were as far above us intellectually as we are above the negroes. The most important function of the State was to see that each citizen had an opportunity of developing his capacities to the utmost. Their capacity for enjoyment was, therefore, greater than ours.

"The appreciation of good things and the power to refuse them is characteristic of the spirit of progress. I think most scholars will admit that it is also eminently true of Greek civilisation." "All great schools of philosophy were in various degrees ascetic. Greek asceticism was nearly always related to some reasonable end, and sought the strengthening of both body and mind." The quotations are from Professors Gilbert Murray and Bernard Bosanquet.—I am, sir, etc., (Mrs.) J. STARK.
Thorntonhall.

THE GLORIOUS FREEDOM OF HALF-TIMERDOM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Herbert Leather would see, I think, if he read my letter carefully, that "the glorious freedom of half-timerdom" was used only in a comparative sense. There is nothing in the sentence to suggest that I consider the half-time system "good." I suggest that the child often thinks it good, which is a different thing, and he does so, in many cases, because (1) he escapes self-suppression for a time; (2) he is able to use his own eyes and his own tongue; (3) he is allowed to laugh, and even to sing; (4) he may stand or sit down without necessarily receiving a command; (5) instead of being a governed machine with feelings, he is helping to govern a machine without feelings—much pleasanter! (6) he can better satisfy his energies, mental and physical, of output and intake; (7) he avoids the cane; (8) he feels that he has a position of trust and responsibility, and is doing some good, if only to himself, by earning something.

No one in his senses can defend the half-time system theoretically. Practically, it is essential to life or existence for many families, and some mills or factories are hygienically better than some schools, in Books worth reading are worth housing in a

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

In a 'GUNN' your books are safe, orderly, free from dust, and instantly get-at-able.

WHO would have their treasured volumes go without a worthy home whilst such a home as the 'Gunn' Bookcase is at hand?—a home that, whether your books run modestly to tens or bravely to their thousands, is ever 'just the size,' accessible, enduring, complete.

Grows with your Books.

A 'Gunn' never need look too big for your books, never too small—one section—the unit of measure—with top and base, forms a complete bookcase. As the library grows you add section to section. No unsightly knobs, no projections at the side in a 'Gunn,' none but best material and workmanship employed.

Booklet No. 10 Free.

Send for this descriptive Booklet, containing reproductions of the various 'Gunn' styles and full details about the 'Gunn' system, with prices, etc.

This illustration shows a small beginning with the 'Gunn' system in plain Oak.

| | |
|-------------------------|------------|
| S. Top Section | ... £0 8 6 |
| O. 9½-in. Book Section | 0 13 6 |
| P. 11½-in. Book Section | 0 14 6 |
| T. Base Section | ... 0 7 6 |

Total ... £2 17 6

WM. ANCUS & CO., Ltd., 52, Paul St., Finsbury, London, E.C.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY
AND

INEX-
PENSIVE

LUXURY.

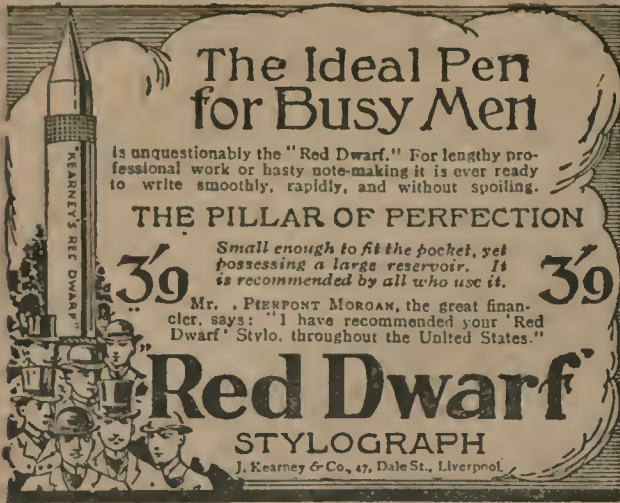

FOR CARDS.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every house-hold for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,
4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.
ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

The Ideal Pen for Busy Men

is unquestionably the "Red Dwarf." For lengthy professional work or hasty note-making it is ever ready to write smoothly, rapidly, and without spoiling.

THE PILLAR OF PERFECTION

Small enough to fit the pocket, yet possessing a large reservoir. It is recommended by all who use it.

39

Mr. PIERPONT MOROAN, the great financier, says: "I have recommended your 'Red Dwarf' Stylo. throughout the United States."

Red Dwarf

STYLOGRAPH

J. Kearney & Co., 47, Dale St., Liverpool.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, W. — A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Large house. Access to gardens. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

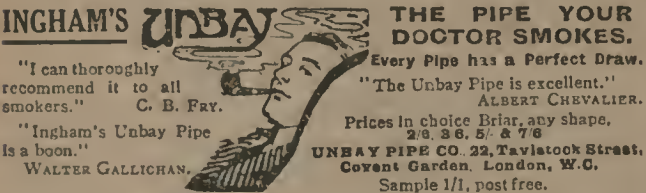

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and General MSS. 8d. per 1,000 words. Plays, 1s. per 1,000 words. Paper and Carbon copy included. "Everyman" readers very pleased.—C.A. Girton, 2, Grove Lane, Caiberwell, S.E.

SHORTHAND.—A CLERGYMAN'S OPINION: "With the entire charge of my large working-class congregation (of 2,500 people) I could only take an occasional snatch at your work, and it is wonderful how soon I have become proficient. To me it was most fascinating, and I think Sloan-Duployan just perfect. I shall in future, as I have already done, speak to our young people about it, especially when some of them spend months in preparation for office work."—From Rev. T. A. Smyth, The Manse, Shaftesbury Square, Belfast.

SLOAN-DUPOYAN is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for interesting illustrated handbook, with specimen lesson, free.—Rans Shortland Co., Ramsgate.

THE LONGER YOU PAY RENT THE MORE MONEY YOU WASTE. Apply to-day for "Every Man his own Landlord," which will be sent post free to applicants mentioning this paper. Address—Managers, 246, Blishopgate, E.C.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready. Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost. Gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

INGHAM'S UNBAY THE PIPE YOUR DOCTOR SMOKES.

"I can thoroughly recommend it to all smokers." C. B. Fry.

"The Unbay Pipe has a Perfect Draw."

"The Unbay Pipe is excellent." ALBERT CHEVALIER.

Prices in choice Briar, any shape, 2/6, 3/6, 5/6 & 7/6

UNBAY PIPE CO. 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

Sample 1/1, post free.

"Ingham's Unbay Pipe is a boon." WALTER GALLICHAH.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time.

which case the children benefit (I have known many such).

That a half-timer must have a clean sheet of health before being allowed to work is entirely untrue. The examination is usually most perfunctory.

The half-time system is thoroughly bad, wholly wicked; and Mr. Leather seems rather unkindly to confuse me with the system!—I am, sir, etc.,

AUSTIN PRIESTMAN.

Bradford, April 9th, 1913.

INTERNATIONAL LANGUAGES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Samson, it is true, destroyed the temple, but he, at the same time, put an end to his own life. Should a simplified Latin or a bastard Esperanto succeed in vanquishing Esperanto (which is not likely), an end will also be put to the idea of an international language. The co-existence of two or more international languages will only aggravate the very evil desired to be removed. Esperanto so completely "fills the bill." Why spoil it? It will naturally change with time, but the changes will be international. The various nations will not use it amongst themselves (except for study and practice). Its field being international conference, correspondence, and reading, national idiosyncrasies will, therefore, have but an infinitesimal influence upon its development.—I am, sir, etc.,

JACK EDWARDS.

Aberystwyth, April 11th, 1913.

WAGES AND LABOUR CONDITIONS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—For the purpose Miss Hamilton has in view, it is quite necessary that wages and conditions of work should be considered together. For the purpose of social reform, however, wages and work conditions should be regarded as two distinct problems. By amending Factory and other Acts, Parliament can, with absolute certainty, prolong the life and add to the health and happiness of the workers, especially women and children. I do not say Parliament should not interfere with wages, but the difficulty and uncertainty of the result of such interference is very great. It is safe to say that for one who would advocate interference with wages there are one hundred who, if they knew the facts, would favour further amendments to the Factory and other Acts, having the physical and moral welfare of the worker as the object in view.—I am, sir, etc., J. E. WATES.

Brockley, London.

CARDINAL NEWMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am sorry to see in your current issue the contemptuous reference made by Mr. Lilly to that highly gifted speaker, sincere Christian, and very perfect gentleman, the late Rev. Hugh McNeile, D.D., for many years a beneficed clergyman in Liverpool, and who was a Canon of Chester, and finally Dean of Ripon. He was of sufficient importance in his day to call for a leading article in the Times on the occasion of his decease. Had Mr. Lilly known him at all he could not have spoken of him but in terms of great respect, although Dr. McNeile certainly held very different theological views from those of the brilliant and equally good and sincere Cardinal Newman.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. W. WHITE.

Hampton-on-Thames,

TWO BOOKS ON INDIA

THE GORGEOUS EAST*

IN "Pioneers in India" Sir Harry Johnston has given us a very good specimen of popular history. These stories of "real adventures" are always well, often racily, told. The necessary explanations are succinct and informing, and contain almost all the material of Indian history down to the beginning of the nineteenth century. The oft-told tale of Clive is dismissed shortly, as being too familiar, too near modern times, and not dealing with the unexplored. On the other hand, the fantastic adventures of the German-Italian, Varthema, are very fully narrated, as are Sir Thomas Roe's visit to the Great Mogul.

IN TRUST FOR CIVILISATION†

All Englishmen like books on India; most of all, those of us who have been connected with that country either through personal experience or through a host of relatives and friends. We may add that this category has most need of instruction; knowledge based on a limited and finished set of data is apt to crystallise into an imperishable dogma. The retired Indian civilian is one of the great disappointments of modern England. He goes out as a picked man to do splendid and self-sacrificing work in one of the finest Government services the world has ever seen, and he too often comes back with a mind rigidly closed to new ideas of any sort, whether they bear on east or west, on heaven or earth.

Sir Joseph Bampfylde Fuller's book is interesting in every way, but one of the chief reasons of interest is that its author is a tried and distinguished member of the Indian Civil Service. Mental rigidity is by no means one of his characteristics; indeed, in a singularly complete survey of modern India, with a good deal of ancient history thrown in, he has shown a breadth and originality of view that would be hard to excel. He holds a brief for his country as a civilising agency, and for his service as an inspired and efficient instrument. The protection afforded by the English Fleet balances a few financial meannesses—amongst which he reckons the upkeep—by India—of the India Office, and the favours shown to Lancashire cotton at the expense of Indian manufacturers. Indeed, many incidents of administration excite his keen criticism, though most of them are connected with Imperial arrangements. The effects of Free Trade on India, for instance, are condemned in many passages.

Sir Joseph Fuller believes in British rule in India, but he also believes in the gradual development of an Indian nation. He is strongly against premature concessions in the sphere of politics, but he pleads for a more systematic study and indulgence of national sentiment. A strong vein of healthy scepticism pervades his observations and prognostications; he is doubtful of education, and he considers that the caste system is in some places growing stronger rather than weaker, as the attempt to foist alien customs on a people inevitably results in a strengthening of national custom and tradition. He insists repeatedly that the worst evil of India, even worse than her marriage customs, is malaria. The illustrations and the chapters on ethnology and physical geography are excellent.

* "Pioneers in India." By Sir Harry Johnston, G.C.M.G., K.C.B. 6s. (Blackie.)

† "The Empire of India." By Sir J. Bampfylde Fuller, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., of the Indian Civil Service (retired). 7s. 6d. net. (Pitman.)

HIDDEN POWER.

Remarkable Results Follow Experiments of Clever Scientist.

Marvels of the Mind.

Initiation FREE to our Readers.

There are hundreds, nay, thousands, of intelligent and capable men and women to-day, living a life of mediocrity, obscurity and failure, whose "apparently ordained" careers constitute a monotonous succession of profitless toil, trouble and misery.

No doubt there are many ready to exclaim that all these things must come to pass, but just ask yourself this question: Is there one single sound reason why every human being should not attain success and happiness? No—most emphatically there is not.

Every human being is heir to a rich and glorious possession—being sacred cherished gifts of inborn capacities and talents. Every one is born suitably equipped to play his or her rôle in the game of life, and given opportunities which, when grasped, lead to unbounded success and perfect happiness.

Mr. Frank Hartley, who has devoted the best years of his life to this particular subject, positively denies that failure in any sense of the term must necessarily exist. He maintains that the power to succeed lies within the reach of all—it is, in fact, inherent; a potent, dormant force requiring but a certain amount of development and training to manifest itself in every individual. Hundreds upon hundreds of people in every walk of life, who have followed his teaching and method, testify to the wonderful results which this truly remarkable man has enabled them to accomplish.

£1,000 GUARANTEE.

Just read the following letters of testimony and see what his teaching has done for these people. Mr. Frank Hartley possesses thousands upon thousands of similar eulogistic letters, and he will hand a cheque for £1,000 to any London hospital fund, or other charitable institution if anyone can prove that they are not absolutely genuine. These letters are the spontaneous expressions of praise from educated men and women, and they are open to the fullest investigation by any bonâ-fide inquirer.

STUDENT No. 6,445.

"I may say I am highly delighted with your instructions, they are doing wonders. Kindly send further, and oblige."

STUDENT No. 1,045.

"It is with a feeling of regret that I ask you to send on further advice. I consider it the best investment I ever made."

STUDENT No. 3,419.

"I have studied your last, to my great benefit; I must add in conclusion that I feel a totally new man."

STUDENT No. 5,231.

"I am progressing splendidly under your guidance; in fact, I feel 'another girl' altogether."

No matter your age or position in life, whether you are engaged in artistic pursuits, in commerce, in finance, you may be either employer, employee, or independent; Mr. Frank Hartley can help you attain success in the fullest sense of the word. Every word you speak, every emanating thought, every moment you live can be either right or wrong. The very way you shake hands, look, and conduct yourself during an interview are of vital importance. You say these are but trivial matters. True—but then life itself is made up of little things, and the secret of success in every phase of life lies in bringing your every wish, thought, and action into harmony with your immediate surroundings and the hidden forces of nature.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

Mr. Frank Hartley has consented to send a free copy of his wonderful book, entitled "HOW FAILURE BECOMES IMPOSSIBLE," and initiate a number of our readers, free of charge, into his remarkable infallible-success-method, providing that applicants are in earnest and willing to make a slight effort in order to reach the goal of their ambitions.

There is no age limit, no question of position, or obstacle of any kind. All you have to do is to write to Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 80, London Institute of Menti-culture, 9, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C., mention you are a reader of EVERYMAN, and he will send you a free copy of his wonderful book, full particulars of his method, and show you what you must do in order to attain Success, Power, Personal Influence, and Perfect Happiness. There is nothing tedious, laborious, or arduous about his teaching, there are no irksome exercises to perform, or mystifying formulæ of any kind.

We hope that every reader, every lady and gentleman, who sees this article will carefully read it, and not hesitate to write to Mr. Hartley should the matter interest them in any way.—Advt.

The Poor Law Postal Training College

"A straightforward concern."

—JOHN BULL.

OFFERS exceptional chances to intelligent men and women to rapidly qualify for offices under Local Government. The College enjoys a unique position, and the Principal and Staff are experts of long experience.

Complete postal training for Masters, Matrons, Registrars, Stewards, Storckkeepers, Clerks, Rate Collectors, Relieving Officers, and School Attendance Officers.

Special Courses for National Insurance (1911) as Inspectors, Assistant Inspectors and Health Officers; Labour Exchange (Board of Trade), Managers, Clerks, Messengers, etc.

Students can also be prepared for Sanitary Inspectors, Assistant Inspectors of Factories, and Inspectors of Weights and Measures.

Every facility is offered to students, and all text books, schedules, etc., are loaned free. Write for The College Magazine, post free.

EUSTACE MILES, Esq., M.A., writes:—

"Thoroughly sound and conscientious—no hesitation in recommending College."

WHAT STUDENTS SAY:

"I wish here to express my best thanks to yourself and tutors for the extreme kindness and courtesy shown and the pains taken to initiate me into the duties."

—T. Anderson, P.L.P.T. College Student, Helensburgh.

"I have much pleasure in testifying that a great part of my training was under the Principal of this Institution, and I attribute the success I have accomplished and my present position to the training received at his hands."—A. G. (Kent).

"As a former student, I can bear sincere testimony to the wonderful method of training, and my present position is due, to a large extent, to the admirable training received."

—E. G., Assistant Master (Lancashire).

"I write expressly to thank you for the able and satisfactory manner in which you have conducted my training."

—W.G.O. (Romsey).

Address all communications, SECRETARY, P.L.P.T. COLLEGE, 77, THANET HOUSE, STRAND (Opposite the Law Courts).

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE INNS OF COURT AND CHANCERY (Macmillan, 1s. net). This is a most instructive and, at the same time, entertaining volume, comprising six lectures delivered by members of the Inns of Court and Chancery in Middle Temple Hall last year. It is difficult to say which of these lectures is the most interesting, but perhaps to the layman the last, "Literary Men Connected with the Inns of Court and Chancery," is more appealing. It is with surprise that one learns how intimately associated with the Inns practically all the great writers of the past and present have been. We find happy recollections of Macaulay and Disraeli, Lamb, and, of course, Dr. Johnson. Then one is vastly amused at the controversy, which has apparently been waged for many years, as to which of the Inns was the one-time home of Geoffrey Chaucer. Speght, writing in 1574, says, "It seemeth that Chaucer was of the Inner Temple, for not many years since Master Buckley did see a record in the same house where Geoffrey Chaucer was fined two shillings for beating a Franciscan friar in Fleet Street." The lecturer, Mr. Blake Odgers, K.C., is of opinion that this is just the sort of thing Chaucer would have done had he been a member of either Temple! It is refreshing to learn that members of the Bar are, in moments of stress, capable of beating a Franciscan friar in Fleet Street! Mr. Odgers is profuse in his anecdotes of famous men, and, turning the pages at random, we find Henry Fielding, Goldsmith, Dickens, Thackeray, Sir Philip Sidney, Tom Moore, Lord Haldane, and others too numerous to mention. We are given a pathetic insight into the life of Fielding. "He joined the Western Circuit, and for a while regularly attended the Wiltshire Sessions. But he was deep in debt; he had a wife and children dependent on him, and he had to devote himself to writing political pamphlets, newspaper articles, and all kinds of literary work. He worked hard; he is described by Thackeray as sitting up late at night after a carouse, with inky ruffles, scribbling away something for one of the papers, with the printer's boy fast asleep on the stairs outside the door."

The remaining five lectures are not less interesting, and will, doubtless, appeal to those who make a study of the history of London. We are carried over the centuries from the days of Cæsar and the Romans to Mr. Asquith. The book is vividly written from the first page to the last. Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have given to the public a compact and attractive volume, which will be welcome on the bookshelves of laymen and "Benchers" alike.

Miss F. M. Mayor has had the courage to undertake a somewhat difficult task—depicting the life of an idle unmarried woman of the last generation from her childhood to her deathbed. The story, THE THIRD MISS SYMONS (Sidgwick and Jackson, Ltd., 3s. 6d. net), is necessarily somewhat devoid of incident; but it is, nevertheless, interesting from beginning to end, and as a character study is extremely clever. One cannot help pitying the lonely, unattractive woman who so greatly desires the love and affection of her fellows and is so incapable of arousing it. One feels impatient with her for her numerous shortcomings, but, at the same time, is well able to comprehend how impossible it was for her to be otherwise than she is. Her story is one which will appeal to students of human nature, and which will bring home to everyone how terribly cramped and drear must have been the life of the woman of her day, who had nothing to do but (in the words of Mr. Masfield) "go passively, like poultry, along the tramways of their parishes." Mr. John Masfield's introduction shows a true appreciation of Miss Mayor's work. It is needless to say we thoroughly enjoyed reading the book, and, if it left us feeling rather sorrowful, at least one has the comfort of hoping that the women of the present day are not doomed to such a life as that of the third Miss Symens.

Admirers of the Rev. J. Adderley's writings will welcome the second edition of A PIECE OF NEW CLOTH (Hunter and Longhurst, 1s. net). The story tells of the struggles of a young Socialist parson, John Seymour, to overcome the prejudices of his old mother and father and to uplift the members of his father's congregation. John is an earnest and clever exponent of the doctrines of free speech, and readers will follow with interest the arguments which Mr. Adderley so clearly and ably puts into the mouth of his characters. The book is written in a breezy and refreshing manner, and there is a delightful chapter in which is given a humorous account of a Primrose League meeting, of which John's father, the old rector, is chairman (prompted by his wife!). We can remember having attended just such a meeting not so very long ago in the grounds of a certain scion of nobility not far from London, and we remember the difficulty we experienced in keeping our countenance when the stale old platitudes were brought forward with such triumph by the various speakers—so dutifully applauded by the yokels, led by the "gentry" who were keeping a watchful eye upon the audience. Our sympathies are entirely enlisted on behalf of the hero and his Socialist friends, Jack and Jill Dunkley. The characters are well drawn and very true to life, and the old rector and his wife are perfect portraits of the old-fashioned clergy folk. The book is amusing and, at the same time, shrewd and searching, and will doubtless be of much interest to all those who seek the solution of the social and religious problems of the present day.

A dreamer—in a log cabin! This may sound paradoxical, but in NEW LEAF MILLS (Harpers, 6s.) Mr. W. D. Howells has very faithfully and sympathetically chronicled the happy-go-lucky endeavours of his hero to realise his ideals—the forming of a communal settlement in the backwoods of the New World some sixty years ago.

Owen Powell is an incorrigible optimist, and hopelessly unfit to cope with the problem of earning a decent livelihood for himself and his wife, and children, much less to take the practical leadership of the uncouth men and women he finds himself among.

Procrastination is the downfall of his hopes. The new house which is always on the verge of completion, the paper mills which are to become the flourishing centre of a new town—these, like everything else he attempts, all end in smoke. It is characteristic that he should design the "watermark" before even the machinery for the paper-making is installed—or likely to be. It is true the house is eventually so far advanced that his wife takes matters into her own hands, and, despite the absence of plaster on the walls, insists on moving in, contesting (with some excuse) that "the rooms, with their neat tiling, like a succession of latticed bowers," were, if somewhat draughty, at any rate preferable to the log cabin! Poor Ann, she was never able to see things in the picturesque light in which they always appeared to her husband, and it is not to be wondered at that she should rebel against the fate which kept her in the backwoods when she longed "to escape from her household back to the drink only Coffee freed from the drug Caffeine—the only Coffee that does not affect the nervous system, and, therefore, the only safe Coffee. Recommended by over 2,000 doctors. All growths can be had. Flavour, aroma, and quality fully preserved.

PURE COFFEE FREED FROM CAFFEINE

For your health's sake

FREE Sample sent on receipt of 1d. stamp for postage. Booklet free for the asking from The Lifebelt Coffee Co., Ltd. (Dept. 11), 71, Eastcheap, London, E.C.

PAPER BAG COOKERY KNOCKED OUT!

Just listen to this. With this little V. & H. Roaster all you have to do is to put your meat in the tin, put the cover on and leave it!

IT ABSOLUTELY COOKS THE MEAT ITSELF, alone, with no basting or attention, and all the nourishing and delicious gravy is retained. There is no fiddling bags to look after, and to keep incessantly buying. Once you have this, it is yours for practically a lifetime. The meat cooked in this is deliciously tender, and the saving in time and trouble is incalculable. Don't be bothered any more with ordinary dishes, buy one of these and give yourself a little rest. Your meat will also literally melt in your mouth, try and see. AGENTS WANTED. Price 6s.; postage, 3d.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept 154), BRIGHTON.

DRY CLEAN YOUR DOG.

THOROUGHLY CLEAN YOUR DOG WITHOUT WATER. USE THIS POWDER—JUST SPRINKLE ON DOG—RUB INTO HIS COAT AND SKIN—AND THEN BRUSH OUT.

Veterinary Dept. 154.

This is all you have to do to get your dog's coat and skin thoroughly clean: his coat comes up bright and glossy, with a sweet, wholesome smell, every dirt case is destroyed, and your dog in his old age will not suffer from rheumatism, caused by too frequent water washing.

This is so easy and simple to do that the animal can be washed twice as often, and is therefore much more healthy. It can be done ten minutes before it is going out without fear of catching cold. So easy that a child can clean its own pet.

Cats can be shampooed with this wonderful Dry Shampoo Powder, and they enjoy it as much as dogs.

Just try a tin, the price 1s. 1s., post 1d., which contains enough to dry shampoo an ordinary terrier six times—three times the quantity for 2s., post 2d. Perfectly harmless.

We send free with each order our hints and cures on Homo Treatment and Cures.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, BRIGHTON.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

YOU WANT A SCHOOL FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL?

Send for a Complimentary Copy of "THE SCHOOLS OF ENGLAND." It is a beautifully bound Volume of Reliable Schools, and is Sent Free to Parents or Guardians.

ED. J. BURROW & CO., LTD., Address Dept. M, Pomfret House, Cheltenham.

A RETIRED PUBLISHER wishes to read Authors' MSS., with a view to placing same. No reading or preliminary fees whatever charged. Please write in first instance to E. K. B., c/o Advertising Offices, 260, High Holborn, W.C.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN who move in good society, and feel the disadvantages of a neglected education, should send stamp for our booklet 126 and terms.—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

MSS. should be typed before submitting to Agents and Publishers. Lowest prices and best work.—Write Miss Beere, — Rist & Co., 56, Ludgate Hill, E.C., for terms and appointment, or 'phone 7411 City.

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.—For Matriculation, B.A., B.Sc., and other examinations. Single subjects may be taken.—Address, Mr. J. Charleston, B.A. (Hons. Oxon. and Lond.), 14, Elsham Road, Kennington, W.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 3/6, post free. Also Camplus, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crockmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street E.C.

town, which seemed to her full of the things, the cane-seat-chairs things, that made living worth while"; and those walls were never plastered, nor even the vines trained over them—and she knew, poor thing, they never would be. The miller, Jack Overdale, is a surly individual, with a queer, childlike train of superstition in his character, which is the cause of misunderstandings between himself and Owen. Jack is a curious personality, whose acquaintance we are glad to have made, if only as representing a phase of human nature not frequently met with. The characters are well drawn, and show an unusual insight and appreciation of men and women. One feels when laying down the book that it might with advantage have been longer. We should have liked to follow the history of our very lovable hero in the new life which he adventures upon.

Mr. Redmayne opens his story, THE GULF BETWEEN (Wells Gardner Darton, and Co., 6s.), in the homely but not uninteresting atmosphere of a German boarding-house, whose residents offer, with their hostess, Frau Meyer, excellent opportunities for amusing, if not very subtle, characterisation. On the whole, German boarding-houses seem very like the kind with which we are familiar in Bloomsbury. Thus quite early in the narrative we learn of the tragedy of the bath in regard to the hero, Mr. Klupps, who greatly rejoiced when he learnt that this luxury was not regarded as an extra. Imagine his disappointment, however, when, on presenting himself at the apartment in the morning, he discovered that he had omitted to give the necessary notice overnight, which would have permitted of the servants removing the cans of petroleum, the sanitary dustbin, and the other impedimenta from the apartment. One is reminded of the story of the English working man who, on being told that the new tenement he proposed occupying was without a bath, asked plaintively, "Then where do we keep the coal?" However, the German boarding-house has other points of resemblance to those in our own land. As usual, there is one boarder, Kathleen Vaughan, who commands the affection and admiration of the others. The story of her love affair with a man whom she discovers is already married, her renunciation and death, are cleverly worked out; but the climax is a trifle strained, and one could have wished that Mr. Redmayne had closed on the quiet and effective key in which he opened.

In her new novel, THE WINGS OF PRIDE (Harper's, 6s.), Miss Kennedy Mabie gives us a vivid and most realistic insight into the working of the caucus on the other side of the herring pond. We in England are becoming sufficiently familiar with the evils of the party machine, and the complete ascendancy it has gained over politics and politicians. The gradual elimination of independence among the members of the House of Commons has long been a matter of grave misgiving to the student of national affairs. In this book Miss Mabie shows us the system carried out to its logical conclusion. There is, for instance, "Boss" Kavanagh, the arch wirepuller, who holds Lake City practically at ransom, and with the help of his hirelings and creatures organises "jobs" at enormous profit, practically without any risk of detection. Miss Mabie's analysis of "graft" is one of the best that has yet been presented for the consideration of English readers. But it is by no means the only triumph she achieves. Her heroine is an admirable presentation of a young woman, flushed with the arrogance of youth, made humble by experience in a land whose characteristic virtues do not certainly tend in that direction. The struggle between Ordway, the Hampden of Lake City, and his enemy, the "boss," makes capital reading, and while one is not so sure that Kavanagh would have been defeated, we do not grudge the patriot his reward in the capture of the heroine's affections.

Miss Augusta Ayliffe has published a very useful and clever work, entitled TIME IS MONEY (Bloodworth and Pepworth, Dursley, 3s. 6d. net). The book aims at teaching languages to busy people, and "is intended for those persons who jump into the train and go half way round the world while the sleepy ones are thinking the matter over and studying a bit of French or Italian grammar before entertaining a thought of going on the Continent." Miss Ayliffe sets out the colloquialisms of the chief languages—English, French and Italian—notably avoiding the parrot-like iterations and mechanical observations of the stereotyped dialogue. One feature is noticeably valuable. "Time is Money" teaches the traveller to ask intelligibly for his food, and to understand the menu placed before him. The actual carte de jour of a French restaurant is reproduced, and simple but telling instructions offered on it. The book should prove invaluable to all those who want to achieve a workable knowledge of French or Italian in the shortest possible time.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Anglo-German Understanding Conference Report. (British Joint Committee.)
 Boutroux, Emile. "Education and Ethics." (Williams and Norgate, 5s.)
 Byron, Mary. "A Voice from the Veld." (Dent, 2s. 6d.)
 Drinkwater. "Swinburne." (Dent, 5s.)
 Grettton, R. H. "A Modern History of the English People." (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d.)
 Goldring, Douglas. "Dream Cities." (Fisher Unwin, 8s. 6d.)
 Heine, Reginald L. "Dreams." (Dent, 5s.)
 Hutton, Edward, "Ravenna." (Dent, 10s. 6d.)
 Jerrold, Laurence. "The French and the English." (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d.)
 Le Bon, Gustave. "The Psychology of Revolution." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
 Neil, Rev. James. "Everyday Life in the Holy Land." (Cassell, 7s. 6d.)
 Oppenheim, E. Phillips. "The Temptation of Tavernake." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Pugh, Edwin. "Punch and Judy." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
 Redmayne, P. Y. "The Gulf Between." (Wells Gardner, Darton and Co., 6s.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarion London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE EVERYMAN BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Newly compiled by JOHN W. COUSIN, and brought down to the present time, including living authors of repute.

This work, which includes both English and American writers, has been specially compiled for Everyman's Library.

SIR WM. SMITH'S SMALLER CLASSICAL DICTIONARY.

Completely revised and edited by E. H. BLAKENEY, M.A.

Mr. Blakeney, Headmaster of the King's School, Ely, has taken Sir Wm. Smith's dictionary as a basis, and has recast it and brought it up to date by the addition of many entirely new articles and illustrations.

A DICTIONARY OF DATES. Newly compiled.

The aim of the compilers of this New Dictionary has been to give every date likely to be of service to the general reader, while getting rid of the superfluties which make the typical date-book too bulky for easy use.

AN ILLUSTRATED ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF GARDENING.

By WALTER P. WRIGHT.

The author of "The Perfect Garden," "Pictorial Practical Gardening," etc., who is the present encyclopædist, has packed an immense amount of exact information into his alphabet of the trees, herbs, and flowers, and of almost everything pertaining to their growth, wild and tame. The general reader and the intending gardener, amateur or other, will find it a reference book of great service.

ROGET'S THESAURUS. Revised by ANDREW BOYLE, with Additions.

(2 Volumes.)

Roget's "Thesaurus," which Mr. Boyle has brought up to date, may be called in essence a Dictionary of Ideas. It was based upon an exceedingly practical understanding of the need felt by every man who thinks and every man who writes for a handbook to help him in collecting and duly associating and distinguishing the whole of the ideas suggested by his subject.

A DICTIONARY OF NON-CLASSICAL MYTHOLOGY.

Compiled by MARIAN EDWARDES and LEWIS SPENCE. With Illustrations.

Miss Edwardes has in this volume, with the assistance of Mr. Spence, brought the traditions and religions of India, Egypt, and the Oriental peoples into range, beside summarising the Northern and Celtic Mythology.

LITERARY AND HISTORICAL ATLASES.

A Series of Four Atlases designed for use with Everyman's Library. They embody the latest geographical knowledge, with special reference to the books of history, travel, romance and geography contained in the library. Vol. I., Europe; Vol. II., America; Vol. III., Asia; Vol. IV., Australasia and Africa (in preparation).

The Library also contains an

ATLAS OF CLASSICAL GEOGRAPHY

illustrating the World as known to the Ancients.

A full list of 640 titles will be sent upon receipt of a postcard.

CLOTH

1/-

NET

LEATHER

2/-

NET

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him — he waits for me — always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation.

There is nothing to get out of order — no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave — not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
 LONDON.

POST TO US — GET THE BOOK.

POST IT NOW

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

Name

Address

CUT THIS CORNER

POST IT NOW

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 28. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, APRIL 25, 1913

One Penny.

EMILE VANDERVELDE, NATUS 1866

For Character Sketch, see page 40.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of Emile Vandervelde | 33 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 34 |
| The Lloyd George Crusade. I.—The Demand of the Able-bodied Worker—By P. W. Wilson | 35 |
| Pacifism and Imperialism—By Enrico Corradini | 36 |
| Winds of Doctrine By E. H. | 37 |
| Women at Work. IX.—The Domestic Servant—By Margaret Hamilton | 38 |
| The Moon-Path. Poem—By E. W. Alexander | 39 |
| Emile Vandervelde and the Belgian Strike—By Charles Sarolea | 40 |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? A Criticism of Mr. Bland—By A. M. S. | 41 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. The Æneid—By Prof. J. S. Phillimore | 42 |
| April Gold. Poem By A. Stanley | 43 |
| The Poetry of Donne—By Prof. George Saintsbury | 44 |
| Literary Notes | 45 |
| The Kinema—By Dr. Percy Dearmer | 46 |
| A Lay Sermon on the Art of Reading | 48 |
| Caravan Days—By George Goodchild | 49 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Enterprise in Business | 51 |
| The Abolition of the Working Classes | 52 |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? | 54 |
| Whittier's Life and Work... .. | 58 |
| Scottish Church History, 1690-1740 | 59 |
| Books of the Week | 60 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

LORD ROBERTS' campaign of universal service has been the topic of the week; and while one party sees in him the honest instrument of a malignant plot and the other the heroic leader of a holy crusade, both agree in bearing tribute to the veteran soldier's patriotic devotion and singleness of purpose. "A simple-minded gentleman, as modest as he is brave, and entirely free from jesuitry and disguise," says Mr. A. G. Gardiner, in the course of a characteristic indictment of what he calls the "adventure of conscription." "Nor is he a jingo. He has done more fighting than any man living, but he does not love fighting for its own sake. His defect as a general is that he is too humane, too sensitive to the suffering and misery of war." Over against this the headlines of a vigorous article in the Observer make interesting reading: "The Pilgrimage of Faith—Lord Roberts as a Revivalist—A People Sick of the Palsy—The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon." With regard to the probable effects of conscription upon our democracy, there is a similarly picturesque contrast of opinion. While one side declares that one of the objects of the universal service movement is the taming of a free democracy by the drill-sergeant, the other sees in conscription a great levelling force, and, indeed, the only remedy for the curse of caste—"a great University of life . . . the beginning of true democracy in its social bearing, the first real antidote to that antipathy and friction of class which are tearing the vitals of the State." It would be interesting to trace this levelling influence in countries that have conscription—and more interesting than easy, one imagines.

The fall of Adrianople has plunged Constantinople into a sombre and apprehensive mood, evoking not only expressions of bitter regret, but revealing an element of sober self-criticism which few suspected in the "terrible" Turk. And while such self-criticism may be traced in the Constantinople Press—the Tasviri Efkyar, for instance, frankly admits bad statesmanship in both external and internal affairs—it is mainly expressed by private individuals. Thus, a writer in the New York Literary Digest quotes an intelligent Turk in Constantinople as giving utterance to the following shrewd diagnosis of the situation: "A blind man is in no greater danger than one who closes his eyes in face of vital facts. . . . We did not succeed because, before drawing our swords, we did not waken our mind and soul from the sleep of centuries. To lose provinces is to grow smaller on the map. This does not much frighten me. I am more afraid of growing smaller in mind and soul. The other day a friend was saying, 'How did it happen that we gave up that large Rumelia in ten days?' 'No, my simple-minded friend,' I said, 'not in ten days, not even in ten years, but centuries ago we began to give those lands back when we conquered and took them.'" The other side of the picture is given in an interesting interview with the Turkish Grand Vizier, reported in the Daily Telegraph. The Grand Vizier emphatically denied the assertion that the misfortunes of Turkey are due to the failure of the Young Turks to redeem their promises of reform. "If our ideal has not been realised up to the present," he said, "it is because all our best efforts have been paralysed by internal intrigues and external complications. To-day . . . we are thoroughly decided to take in hand again the pursuit of our old ideal, and in the realisation of this work of salvation we shall not allow ourselves to be hindered by any obstacle."

The proclamation of the Chinese Government appointing April 27th to be observed by the Christian Churches throughout the eighteen provinces as a day of prayer for the new Republic, demonstrates how largely the revolution was influenced by distinctively Christian ideals. The question is a far wider one than that of the beneficence, or otherwise, of direct missionary effort. Whatever view may be taken of the specifically "missionary" aspect of the case, it remains that the best mind of China—whether professedly Christian or anti-Christian—has been leavened with ideals and aspirations imbibed largely at mission schools, and that this official recognition of Christianity marks the birth of a new civilisation.

South African agriculture has won a sensational victory over the drought-spectre. A "rainless" wheat—the Durum wheat of Italy—was grown successfully at Lichtenburg, in the dry belt of the Transvaal, without a single drop of rain falling upon it from seedtime to harvest. Thanks to numerous experimental "dry land stations," the old superstition of "no farm without a water-furrow" has been abandoned, and in each of the four provinces and Rhodesia thousands of acres of land, once considered valueless, are being exploited with excellent results. Another remarkable development is the extermination of locusts by means of poisoned grass, over which they cannot pass. At present the only locusts available in the Transvaal are in the natural history museum. Dr. Macdonald, of the Union Department of Agriculture, and one of the most competent exponents of the dry-farming movement, with its system of "moisture-saving fallows," is at present in England, and one may expect a diversion of, at any rate, part of the present stream of emigrants to South Africa, which bids fair to take rank as one of the richest farming countries in the world.

THE LLOYD GEORGE CRUSADE * * * BY P. W. WILSON

I.—THE DEMAND OF THE ABLE-BODIED WORKER

THEY who so emptily assert that no man is indispensable, should be reminded that every man makes a difference. If at this moment Mr. Lloyd George (and his numerous biographers) were to be suddenly obliterated, someone or other—say Mr. Churchill or Mr. Herbert Samuel—would doubtless fill the vacuum at the Treasury. The Government would continue on its appointed way, and, not perhaps for years, would it dawn upon the philosophers that the most formidable agrarian revolt ever threatened against English feudalism had been scotched by fate. Everything for which a public man lives has been staked by Mr. Lloyd George, as a year or two will show, upon a Land, Housing and Wages Crusade of amazing audacity. He may triumph; he may be annihilated, but either of these events must be classed as history.

I.

I am not concerned to deny the soft impeachment that for years past I have watched at close quarters the evolution of Liberal policy. But it is not as a blind defender, whether of parties or of statesmen, that I would here discuss the economic crisis with which the nation will be called upon to deal. All sides admit that the years 1884 to 1904 were in the main years of profound social slumber. Liberalism imposed death duties. Unionism established County Councils. Here and there minor adjustments were effected. But, as Mr. Chamberlain perceived, the people were, in 1902 and onwards, ripening for change. In 1906, Mr. Chamberlain's line of advance—I say nothing of its merits—was, in fact, checked. For good or for ill, Liberalism secured the initiative. What followed? Let us see.

II.

I am not concerned with Imperial matters—the reorganisation of South Africa, the wrestling with Indian uneasiness, the German embroglio, Home Rule, the new army. I want to get at the fundamental question, how far the condition of the people, of which Carlyle wrote in Chartist times, has been altered. We have read our Booth—our Masterman—our Rowntree—our Webbs. Between 1906 and this day of grace, what has actually been done which makes a difference—a real and not a merely verbal difference—to the mean street, the deserted village? If I were writing a political pamphlet, I would point, perhaps with some legitimate pride, to old age pensions, feeding of some children, medical inspection and occasional school clinics, an extension of workmen's compensation, a court of criminal appeal, a White Slave Bill, any amount of industrial inspection, and, finally, insurance against sickness, and, in certain trades, against unemployment. I might add that some food taxes have been reduced, and also some income tax. Extra burdens have in the main been heaped upon the fairly rich. That is, broadly, the result of these seven years, as it is set out in Liberal literature. Things have also been assisted by a trade boom, which is as much due to China and South America as it is to Whitehall; but I am here only dealing with the conscious action of the State. Why is it that this record, which—as set out by Mr. Asquith at any rate—looks creditable so far as it goes, has left the people restless, ready to down tools on the slightest provocation, seething with unfulfilled hopes?

III.

The reason is that statesmanship has been handling, not the normal human being, but the exception. Men and women over seventy years are a large class, but they are not the main body of the industrial army. A woman, at child-birth, deserves her thirty shillings; but her life as a whole remains, broadly, unrelieved by the bounty. A man whose arm has been crippled by a machine is entitled to special money, but his case is, or ought to be, not one in a hundred. Children should be fed before they are taught; but they are the future nation, not the nation that reads these words and goes on strike. The prostitute is another exception. So is the criminal. So, even in bad times, is the unemployed workman. What we are faced by to-day is the cry of the man who is neither aged nor a child, neither criminal nor diseased, neither injured nor out of work—who has wages, a home, brains, muscle, but who asks leave—to live. This man reads of garden cities which he never sees, of drama which is beyond his purse, of dress and travel which are a mockery to him and his wife; he reads of this, not in expensive newspapers, but in his halfpenny print; in the magazines which he can see gratis at any free library; in the very advertisements which face him when he enters a tramcar. The camera brings home to his mind the meaning of wealth, and Mr. Chiozza Money's statistics back up the pictorial appeal. Nothing that Parliament has yet accomplished touches this man's trouble, except indirectly. He does not consciously feel the relief of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. off sugar and 1d. off tea. It is a long time before he will be seventy and get a pension. He doesn't want to be ill or a cripple in order to obtain benefit. He gets impatient with his trade union and its officials. Sometimes he swings towards tariffs. Sometimes he lets off steam at Brotherhood meetings. Sometimes he takes to Syndicalism. It is this man whose case is before the public. You may, of course, leave him to the play of economic forces, which is the way of the older Cobdenites and Mr. Harold Cox, only supplying the Poor Law or its newer substitutes as ambulance for the devil's hindmost. You may leave him to emigrate. But the first fact about Mr. Lloyd George and his crusade is that it abandons, definitely and for ever, the policy of laissez-faire in its last stronghold, the able-bodied workman's home.

Next week I will deal with the minimum-wage movement for agriculture, and its assumed relation to housing; while there may be a further opportunity for the delicate problem of site-value taxation. These subjects, and all the varied alternatives which this virgin territory for legislation offer, are now the absorbing, cumulative issue in British politics.

LITERARY COMPETITION.

The Editor of EVERYMAN offers a prize of Two Guineas for the Best Essay on "The Woman Teacher—Her Life and Labour," the essay not to exceed 1,800 words. All entries for this competition should be addressed to the

COMPETITION EDITOR,
21, Royal Terrace,
Edinburgh,

and must reach him not later than May 1st. It is recommended that essays be typewritten.

PACIFISM AND IMPERIALISM ✱ ✱ ✱ BY ENRICO CORRADINI

[ONE of the most significant and most ominous features in the international situation is the sudden rise of Imperialism in Italy. The war in Tripoli was only one of the symptoms of this nationalist movement. Other symptoms are the claims of Italy on the Ottoman coast, the anti-Austrian campaign, and the growth of militarism in the press. We publish in this number a glorification of war by Signor Enrico Corradini, who is generally considered as the most brilliant exponent of the New Spirit, and as one of the leaders of Young Italy.]

THERE are three kinds of pacifists.

Firstly, those of the plutocracy, who oppose war because it is harmful to their interests.

Secondly, Socialists, who oppose international war because it damages internal class-warfare.

And thirdly, idealists, who oppose war because they believe in an ideal peace.

Taken altogether, these three kinds of pacifists make no small stir. But, to begin with, the plutocrats should be excluded from the group, because, if it suited their interests, they would not hesitate to incite one-half of the human race to go to war with the other. They are not true advocates of peace, any more than are the Socialists, who, if they could, would turn the antagonism between one class and another within the State into civil war.

There only remain the idealists, the honesty of whose intentions is as unsurpassed as is the feebleness of their argument. For they forget that the whole world, including men and human societies, is subject to natural laws, and can only act in conformity with those laws. And they forget that both peace and war—not peace alone, nor war alone—but both peace and war—are two of those laws to which human societies, peoples, and nations are subject.

In a recently published work* I wrote as follows:—

"Peace is the world's organising and conserving force. War is its quickening force, and these two forces work together in ways which, to any thoughtful man, suggest the hand of Providence. The world is kept in existence because it is being continually renewed, and the same is true of the individual. In fact, all living things continue to live because they are renewed. That is to say, all living things tend to decay and die, and are kept alive by a force which is constantly renewing them. This is true both of physical and social organisms, and war, whether it manifests itself as war or as revolution, is the force which revives our social organisms when, during a period of peace, which means a period of conservation and organisation, those organisms have tended to decay and die, and consequently have become, little by little, mere usurpers of the land in which they exist. They are usurpers because every nation ought to recognise that it has a duty towards its land—the supreme duty of being productive. Wars of conquest pour new life into a country, in so far as they drive out those who, in view of this ethical relationship between a country and its people, are usurpers, and establish in their place a productive race.

"It is clear, then, that to the pacifists war is that destructive monster which we can all recognise, inasmuch as it destroys individual lives; but that, on the other hand, when it is rightly understood as part of a greater scheme, it is seen to be a means of preservation. Peace, the organising and conserving force, and war, the renewing force, work together, I repeat, to preserve and continue all that ought to be preserved and continued. The one is essential to the other, and both together form that inexorable rhythm of peace and war which is the rhythm of life itself."

During this year we have witnessed two wars which give admirable proof of the truth of this theory. I refer to the Italian war of conquest in Tripoli and to the Balkan war.

As a result of her war Italy alienated the plutocratic pacifists of all nations, irritated her own pacifist subjects, the Socialists, and was denounced by the idealist pacifists in some little congress in Switzerland, as usual, in the name of humanity, civilisation, progress, the liberty of the people, and so on. But, in reality, by making war on Turkey and by conquering Tripoli, Italy has accomplished a task, not only of advantage to herself, but of justice towards the world, and of advantage to the world. It was a supremely just act in accordance with natural laws. Italy has driven the Turk out of Africa, and has taken the Government of the Arabs into her own hands, and by doing so she has established a productive people on a productive soil, where before there were two peoples who had only succeeded in making their land as unproductive as they were themselves. Surely the Turks and the Arabs were the true destroyers of humanity, civilisation, progress, and the liberties of the people, since they had for centuries shut out other productive people from the soil which they had themselves rendered barren! Italy has given back to Africa the rights of a progressive people by making it possible for her to be productive. My contention is that Italy has reinstated in Africa the just, the ethical relationship between the land and the people who inhabit it. That is to say, the relationship of a productive people to the soil. In other words, the day will come when Italian Tripoli will be linked up with English Egypt and French Tunis, and when the whole southern shore of the Mediterranean will flourish with European vitality. Will pacifists be as loud then as they are now in their condemnation of Italy's war of conquest?

The pacifist's plan, leave Africa to the Arab and the Turk, and let us keep the peace, simply means an unproductive people and a barren soil, and that ends on the one hand in desert land and on the other in the extermination of the race, possibly after a period of cannibalism.

The same is true of the Balkan war. The four Balkan allies are driving their unproductive Asiatic enemy out of Europe, and are thereby performing a just action, not merely as regards their own peoples, but as regards the human race in general. The war in Tripoli and the Balkan war are alike in their aim, which is to free Europe and Africa from the same enemy, whose very presence casts a blight upon the soil, and dries up the springs of life like a devastating fire. The Mediterranean, encircled by the barrenness of Islam, was a truly terrible sight in the eyes of the whole world. We have put an end to that barrenness in Africa, and that is the justification of our war in Tripoli. Before very long that barrenness will have lost its hold on Europe. And that will be the justification of the Balkan war. Then, finally, the Asiatic shore must also be set free. Thus, thanks to war, productive activities will be reinstated in place of barren lethargy all round the Mediterranean, where they formerly flourished; that is to say, an ethical régime will be established. I am sorry to have to point out to all lovers of peace that this can only be accomplished by war, and that it cannot be accomplished in any other way.

* "Sopra le Vie del Nuovo Impero." Milan, Treves, 1912.

But pacifists may, if they choose, still prove that we are wrong and that they are right—that we are wrong in defending war in general, and the wars in Tripoli and in the Balkan States in particular, and that they are right in condemning the same. It is open to them to prove, but it must be seriously proved, that the same ends might be, and can be, attained by other means.

But, so far, nothing has been found which can accomplish what war accomplishes; it has not been found yet, and there is no immediate, nor even distant, prospect of its being found. Various means have been discovered, and have been hailed with delight, it is true, in theory, but, in practice, in real life, in dead earnest, not one.

What of the Tribunal at the Hague? I will even go so far as to postulate ideal conditions for the Tribunal at the Hague. I will postulate a general desire for peace among mankind. That would certainly put a stop to war, but it would not produce the results which are produced by war. And herein lies the subtle distinction. It was not merely a question of preventing war from breaking out between Italy and Turkey in Tripoli, but also of settling a productive people in Tripoli in place of the unproductive Turk. And the same applies to the Balkan peninsula. Is there any peaceful method of taking land from the nation to whom it belongs for the good of humanity? I think not. Will there ever be? I doubt it. And there will always be people who ought to be deprived of their land because there will always be people incapable of production, if only from natural decadence. I am sorry to distress any advocate of peace, but it seems probable that, just as death is the immortal counterpart of life, so war is the immortal counterpart of peace.

WINDS OF DOCTRINE *

AS the title suggests, this is not a systematic exposition of current philosophies, but a collection of popular critiques and appreciations, showing "the way of the wind"—and a "snell," easterly wind it is, with not a little of bleakness and salt in it—in a mind of singular acuteness and force. For many years colleague of the late William James at Harvard, Professor Santayana has watched the rise and fall of philosophical theories with shrewd, appraising eyes, and his humour, while not unkindly as a whole, never lacks a subacid flavour.

His latest book will appeal to a large circle of readers, for it treats of those "winds of doctrine" which, having swept through the schools, are now stirring drawing-room curtains and ruffling the gentle pools of after-dinner conversation. One remembers a recent magazine illustration representing an up-to-date Christmas dinner, and showing a lady in the act of leaving the room while the repast was still in full swing. Several guests expressed anxious solicitude, but were reassured by the lady's mother, who informed them that dear Beatrice had finished her nuts and health-biscuits, and was now going upstairs to study Bergson and Nietzsche in her room. That lady is even more at home in America than here, and she—or rather the tendency she stands for—has a place in Dr. Santayana's penetrative diagnosis of the present philosophical situation. An age in which every man is his own philosopher, and whose vague intuitions and vagrant moods aspire to the dignity of a "system," is bound to excite so stinging and sardonic a humour as that of our author, and his opening and closing chapters on "The Intellectual Temper of the Age" and on "The Genteel Tradition in American Philosophy" exhibit that humour somewhat at the expense of justice. But possibly a more nicely balanced reading of the case would not hit the mark so closely as this merciless and mordant critique.

* "Winds of Doctrine: Studies in Contemporary Opinion." By Prof. G. Santayana. 6s. net. (Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons.)

It is in his reading of the present state of Christian thought and progress that one is inclined to quarrel most seriously with Professor Santayana. When he tells us, for instance, that "even prelates and missionaries are hardly sincere or conscious of an honest function, save as they devote themselves to social work," he is saying something which had considerable justification some years ago, when the so-called "institutional" Church threatened to swamp the Holy Assembly, but which wears the air of a superannuated cliché in an age whose outstanding religious characteristic is a renaissance of the spiritual and mystical. He manifests a similar myopia when he sees the weakness of Modernism in its symbolical interpretation of "the deluge, the resurrection, and the Sacraments," and finds the strength of Christianity in a bald literalism. As a matter of fact, what kept Christianity alive, humanly speaking, through its darkest periods, was the mystical element in the Church, and the great Christian Mystics—who, be it remembered, were also the great practical philanthropists—always interpreted these things symbolically. It would be nearer the truth to say that Modernism has largely failed, not because it believes certain miracles and dogmas to be symbolic, but because it has not always believed in the absolute spiritual reality of the things symbolised, tending rather to agree with Professor Santayana and assign to them only a relative and utilitarian significance.

The chapter on Bergson should not be missed by enthusiastic Bergsonians. Indeed, it is true of the whole of this book that it is those who most profoundly disagree with its author's conclusions that ought to read and ponder it most attentively. His critique of Bergson is vulnerable to a more thorough analysis, but as far as it goes it is acute and searching, and lays a sure finger upon the salient weaknesses of the new philosophy. Like most of Bergson's critics, he takes up the cudgels for intellect versus intuition, but one suspects all the time that he really denies the existence of intuition—that, in fact, it has no place in his scheme of things. And one is inclined to find Bergson's main weakness not so much in his exaltation of intuition over intellect as in his failure to demonstrate the reality of intuition in any other than the vaguely romantic or amateurishly occult sense in which the Boston young lady uses the term. It is noteworthy that Mr. Bertrand Russell's logical absolutism fares no better at Professor Santayana's hands than Bergson's empiricism.

One is tempted to quote from almost every page of this provocative—and, it must be confessed, provoking—book. It is packed with witty and penetrative things, and, granting Professor Santayana's postulate of the relativity of all values, it is as cogent a critique of modern thought-currents as could be compressed within its limit. As a castigation of the pragmatism that would exalt the private interests of man as an explanation of the universe, it has a tonic and astringent quality which should commend it to all thoughtful readers. Professor Santayana's style is a beguilement, and comes to its full right in a delightful essay on Shelley.

E. H.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

IX.—THE DOMESTIC SERVANT

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

OF all branches of woman's employment there is none that has provoked such discussion and controversy as the condition of domestic servants. Their faults, their failings, the way they dress, the way they ought to dress, has provided matter for newspaper correspondence and roused the interest and the antagonism of innumerable householders. At one time "fringes" were tabooed, a housemaid with curled hair was not permissible, a parlourmaid dressed in white on her Sunday out was regarded as a scandal, and a severe eye was kept on the costume of the cook. Nowadays this is altered; domestics are given a free hand in the selection of their gowns, and mistresses are thankful if their maids do not too slavishly copy their confections. In some households a girl is permitted to receive a friend on certain evenings, and the admission of a sweetheart, if the couple are engaged, is not denied. Other families still strenuously enforce the conventual rule; no intercourse with relatives or friends is allowed within their walls, and the suggestion of a "general" giving tea to the man she hopes to marry would inspire horror.

There are, it is estimated, over two millions of female domestic servants in the United Kingdom. These include the smart parlourmaid with the French cap and muslin apron, the hardworking general servant, the little lodging-house marchioness, and the army of cooks and housemaids. Under this heading also comes the charwoman—those migratory ladies of the broom and washtub who descend upon suburban households and battle with brushes and pails.

These figures do not take note of the small girls of ten years and upward who run errands, mind other people's babies, and perform odd jobs after school hours, or in the dinner-hour. The number of servants, however, by no means prove the popularity of domestic service. The number has steadily decreased of late years, the census returns of 1901 showing a far larger proportion.

In the report of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade we find it stated that "among working girls there is a strong prejudice against service. Many owe this to a short experience as an overworked general servant, or else to the early experiences of their mothers or neighbours. Domestic service will probably be readjusted in many ways in the near future, but even now prejudice and the mistakes of the past have much to answer for in the present state of affairs, and it is difficult to see how this prejudice is to be overcome."

The rate of wages has of late increased with the scarcity of the supply, and remembering that board, lodging, washing, and in many cases beer, is included, the scale of payment cannot be considered unsatisfactory. "The result of the inquiry is to show that the average money wages of indoor servants in London are £17 16s., £15 10s. in the rest of England and Wales, £17 6s. in the three principal Scottish towns; while it has not been found possible to obtain a return for Ireland."

And now let us inquire into the reasons that make for this distaste for service. Though the life of the lodging-house domestic is arduous, and the general servant has multifarious duties to perform, the conditions of employment are not, generally speaking, arduous or difficult. The root cause of the dissatisfaction may be said, broadly, to rest on the curtailment of liberty, the loss of freedom, the sense that at no time during the day can the work be said to be done! Other occupations call for laborious effort and ceaseless activity during waking hours, but there comes a time when the factory shuts, the shop puts up its shutters, the office closes. The domestic knows no such respite; there is no space of time, from the moment the alarm-clock strikes in the morning till weary feet drag up the stairs at night, that she can call her own.

Some mistresses, more considerate than others, make no objection if a girl sits down to needlework of an afternoon; but the license is accorded as a favour, she has no "right" to take the leisure. She is, according to the bond, at the beck and call of her employer the day through.

That domestics stay but a short time in situations nowadays, compared with their periods of service in former days, that the spirit of discontent and dissatisfaction is rife amongst them, only emphasises the fact that this ear-marking of the hours of sunshine touches the very quick of the matter. Mistresses are prepared to increase wages, to lighten duties, but they will not permit recognised periods of leisure which their servants can employ as they see fit.

Many are the devices that have been suggested, and tried, to solve the problem, and stem the stampede of women to callings more laborious and less fitted to feminine physique; but there has yet to be discovered a system that touches the vexed question. Communal kitchens were hotly advocated some short time back. The advantages of one kitchen, one block of flats, was thoroughly emphasised, and, to my knowledge, a part of the experiment was carried out. Two shifts of employees were engaged, working eight hours a day each, and communal breakfasts were prepared and served at certain hours, as were luncheons, teas, and dinners. The plan, however, did not work. No. 1, Albanian Mansions wanted underdone beef and baked potatoes; No. 2 clamoured for boiled mutton and potatoes fried; the flats immediately below insisted on vegetarian dietary; and the ground-floor tenants, being theatrical folk, outraged the entire block by ordering breakfast when most folks had afternoon tea!

The employees had as many and as contrary orders as if each one was separately retained by a different flat, and the purposed reform collapsed in ruins. The system, however, somewhat modified, is, we believe, worked with moderate success in certain Garden City Colonies, though here the communal kitchen is accompanied by a communal dining-hall, largely on the lines of a boarding-house or hotel.

Attempts have also been made to work the "shift" system, whereby a servant is supplied for a certain number of hours, on application to an agency that guarantees efficiency. The results, however, have not proved satisfactory. Mary Ann appeared at seven in the morning and went at three in the afternoon, when another Abigail took her place. Next day it was on the cards that two entirely new and strange domestics invaded your premises, entirely ignorant of your fancies and dislikes. The expense proved much greater than that attached to the employment of domestics on the ordinary scale, and ultimately the experiment collapsed in ignominious failure.

The charwoman, however, has managed to solve the difficulty—from her point of view—of both hours and wages. Who has not suffered at the hands of the mysterious female who breaks your china, upsets the paraffin on your carpet, burns your chops and blackens your potatoes? They inevitably possess an ailing relative, these ladies of the broom, who would appear to suffer from all the manifold diseases of the human frame, and the recitals of whose symptoms cause the charlady a certain melancholy joy.

"Fits he has, ma'am," said a worthy woman of the name of Gamble, "and congestion somethink cruel, all along of his not domesticating of his food."

She was a little woman, with a meek voice but ferocious will, and, having once entered the house, literally encamped there, being determined not to leave you "loncsume-like, with no one to work for you," and had eventually to be bribed to leave. They change but little with the passing of years. The bonnet of to-day is the same as years back, and the fashion of the many never changes. But the lady of the broom has been overshadowed since the Insurance Act became law, and, in some instances, they have been crowded out altogether. In the heyday of her prosperity, however, the charlady, at half a crown a day, was inevitably mistress of the situation. She came at her own sweet will, and left when she was inclined to, though, to do her justice, she generally achieved to some very strenuous work.

The more valuable her services, the more tyrannous her conduct, and this applies not only to the lady of the broom, but to domestics generally. The old-fashioned retainers, that nowadays seem to have died out, ruled their mistresses with a rod of iron, and their mantle has descended to the modern cook, who, if she be reproved even in the mildest manner, is liable to ruin the dinner, to justify herself with a burnt omelette or a watery stew. I have known young married women reduced to a pitiable condition of nervous agitation at the prospect of having to complain to a maid years her senior, who combined many good qualities with a strain of obstinacy that would not let her admit she was ever in the wrong. There is little or no prospect of a comfortable old age for the domestic. If she does not marry, but keeps in harness all her life, save in exceptional cases, there is little to hope for but the workhouse. In wealthy families, where good wages are paid, a girl is able to put by a certain portion of her earnings; but it requires steady discipline to save out of £16 a year, and when the monthly holiday comes round there are many things to buy, and perhaps the old people at home to keep. Some few families pension off their staff, but the servants thus assisted form but a small number in a vast crowd.

The Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institution is one of the few organisations that deal with this problem. Its objects are: (1) to grant pensions when past work; (2) to assist domestic servants when out of situations through no fault of their own.

The institution is assisted by gifts of money, but payments are required from members of the institution, which are within the reach of all classes of domestic servants, viz., from 4s. to 9s. per annum, or life subscriptions from £3 to £7. The amount of annuity paid is from £15 to £23. Members are not disqualified by marriage or change of occupation, and are admitted up to the age of fifty, if of good health.

The majority of girls enter domestic service with little or no training but that supplied at home or at school. There are certain institutions that undertake to train young servants, but the fees in the majority of instances are prohibitive, and beginners have to rely on what they learn in their first place, supplemented by the scanty knowledge they gain in classes on cookery and domestic economy at the county schools.

If a girl be anxious to learn, and is quick and ready, she can work her way up from small beginnings to a situation demanding a good sum. Parlourmaids are well paid, from £20 up to as much as £35 in special cases, and in families where many visitors are received the "tips" form a considerable addition. The general servant varies as much in the amount she can command as in the efficiency she can offer. It is an axiom that one good domestic is worth three, and that once you increase your staff from the original "general," you get less and less well served.

The continuous demand prevents the problem of unemployment to any extent, though in cases where a girl has been out of a situation for some little time it is difficult for her to obtain another, more especially because, as a class, they do not save, but spend their wages very readily. The life does not afford great variety or colour, and "the evening out" that is usually allowed is eagerly looked forward to. It is noteworthy that, as a class, servants do not make economical or managing wives if they take husbands of the working class. They have been used to the administration of plentiful food and household stores of all descriptions, and are at a loss to deal efficiently with less profuse supplies. The charwoman variety is recruited from other employments besides domestic service. They arrive at their empire of the broom by diverse routes. Some of them have been workers at a laundry, others found employment in factories of all descriptions, being often the flotsam and jetsam of industrial life. Some few spring from the lower middle class—wives and daughters of small tradesmen fallen on evil days—and yet a small percentage have once occupied positions as housekeepers, cooks, having been well trained in their respective duties.

Monotonous as the life perhaps is, and wearing as are the hours, the fact remains that domestic service is far better fitted, both to the physique and special characteristics of women, than other employments that necessitate separation from that atmosphere of home wherein the qualities of woman find their best expression and encouragement.

THE MOON-PATH

RISES the moon, and on the distant line,
Jagging the yellow-blue with serried edge,
Trees, and a tall church-steeple-wedge,
And a clock striking nine.

Stands there a house, a mirror for her queen.
Still mounts the moon and silent hangs aloft,
Great, mellow, rounded, soft,
And the air grows keen.

Arching her path, she crosses, and the blue
Yellows, and her face grows wanly pale.
Night after night she tells the tale—
She's telling it anew.

Comes then the dawn, and snowflakes fall around;
Falls down the Lamp towards the bitter west.
Run is her race, and now to rest—
The sun's above ground!

E. W. ALEXANDER.

EMILE VANDERVELDE AND THE BELGIAN STRIKE * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

EUROPE is following with rapt attention and anxious interest the vicissitudes of the tremendous struggle which is paralysing the industries of the most industrious and the most populous nation of the world. We are all wondering what might happen if, on the one hand, the whole army of Belgian workers were to be eventually mobilised, and if, on the other hand, the Conservative Government maintained its determination not to give in. A similar struggle some years ago led to armed conflict in the streets, and the last electoral reform was only obtained at the cost of civil war and bloodshed.

I.

There are many elements of danger in the present crisis, but there is one important safeguard, namely, the personality and statesmanship of the eminent Socialist leader, whose name is inscribed at the head of this page. Emile Vandervelde has steered the Belgian Socialists through many a difficulty in the past. It may be that the present difficulties may prove greater than any hitherto encountered. But there are many reasons to believe that once more his moral authority, his clear vision, his diplomatic skill, will prevail in the councils of his party.

II.

Twenty years ago I used to see a great deal of Vandervelde in Brussels. On one occasion, which proved to be historic, I had a sharp but courteous encounter with him at a stormy gathering at the University of Brussels—a gathering which led to student riots, to the closing of the old Liberal University (which had committed the crime, unpardonable in Socialist eyes, of offering me its Chair of Philosophy), and which eventually led to the foundation of a rival Socialist University of which Vandervelde is still to-day the most brilliant ornament. In those early days, both Vandervelde and the party which he was already leading were young, and inspired with the extravagant hopes of youth. Electoral reform had just been granted. The Liberal party had been crushed, and there were many who prophesied that the Socialist party was going to take its place, and that, before five years were over, Vandervelde would be Prime Minister in a new Collectivist administration, and perhaps president of a regenerate Belgian Republic!

It is true that Vandervelde has fought many a battle against old King Leopold, but he is not yet President of a Belgian Republic! Pessimists might even contend that to-day it is the Socialist party that has become older, and that with the advent of King Albert it is the monarchy which has become rejuvenated. Nor can it be said that there are many prospects of Vandervelde becoming Prime Minister in the immediate future, nor even of his becoming a Socialist member in a Radical administration, like Millerand in France, and John Burns in England. The Conservative Government has been at the helm for twenty-nine years, probably the longest lease of power ever granted to any party in the history of Parliamentary Government. And that Belgian Conservative Government may remain in power for many years to come!

III.

And yet although Socialists have not become the governing party in Belgium, although Emile Vander-velde has not been asked to form or join any administration, no one would say that he has disappointed the expectations of those who, twenty years ago, cast his political horoscope, and who predicted a brilliant future for him. If he has not become Prime Minister of Belgium, he has become something greater. He has become, namely, one of the two or three controlling forces in Continental Socialism, one of the commanding personalities of the political world of to-day.

He is a powerful speaker. He possesses in a supreme degree gifts which are generally mutually exclusive. He is a formidable debater in Parliament, and a magnificent platform orator, capable of swaying popular audiences. But, above all, he is one of the clearest brains in present-day politics. His books have influenced countless thousands. At International Congresses he is looked up to by "comrades" of every country, and his name is one to conjure with. Those who are acquainted with Continental Socialism from the inside, know that if Jaurès may be considered as the oratorical genius of the party, if Bebel has been its organising genius, Vandervelde is pre-eminently the controlling brain in the Socialist Triumvirate.

IV.

The continued leadership of Emile Vandervelde in Belgian and International Socialism is a tribute not only to himself but to his followers, and compels us to revise all our preconceived notions on the relations between leaders and men in modern democracy. We are constantly being told that modern democracy is devoured by ignoble envy, and must necessarily be a leveller of all superiorities. Yet here we have poor and illiterate Belgian workmen giving their confidence and choosing for their chief, a man endowed with every one of the advantages of which they themselves are bereft, endowed with every superiority of wealth, of leisure, of intellectual gifts, and of social standing.

Again, we are constantly told that a Socialist leader must needs be a demagogue, that his main function is to stir up the feelings and the passions of the men. Yet here we have a leader who is, above all, a pure intellect, whose strength lies not on the hustings, but in the library, who never appeals to passion, and always appeals to argument, and whose policy for twenty years has been, not to inflame, but to educate, to moderate, and to restrain.

When the history of the Belgian Labour Party comes to be written, it will appear that again and again Vandervelde has been the sobering influence, that again and again, but for him, civil war would have been let loose. Belgian Socialists may protest against that restraining policy, they may advocate a policy of "Thorough." They may grumble, as Napoleon's Old Guard would grumble: "ils grognaient mais ils suivaient toujours." Emile Vandervelde's Socialist Guard have grumbled, but for twenty years they have followed him.

V.

In the early nineties, when Emile Vandervelde was hailed as the Belgian Lassalle, I once took him to visit the veteran statesman, Frère-Orban, who was the Belgian Bismarck, or, rather, the Belgian Gladstone (and, in my opinion, a much bigger man than Gladstone), who for more than half a century directed the fortunes of the Liberal party. Frère-Orban had just been beaten in his own stronghold of Liège by Vandervelde's Socialist friends, and the Grand Old Man had practically retired from politics. It was a curious meeting; Frère-Orban was contemptuously condescending, Vandervelde was deferential and even respectful. Vandervelde wanted to argue, Frère-Orban refused to argue, and only shook his magnificent Olympian head. On the issue of the meeting, I asked the statesman what he thought of his young adversary. Frère-Orban summed up his opinion in one phrase: "He is undoubtedly amazingly clever, but I do not trust him."

It was the first time I heard the phrase. Since then I have heard it expressed again and again by Vandervelde's political opponents. Those who are acquainted with the Socialist leader know the unfairness of such a judgment. It is too absurd for discussion. No man has given more convincing and more continuous proofs of his disinterestedness and integrity, of his singleness of purpose, of his lofty motives. Yet even absurd judgment must be explained. And the explanation in the present case can only be that, in the opinion of his opponents, Vandervelde is so amazingly clever that it seems inconceivable how he can have remained so long in the grip of so superficial a political doctrine. He is so clear headed and cool headed that, in their opinion, he ought to have long ago disentangled the confusions of the Socialist fallacies. He is not a fanatic, and it seems as if only a fanatic could have remained the prisoner of so narrow a creed.

VI.

A few weeks ago, Emile Vandervelde wrote in EVERYMAN an incisive article on the Land Question. It is a characteristic example of his work. It shows both the strength and the weakness of the Belgian thinker. It is lucid. It is admirably informed. It states with scrupulous fairness the arguments on the other side. Yet somehow one feels that something essential is missing. It is true as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough, and especially it does not go deep enough, it does not go down to the bottom rock of human nature.

Vandervelde's argument is generally restricted to economics, it seldom touches on ethics, except for his advocacy of temperance reform. It always enlightens us. It does not inspire us with enthusiasm. It does not touch the soul. He does not believe in the Gospel according to St. Mark. But he continues to believe in the Gospel according to St. Marx. He does not believe in the elemental facts of human motive, of human instinct and aspiration, in the eternal verities of family or property, of poetry or religion. He, like the naive and candid artisans of Belgium, still believes that the millions can only be made happy, and must infallibly be made happy, by Act of Parliament, by the virtue of manhood suffrage and womanhood suffrage, and by the automatic machinery of a State bureaucracy.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?

A CRITICISM OF MR. BLAND

"THE à priori method," says Mr. Bland, "is a perfectly sound and safe method if carefully pursued." True, but the pity is that Mr. Bland has signally failed to observe his own maxim. The principal canon for the right use of the à priori method in such inquiries is constantly to check your deductions by comparison with the facts, where facts are available. Now, despite Mr. Bland, there are facts by which we can test our conclusions in this matter, and a study of these facts would show that his argument is of questionable soundness.

The fault of Mr. Bland's theory is that, if true, it proves too much. If we accept his reasoning, not only must we believe that the human brain is now deteriorating, but that all the greatest brain-work of the world has been done in periods of brain-degeneracy. The eras of greatest and most fruitful intellectual activity—the age of Pericles, the Italian Renaissance, the age of Elizabeth, the Teutonic Renaissance, the age of mechanical invention and scientific progress—have all been times "when the struggle for life—actual, individual life—(had) ceased to be severe enough to ensure actual death to all those, and to the offspring of all those," who had not the advantage of superior brains. Hence, if we accept Mr. Bland's sweeping logic, the fruits of these great and spacious days are the product of brain-degeneracy!

The truth, surely, is not far to seek. In order that the higher activities of mind may arise at all, it is necessary that the crude struggle for life should be mitigated. So long as man's energies are absorbed in the endeavour to defend himself against the attacks of enemies, or in the constant, unremitting struggle to provide the means of sustaining life, no great intellectual advances are possible. Progress is infinitely slow, and is confined almost entirely to the means of supplying physical wants. It is only when man's conquest of his environment has proceeded far enough to enable him to gather material resources sufficient to keep at arm's length the fierce struggle for life that the higher intellectual progress can begin. This applies not only to progress in the arts, science, literature, and philosophy, but even to those forms of material progress in which the fruit of inventive ability is reaped by Society rather than by the inventor. To this fact, namely, that many modern inventions cannot yield an immediate return to the individual inventors, as did the simple contrivances of Mr. Bland's primeval man, is due the frequently hard lot of the man of inventive talent which Mr. Bland laments, and which can only be remedied by an increase in that mutual aid and co-operation which he seems to deplore as tending to increase the number of persons of average or under-average ability.

It is true that mutual aid gives the average man a better chance, but it is also true that many a child of genius has been as much indebted to it for the opportunity of reaching maturity as any village idiot. For, despite Mr. Bland's rhetoric, the struggle for life is still keen enough to prevent many men of genius, whose genius is not of the money-making type, from securing not merely the easy-chairs of life, but the very means of subsistence, and without mutual aid the world would be robbed of the fruits of their genius.

Mr. Bland proposes that Society should breed brains. When he can give us some evidence of the fitness of Society to undertake this task, it may be worth consideration. Would the most brilliant and conscientious "brain-breeder" have been able to select suitable parents to beget the author of the "Contrat Social" and "Emile"? Would he have seen in the Cockney ostler and his consumptive wife likely parents for the author of "Hyperion"? Would he have recognised in Sir Timothy Shelley the future father of the author of "Alastor"? Would he have fixed upon the author of the "Curiosities of Literature" to beget the creator of the modern Conservative party? I am afraid not.

A. M. S.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

THE ÆNEID * * * BY PROF. J. S. PHILLIMORE

MONARCHIES, new and old, need prestige, and the poets, to whose divine simplicity, as to that of good women and of good priests, a certain snobbism belongs, have rarely failed to supply the commissioned glammers. A self-seeking despot like Cromwell could command the too facile or fanatical pens of Milton, Marvell, and the boy Dryden. When Octavian founded, almost unwittingly, the beneficent autocracy which we call the Roman Empire, he began, too, as a "Lord General." This title is the aptest translation that you could find for the word Imperator. He was in no sense an usurper, nor was he, like Cromwell, the too-powerful soldier of a new plutocracy, who, from being their bully, became their master: his monarchy meant protection for the poor against the rich. Even had Augustus, whose worst vices were a cold-bloodedness which readily froze into cruelty and a quattucento recklessness, cynical and ferocious, on the sentimental side, been as morally leprous with hypocrisy as Cromwell, yet a poet might be pardoned for idolising the prematurely wise head and the strong hand which gave Italy peace after three generations of civil war. And the poets were not of the old order, nor Roman born. If our Parliament were abolished to-morrow, our literature would welcome the new régime—say, a strong popular monarchy—quite gaily, save for a few elegant philippics from the surviving Whigs whose family privileges would disappear. Literature maintains few long loyalties. And why, indeed, should an Apulian, an Umbrian, a Venetian, have many tears to spend on the fallen Senatorial Oligarchy? The note of thankfulness, appeasement, and renaissance which rings in all the Augustan poetry is no more a courtier's simulation than the holiday mood of 1660 in England.

The national reconciling, consolidating tendency of Augustus's principate required for its panegyrist one in whom a proper sense of past, present, and future should be most rarely tempered. Mere antiquarian regrets, mere political modernism, mere windy idealism—none of these could furnish the man who was to express Rome as caput orbis, as pulcherrima verum, as the Mother City. And what an analogy leaps to Augustus and his work when we hear Virgil described in Pope's sentence: "Virgil's great judgment appears in putting things together; and in his picking gold out of the dunghill of the old Roman writers." Even such was Augustus's statesmanship. And, again, when Dryden says of Virgil that he has "all the majesty of a lawful prince," how he suggests the very service which the Augustan poets, and Virgil in chief, rendered sincerely to the new throne.

When Propertius, already cognisant of the advance parts of "The Æneid," saluted the coming masterpiece in his famous lines:—

"Room for the Roman! Room, you Greeks!
For now a greater poet speaks;
Such verse shall now be born
As puts Troy Tale to scorn"—

he voiced a genuine enthusiasm of friendship and admiration, but perhaps also of relief. All the poets were so tired of hearing themselves invited to consecrate the new régime in Epic, regardless of their particular aptitudes for other literary forms. Here, at last, was Virgil, who would acquit all the rest!

Never has a poet been challenged to rise to so great an occasion. Rome was renewing herself in peace under the wise and humane administration of one in whom (as Brunetière says of Louis XIV.) the nation could recognise and admire its own best qualities typified. The language was just topping the edge of that plateau of perfection which runs along from Cicero to Augustine. Poetry had been brought by Catullus and Lucretius to that point just short of absolute technical mastery. The little surviving awkwardnesses seem to add a charm of self-unconsciousness and freshness, which maturity itself can hardly match: just the difference between the foliage of May and the foliage of June. Historians and antiquarians had been busy about the origins of Rome; others had prepared the Trojan legend for the poet's hand, as old Varro's homely, racy treatise had prepared for the Georgics. Now at last, now for the first time, it could truly be asserted that Latin workmanship in language was superior to Greek. The period of 200 years' pupilage was over. The torch passed.

It is a thrice-told tale how Virgil, on his deathbed, ordered his "Æneid" to be destroyed, and the Emperor overruled his instructions, charging the two executors to publish it as it was, with no more repointing than was needed to save the unfinished parts of the structure from looking quite ruinous. The major part was already finished; some books had been read to Augustus years before. That Virgil should be so disgusted with the results of eleven years' labour as to wish it destroyed we may set down partly to his extreme fastidiousness, which required endless processes of reduction and refinement before the material should be passed as finished, and partly to his eager, curious, spiritual restlessness. "To change is to live," said Newman, "and to change often is to be perfect." A wonderful change is visible between Virgil's playful "Juvenilia" and "The Æneid." Only in a quite recent study has the real significance of Virgil's conversion from Epicureanism to a Stoico-Platonism been thrown into due relief. As Mr. Garrod (in "English Literature and the Classics," Essay VI.) well observes, "It would startle us to learn that Milton was a Puritan in 'Paradise Lost' and a Catholic in 'Paradise Regained.' We should feel that here was a fact of supreme importance for criticism. Well, the man who wrote 'The Æneid' is a man who has undergone a conversion not much dissimilar to that which I am supposing for Milton."

Virgil's path had led him round such a curve that the experiences of a dozen years ago were grown untrue and unmeaning; his mind had changed, and so had even his manner as an artist: his ear now discerned the music he had made in those bygone stages. What was finished of his great poem now stood for a dead self in which he took little interest.

Of "The Æneid," more than most poems, it may be said that the best preparation for reading it is not to study its real or supposed origins, but to follow up the long and broad wake of glory which leads from us back to him, and on which Dante is the great measuring-point. If you cannot read both Dante and the Greek models which Virgil used, then rather read Dante and let the Greeks be. Approach him through Tennyson, through Milton, through Spenser, but, above all, approach him through Dryden. Dryden's "Discourse on Epick Poetry" is delightful for all reasons, but the singular charm of it is Dryden's frank confessions; what beauties he recognised, and especially attempted, with better or worse success to his own thinking, to reproduce; and by what expedients. The humblest critic gets a better notion of an author's greatness by trying his hand at practice of the craft, on however small a scale, than by many readings. And when we have a great critic who is also a great poet we may learn secrets which the masters seldom betray. "I am the first Englishman," he says, "perhaps, who made it his design to copy him in his numbers, his choice of words, and his placing them for the sweetness of the sound." And again, "Taking all the materials of this divine author, I have endeavoured to make Virgil speak such English as he would himself have spoken, if he had been born in England and in this present age."

This principle authorises a new translation as often as any great enough change befalls our language and the diction of poetry; but, despite this, Dryden remains incomparably the best medium for those to taste him in who have not the Latin. For, though other modern versions may aim at more detailed exactness of rendering, Dryden alone carries the guns of a great poet: he alone has the force to compensate for weaknesses by sometimes rising superior to his original; and, above all, he alone congenially recognises the humour of Virgil. Were the Latin to be lost, Dryden's "Virgil" would remain a first-rate poem, and he would gain lustre by the advantage which Fitzgerald enjoys in his "Rubáiyát."

And now let us survey in brief the enormous difficulties which challenged Virgil's skill in management. He must all the time be under fire of comparison with Homer, picking his way between "Iliad" and "Odyssey," sometimes translating, sometimes alluding, but never ignoring. In purely epical qualities nobody will rank him above Homer; but he is richer than Homer by the measure of what the Attic drama had deduced from Homer. Indeed, the riches of Virgil is the quality in which he remains unrivalled. To expound him needs half a dozen different commentators—a Servius to explain the local, ritual, antiquarian wealth of his Italian inheritance; a Donatus to exhibit his greatness from the point of view of Rhetoric—and how many more? You can take a delightful experience by reading Virgil merely for the sound, for the marvellous orchestration of vowels and consonants. R. L. Stevenson's paper on "Some Formal Elements of Style" will furnish the clue. But to return. Whether he really set himself consciously to portray Augustus in the feature of Æneas is doubtful. Without that his difficulty was great enough. Epic, when it reappeared after the great movement of Tragedy was over, was Romantic Epic. Jason and Medea beset his path. And yet he must make his hero, not a romantic adventurer, but a pioneer, a founder, a law-giver.

Was Dido meant to be a prototype of Cleopatra? He confesses it to the initiated by the handshake of an echoed phrase. That analogy could hardly be escaped. He must, in any case, treat her as the beguiling enchantress, the incarnate temptation of a mere private passion to deflect the chosen leader from his duty and his destiny. "The ladies," says Dryden, "will make a numerous party against Æneas for being false in love." And all the romantic sentiment which has belittled Virgil during the last century has centred upon his desertion of Dido. Mr. Garrod (in the paper already quoted) pleasantly contends that the subconscious Celt in "The Mantuan" forced him to put Dido in the right and Æneas in the wrong, despite his purpose. So the Alexandrians would have said, for whom All for Love was a first principle, since they had neither creed nor country; so said mediæval and modern dilettantism, singing madrigals for the bower. But not so Virgil. For his Æneas (whether or no he is "a character of perfect virtue") at least was not one who would sacrifice all for a passionate égoïsme à deux.

But it was no light matter to make a religious hero into a hero of Epic. Nobody has succeeded with David, and there are points of contact between David and Æneas. Certainly the mere consecration of defeat and failure (which Sophocles divined) gives us a bias for Homer's Hector and for Virgil's Turnus, against which we have not the patriotic sympathy of a Greek for Achilles, and a Roman for Æneas, to put in counterpoise. The muse of Tragedy prefers St. Helene to the Tuileries; she triumphs in morally reversing the verdict of fact. And thus far we are all Celts.

To see that gorgeous episode of Dido in a true light we must go back to that simple remark of Servius, who says of Book IV., "The style is almost that of Comedy: and naturally so, for it deals with love." Does that strike you as cynical paradox? If so, it is the measure of perversion in your attitude. A pathetic episode, but only an episode: for it concerns mere individual passion, proper in private persons, but not in those who cannot call their lives their own, but are dedicated to a divine mission; not to one who is in Donatus's great phrase, "animum gereus reipublice necessarium," i.e., has about him the mind without which the Republic cannot exist.

The Christian ages were not mistaken in feeling that Virgil was instinct with potential Christianity. He gathered up in his poem all the riches of fullness of the old civilisation, ready to be poured into a new channel.

APRIL GOLD

INTO the town, from heath and wold,
The quickening winds are borne;
The meanest streets are paved with gold
This golden April morn.
The very rumble of the carts
Is melody to-day,
And sunshine gilds the lowliest heart,
Fashioned of London clay.

The city sparrows' hungry din
Takes on a rural note;
And wakes less hideous echoes in
A happier huckster's throat.
Forsaken babes that sprawl and dance,
Less pitiful are seen:
And daffodils from smiling France
Still smile in Bethnal Green.

Out here, beneath the Bridge, behold
Where crept the sluggish Thames,
'A molten tide of sheerest gold
'Ablaze with flashing gems.
With dazzled eyes we turn away,
Elate and wondering. . . .
Oh, God! To feel our hearts obey
The alchemy of Spring.

—ARTHUR STANLEY.

THE POETRY OF DONNE* BY PROF. GEORGE SAINTSBURY

THERE are some books of which it is at once the glory and the disadvantage that their full excellence can only be understood by experts, and of these Professor Grierson's "Donne" is certainly one. The amount of pains which have been, and must have been, spent upon the book is only paralleled by the need that there was of the work being done. Although estimates of the positive value of Donne as a poet have varied very much, there has hardly been a time, even in the most unlikely period, when he has not attracted the admiration of the competent from the most curiously different points of view. Yet his text and canon have, without exception, been in the worst condition suffered by any great English writer. He would not apparently let us have any authentic printed form; while at the same time his immense popularity and authority multiplied, beyond all reason and measure, those manuscript copies which are almost peculiar in their special kind to the earlier seventeenth century, and which compensate the benefit of preserving things otherwise likely to perish by the drawback of preserving them with the most irresponsible variations, and not seldom with differences of attribution of the most bewildering character. Whether a certain poet wrote certain things, and, if he wrote them, in what form he most probably let them go forth, are questions which present themselves in the case of not a few seventeenth-century writers; but in none are these questions of such importance, and in such a tangled condition, as in the case of Donne.

With the problem, not of finally settling all questions concerned (that would need a doubly "metaphysical" aid), but of disentangling the tangle as much as possible, and setting things clearly before the student, Professor Grierson has busied himself. Having first dealt with the matter incidentally in the volume of a general history, Messrs. Blackwood's "Periods of European Literature," which dealt with the earlier seventeenth century, he was induced to tackle the text itself, both in its printed and its MS. forms. In one sense, of course, such a proceeding can never be final. Probability is the utmost that can be attained: and this probability will present itself differently to different students of the facts. But the important point is that, before Professor Grierson's work, it was impossible, not merely for ordinary lovers of poetry, but for professed students of it, to get at the facts themselves without an immense and (except in the case of those who had time, money, sufficient equipment, and practised good will entirely at their own disposal) an impossible effort. We had more than one recent (or comparatively recent) edition of Donne which possessed merit, but none which aimed at presenting a full apparatus criticus as this does.

A book of this kind divides itself, as naturally as some other things, into three parts. There are the editor's critical remarks, which, of course, are, like all critical remarks, for its readers to accept or not, as they choose; but which have, as all critical remarks should have, an intrinsic interest and value. "Thus 'A' appeared to B." Then there is the estimation of genuineness, which, again, has a good deal of the personal in its equation. No sensible person will ever weigh internal against certain kinds of external evidence; but the extent to which strong internal evidence may be set against weak external, and the way in which internal evidence is to be estimated, will always be problematic. But here an editor may, if he takes the trouble, furnish inestimable assistance to everyone who comes after him by stating the facts of external evidence. And the value of such an edition rises still further under the third head. A text made out of the comparison of many different printed and manuscript sources can never, of course, acquire the satisfactory character of an autograph, or a book corrected and passed by the author. But if the sources are duly specified and critically arranged, if their various readings are properly classified and catalogued, then everything is put into the student's hands; he is admitted ad eundem with the editor himself, and what he will do further is entirely within his own discretion in the way of acceptance, rejection, or alteration.

It is long since any edition of an English poet has complied with the conditions indicated in the foregoing remarks as has this of Professor Grierson's. One may differ here and there with his criticisms; may feel inclined to add or subtract, or apply somewhat different standards of authenticity from his; may occasionally find a phrase or a fact at which it would be possible to cavil. For instance, he is, perhaps, not fully illuminative on the point when he says that Dryden, in applying for the first time the famous term "metaphysical" to Donne, meant only "philosophical." Dryden, though perhaps a scholar rather than a second hand, was a better one than is sometimes thought: and, as he has just pointedly contrasted Donne with the poets who confined themselves to "nature," it is clear that he used "metaphysical" in its proper original sense of "extra-" or "post-natural." But this is the merest trifle. There remains the fact, already referred to, that, by the most curious consent of the most different persons, Donne is one of the most remarkable of English poets. There remains, further, the fact that, according to some, he is one of the most strictly and purely poetical of these poets. There remains, thirdly, the fact that his text was in, perhaps, the worst condition. From this last state Professor Grierson has done more than all previous editors put together to rescue it and him. There are some who think that a Professor of Literature cannot possibly be better engaged than on such work, which benefits not merely his immediate students, not merely the company of students all over the country, and, indeed, the world, but Literature itself. Such "unlocking of the word-hoard" (in a much better sense than the old one) may bring little popularity and less profit in the vulgar sense. They may be stinted: "but not the praise."

INDEX AND BINDING CASES OF VOL. I.

It has been decided to issue the Title-page and Index to Vol. I. as a separate publication, which will be sent post free to any reader on application accompanied by 4d. in stamps. The first volume of EVERYMAN is now ready, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d. net, carriage paid 4s. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 8d. Numerous applications have already been received, and all those desirous of obtaining the first of what should prove a long series of interesting volumes should write at once to the EVERYMAN Publishing Dept., Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

* Donne's Poetical Works. Edited by H. J. C. Grierson, Chalmers Professor of English Literature in the University of Aberdeen. Two vols. (Oxford: 1912.)

LITERARY NOTES

CERTAINLY there has been no hurry in the preparation of the authorised biography of John Bright. That statesman died twenty-four years ago, and it is only now that his Life is announced as ready for publication. I am not aware who is responsible for such dilatoriness, but it is in striking contrast to the expedition with which the monumental biography of Gladstone was got ready. The Liberal leader's death took place in 1898, and before the end of 1903 Lord Morley's three bulky volumes were published. Moreover, if I remember correctly, Lord Morley did not enter upon his biographical labours for a considerable period after the death of his subject, so that the contrast is even more impressive than it seems.

There is this further to be said, that public interest in Bright has, for obvious reasons, appreciably declined during the long interval that has elapsed since his death. The whole political outlook has changed. Controversies in which he was most deeply concerned have either been settled or have ceased for some reason or other to interest us. To revive interest in him will therefore be no easy matter, but if any biographer is capable of doing this, it is Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, whose brilliant pen has made the personality of Garibaldi and the causes for which he fought intensely real for those of us who came after the Italian patriot's day. It is not often that a father and a son attain eminence as biographers, but this happens to be so in the case of Mr. Trevelyan, who is the son of the biographer of Macaulay. Mr. Trevelyan's "Life of Bright" will be published by Messrs. Constable next month.

About a year ago a slender volume of poems was heralded by the critics as the work of one worthy of a distinctive place among the best of our modern singers. The author was Mr. Gilbert Thomas, a young man but just out of his teens, and the volume bore the title of "Birds of Passage." I am glad to note that we are to have a new volume from Mr. Thomas's pen. It will be entitled "The Wayside Altar," and will be published shortly by Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

I should have thought it rather risky to publish a three-volume biography of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke at this time of day, but the Cambridge Press have had the courage. The work is entitled "The Life and Correspondence of Philip Yorke, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke," and the author is Mr. Philip C. Yorke, whom I take to be a descendant. The one thing that most people who are not lawyers remember about Lord Hardwicke is that he was an ally of Walpole, and that he abolished the notorious Fleet marriages. The sketch of him in Campbell's "Lives of the Lord Chancellor" is very inaccurate. As the present work is based on original papers and documents illustrating both the career of Hardwicke himself, and the whole history of the Georgian period from 1720 to 1764, it ought to be interesting.

The appearance in a revised and modernised form of "The Love Letters of a Worldly Woman" recalls a literary episode of some interest. The work was written some twenty years ago by Mrs. W. K. Clifford, the wife of the famous mathematician, and the authoress of many charming stories, and went immediately out of print. In America its success was even greater than on this side of the Atlantic, and there was a time when the book was sold at street corners.

On the Continent it also had considerable vogue, especially in France and Austria. With such phenomenal success the wonder is that the book was not reprinted. I cannot conceive of a publisher nowadays being so unmindful of his own interests. But whatever the reason, "The Love Letters of a Worldly Woman" is being given a new lease of life in Messrs. Constable's Pocket Edition Series.

I had occasion some time ago to remark upon the astonishing literary vitality of Mr. A. C. Benson. Only the other week he gave us a delightful volume of essays entitled "Along the Road," and now he has got another book ready, which Mr. Murray is to publish next month. It is called "Joyous Gard," and will exhibit Mr. Benson once more in a contemplative mood. The book recommends "a studied quietness and a cheerful serenity of life"—a most excellent gospel, but somewhat difficult to practise in these hurry-scurrying days.

Sir Harry Johnston, whose interesting biography of Livingstone many of us have been reading lately, is publishing through the Cambridge Press a work in which he propounds a system of phonetic spelling, mainly in characters derived from the Latin alphabet. Sir Harry has endeavoured to combine the best features of the most noteworthy "Standard Alphabets" of British, Anglo-Indian, French, and German authorities on phonetics, together with ideas of his own. Phonetic spelling is a subject which is coming more and more to the front, and I shall be surprised if Sir Harry Johnston's book does not contain plenty of material for reflection.

There has been but one English pope, and as the policy of the Curia precludes all hope of another, it is well that we should have a biography of Nicholas Breakspear, that remarkable Englishman, whose pontificate, bearing in mind the times in which he lived, did honour to himself and to the country to which he belonged. Messrs. Kegan Paul announce a Life of Adrian IV., from the pen of the Rev. Horace K. Mann, the last two volumes of whose "Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages" are now in the press.

Messrs. Macmillan make the interesting announcement that they will issue next month the first three volumes of "The Imperial Edition of the Works of Gilbert Parker." The edition is to be completed in eighteen volumes, and will contain six long novels, ten short novels, and some seven volumes of short stories, with one volume of verse, which includes, in addition to a "Lover's Diary," published in 1894, a collection of poems entitled "Embers," printed privately, and not hitherto issued to the public. A number of stories, published serially, but never reprinted in volume form, will also be included. Sir Gilbert Parker has written a general introduction to the whole edition, and a special introduction to each volume.

The same firm will also publish immediately the "Life of Octavia Hill as Told in her Letters," edited by her brother-in-law, Mr. C. Edmund Maurice. Miss Hill, who died only last year, is best remembered by her beneficent work among the London poor. In her early days she laboured under Maurice, and was supported in her enterprises by Ruskin. The book ought to throw an interesting sidelight upon the condition of the homes of the London poor two generations ago.

X. Y. Z.

THE KINEMA * * * BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

A FEW weeks ago in EVERYMAN I referred to picture palaces, and hinted that neither word in this title was well applied. They are, indeed, not palaces, any more than they are amphitheatres or cathedrals, and the objects exhibited in them have not the dignity and beauty of a real picture. I doubt if kinematograph shows can ever be beautiful, and it would be a pity if people imagined they were developing a taste for art because they frequented exhibitions of this kind; but none the less they may have a considerable scientific usefulness, and their educational function may prove to be very great.

By the way, what are we to call these things? "Kinematograph" is impossible—one of those hopeless words which only our scientific barbarians can invent. "Living pictures" is two words, and therefore will not live; besides, they are not living pictures. Such titles as "théâtre de luxe" are the mere vulgarity of advertisement. "Biograph" is not so bad, but it is rather flat. "Vitograph" is a horrid hybrid. Now, it is the general public that is always the best at finding names, and the people, if they succeed in throwing off the yoke of the pedants, always give us a good English word, which, though it may seem to begin as slang, may end in the poet's vocabulary. Such words are "tube" and "taxi," and I think in time we shall get over our prejudice against "phone" and "bike," and recognise that the genius of the English tongue has not done ill to their Greek originals. Perhaps the public will end by coining some jesting word like "fictures"; it may settle down into "kinnies," or it may be content to use three syllables and say "kinema."

But if it does, I hope it will retain the proper spelling and pronunciation so far, and not tolerate the mispronunciation of "cinema." It is bad enough to have a useless and ambiguous letter like "c," but don't let us drag it into new words, where it has no excuse. Lastly, if the word is to be "kinema," we shall doubtless refuse (and rightly) to listen to the schoolmasters, and shall pronounce it "kiněmă," and not "kinēma." The schoolmasters have mispronounced Latin and Greek too long for us to spoil what might be a decent English word at their behest. So kinema let it be, unless EVERYMAN will help with some better suggestions.

But this has been a long digression. I was about to speak of the educational power of the kinema. It will not take the place of art, it will not take the place of books, it can never be a theatre, and the great educational work which lies before the drama of the future will be just as much needed as ever. But there are some things which the kinema only can do. Those wonderful films of African wild beasts now on view in Holborn are an example. How delightful it is for animal lovers to go into the forest to photograph instead of to shoot, to bring back a film instead of a skin! "He is so fond of animals" used to mean that a man devoted his life to hunting and killing animals; but now the real animal lover shows a far greater skill, patience, and courage by lying in wait through long nights and days in the lone places which the wild things haunt. And, after all, if Browning be right in thinking that the business of art is to make us see what before we have only looked at, the kinema will in some departments be accomplishing much the same mission.

But the main educational value of this new thing that is now spread all over the world is that it provides a form of amusement which is always, to some extent, instructive, and which appeals to the unlearned, and to boys and girls, and to savages. It flourishes already among all the peoples of the earth; it has spread to the smallest towns; perhaps it will soon be as familiar an object even in villages as the public-house. It is becoming as universal as the inn, and a good deal cheaper. True, it will not produce the educated mind, any more than a newspaper can; it will not take the place of mental training and discipline, for it offers no discipline. But to those large sections of our population who have had little possibility of amusement except drinking, what a revolution of opportunity does the kinema give! It is not, to my mind, a very stirring form of amusement; a little of it, one would think, should go a long way; and only when subjects of exceptional interest are on view is it very much worth while. But, at least, it makes no mental demands, and it is so cheap as to be within everyone's reach, and, as a matter of fact, people, and especially young people, do not seem to tire of it.

Instead of drinking, instead of playing cards, instead of gambling or pitch-and-toss, instead of becoming cross because there is nothing to do, people have now an attractive alternative at hand. And that attractive alternative, though it does not provide mental discipline, does generally leave the spectator with his mind a little widened, and often in possession of some bit of knowledge which he did not possess before. This is surely a great gain, and may make a real difference in the future of mankind. Instead of demoralising or merely time-wasting amusements, we have something which is on the side of education, and in some measure is a diffuser of knowledge.

I can well imagine the lecturer, teacher, and preacher finding a much greater educational value than this in the kinema. The teacher or lecturer always finds it difficult to make his audience realise what he tries to explain, and the gift of awakening the imagination of one's hearers can never be a common one.

The preacher, too—how little his audience call up before their eyes the pictures which he is trying to describe to them! What an immense amount of talking goes on which is never understood at all, because it is so difficult to make anything clear, and so few in the audience really know anything, and so few speakers are endowed with magic! The kinema is helping, and it will help more in the future. If it is wisely controlled, and kept free from baseness, and used for beautiful and good ends, this wonderful invention may prove in its educational use a valuable asset for civilisation, as well as a powerful counter-attraction to vacant, sensual, and demoralising amusements.

KENSINGTON COLLEGE.

DIRECTOR'S TWENTY-SIXTH EASTER REPORT.

Five applications for the services of each qualified Student.

RAPIDLY GROWING DEMAND FOR LADY SECRETARIES.

Commercial Careers for 'Varsity and Public School Men.

We have been favoured by a copy of this interesting document, from which we learn that the past year has been by far the most prosperous in the history of the College. The unique distinctions of the Gold Medal and the Diploma of Honour for Secretarial and Commercial Training, awarded by the Jury of the Festival of Empire, 1911, to Kensington College, have now been duplicated by the Manchester Winter Exhibition, 1912-13.

During the first two months of term, an overwhelming number of applications was received for the services of Kensington College Graduates. Owing to the supply being unequal to the demand, it was only possible to partially satisfy it. Applications were for Resident Private Secretaries, some from Peeresses, one from an eminent Professor, other inquiries were from Clubs, Hospitals, well-known Journalists and Authors, and several from important City Companies.

In order to cope with the demand, it has been necessary to advertise again in the public Press, inviting applications from ex-Students of the College desirous of improving their position, but, from their point of view, it is doubtless satisfactory to be able to state that practically no response has been received; in fact, there is every reason to believe that not a single Graduate of Kensington College is unemployed, and further, that they have no wish to change their present satisfactory appointments.

During recent years several Students have been sent from College to positions in England and abroad, some even as far away as Japan, where Kensington College Students have started an English Ladies' Club.

The question of Commercial Careers for 'Varsity and Public School men is now engaging public attention. The College has during Term been successful in securing for a 'Varsity man an introduction to an important position at a commencing salary of £150, leading up to an Assistant Directorship at a salary of £500 and upwards.

Kensington College is described by Sir Samuel Evans as "a progressive Institution." We may venture to go further and style it an educational force that is probably doing more for the progress of English Commerce to-day than we can anticipate from armaments. Practical training for the practical duties of life is the keynote of all work at this powerful institution. So great is the demand for the services of its graduates that during the last twenty-six years—in fact, ever since it was established—every qualified student has had a choice of at least half a dozen dignified and remunerative appointments from which to select a congenial career; a striking testimony to the efficiency of the College training. The result of a recent investigation by the College Accountant shows that the applications from employers for the services of the College Graduates exceeded the number of candidates available in the proportion of one hundred to fifteen. In other words, fifteen students had a choice of no fewer than one hundred appointments between them.

A College with such a record commands the most serious consideration of everyone, and a knowledge of the secret of its success is a valuable asset to all who are interested in the future of England's sons and daughters. The utterances of eminent men assist us to probe that secret. The Earl of Lytton, when the full facts about the College were before him, found expression for his surprise in the phrase, "Have every hope all ye who enter here," an anti-theoretical variation of Dante's famous inscription. Lord Lytton's words have been adopted as the motto of the College. A Knight of the Legion of Honour and an ex-President of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris, when opening Winter Term recently, said, "As an Institution for the training of our future business men and women Kensington College stands first and foremost." Comment upon such pronouncements is superfluous; facts about the Institution which inspired them are more interesting and of greater value.

Kensington College was established twenty-six years ago, and during the last few years it has been located a short distance west of Paddington Station, at the corner of Gloucester Terrace and Bishop's Road, one of the most fashionable and healthy parts of the Metropolis. These premises, opened by Her Grace Katharine Duchess of Westminster, stand in their own grounds, every window faces trees or commands a view of beautiful gardens—an ideal situation for study. Modern languages hold a leading place among the subjects taught. Gratifying successes at the Examinations of the London Chamber of Commerce, the Royal Society of Arts, and other public bodies, testify to the thoroughness of the training in all departments of the curriculum.

The College watches over students' careers after they have left the Institution, assisting them to new appointments when necessary.

The Director is ever ready to give his advice on the subject of a suitable career for boy or girl personally or by post.

A card addressed to Miss E. V. Munford, Secretary, Kensington College, 34, Gloucester Gardens, London, W., will bring by return of post an Easter Report, an Illustrated Prospectus containing full particulars of the Guaranteed Appointment System, and an Illustrated Souvenir of the 21st anniversary, similar to those graciously accepted by Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, and Her Royal Highness Princess Louise Duchess of Argyll.

Students are now being enrolled for next term in order of receipt of their application.

Candidates desirous of Training under the only Gold Medal system extant, for a variety of appointments from which to select a congenial career, should write at once for Illustrated Prospectus and Souvenir, post free.

Mr. J. V. MUNFORD, F.R.C.I., M.R.S.A., Director,

Tel. No.: Pad. 4348.

34, Gloucester Gardens (Corner of Bishop's Road), Hyde Park, W.

A LAY SERMON ON THE ART OF READING, AND HOW TO DISTINGUISH A GOOD NOVEL FROM A BAD ONE

AS was explained in the "Message of EVERYMAN," one of the main purposes of this new journal is to give practical guidance to every student in his reading and interpretation of the masterpieces of literature.

It will be admitted that if it were really possible to give such practical guidance and helpful advice, if it were really possible to devise a simple and scientific method by which to develop our appreciation of what is best in world literature, it would repay our utmost efforts to master an instrument which would secure such invaluable results. For, after all, to acquire a critical judgment and appreciation of literature, to distinguish a good book from a bad, a great book from a mediocre one, must be the ultimate object of all literary education and culture. Even with the most elaborate University machinery, and with the most abundant stores of learning, if we have not acquired such literary appreciation, we shall still remain uncultivated and illiterate. On the contrary, even without any University apparatus and machinery, even if we had been debarred from all opportunities of a secondary or so-called higher education, and if, on the other hand, we have acquired the gift of literary appreciation, we shall thereby have achieved culture and education in the most real and vital sense of the word.

I.

Let us then take some representative work of fiction—for I shall restrict my analysis to the most prolific and the most universal form of contemporary literature—and let us approach some great novel both with a receptive and appreciative and with a discriminating and questioning mind. Before we can even attempt to formulate a competent judgment on that particular novel, it will be necessary to examine it in succession in every one of the following aspects: (1) The subject and substance of the book; (2) the plot or the story (3) the style and language; and (4) the characters.

A.—THE SUBJECT.

Considering first the subject and substance, it is obvious that there must be vast differences between one book and another.

(a) The subject may be trivial or it may be momentous, and the importance of the work must necessarily be estimated to some extent by the importance of the subject itself. You will probably find that the novels of Jane Austen, however perfect they may be as pictures of certain types of eighteenth-century English society, seldom touch the deeper side of human life. On the contrary, you will find novels like "Jane Eyre," like "Père Goriot," like "Don Quixote," are concerned with all the deeper problems of human destiny.

(b) Again, the subject may be either of transient or it may be of permanent interest. Thus the novels of Beaconsfield or Trollope are concerned with certain political or social conditions prevailing at a particular time, and their interest gradually vanishes and evaporates as the conditions which they describe are themselves passing away. On the contrary, novels like "Tom Jones," or "Crime and Punishment," or "War and Peace," are concerned with the eternal verities, with the abiding element in humanity.

(c) Or again, the subject may be treated in a spirit of human sympathy, it may be beneficent, inspiring, healthy, and health-giving; that is to say, it will be, in the truest sense, moral. Or it may be treated in a cynical spirit, it may be morbid, depressing, demoralising; that is to say, it will be, in the truest sense, immoral. Thus there is a vital difference between the healthy realism, let us say, of George Eliot or Dickens, and the debased view of human life which is the view of too many contemporary French novels of the Zola or the Maupassant type.

B.—THE PLOT OR THE STORY.

Passing on to the treatment of the plot or story, again we shall have to answer very definite questions which must affect our judgment of the literary value of a given novel.

(a) There may be either one plot or two, or many. Our interest will be either concentrated on one story, as in most classical works of art, or it will be diffused and dispersed over several stories. A duality or multiplicity of plots may sometimes, though rarely, add to the literary value of a novel, as in "War and Peace," if the plots are correlated, if one plot is so used as to set the other into stronger relief. On the other hand, if there is no correlation between them, if our attention is continually distracted, the multiplicity of the plots must necessarily detract from the artistic value of the novel.

(b) The plot may be simple and natural and inevitable, or it may be artificial and far-fetched. Some of the most perfect masterpieces of world literature have the simplest plot, and the maximum of effect is produced with the minimum of effort: thus in the novels of Jane Austen, George Eliot, or in the supreme Russian story-teller, Turgeniev. On the contrary, even a powerful masterpiece like "Les Misérables" is marred by the bewildering complication or impossibility or improbability of the story.

(c) Again, the story may either be skilfully or it may be clumsily constructed. It may be harmonious in all its parts, or it may be confused and chaotic. Events may develop logically, progressively, in rapid succession; the incidents may be ingeniously unfolded, and our interest may be kept in suspense until the end. On the other hand, the story may be erratic and aimless, rambling and discursive, wandering from the main point, drawn out to inordinate length. We may fail to see the forest for the trees.

(d) And, finally, the story of a novel may either exist for its own sake, and without any ulterior purpose, or the story may be kept in strict subordination to the study of character. There may only be a succession of stirring episodes and romantic adventures, as in the novels of Dumas. Or the events may be so presented as to reveal human motive and character, and the plot, as in the novels of Sir Walter Scott, may be so constructed as to constantly bring out this action and reaction of character and circumstance. It is obvious that the latter plot, which subordinates incident to character, stands on a much higher artistic plane. Whereas the novels of incident and adventure are only intended to amuse, to relax, and to while away an idle hour, the novel of character is pregnant with meaning; it reveals the inmost secrets of the heart, teaches lessons of wisdom, and realises the ultimate purpose of art.

(To be continued.)

CARAVAN DAYS * * * BY GEORGE GOODCHILD

THOSE were happy days. How often have I sat in this darkened room and wished my feet could slide backwards down the slope of time, that I might live again those glorious years, tread again those flower-strewn pathways, hear again the rattle of harness and the creak of the axle.

There were many tears and many sorrows, but I lived in those days, and that is something.

There were cold, cheerless winters, when the keen air bit at my finger-tips and set the blood tingling in my veins; wet, miserable nights, when the ground was turned to slush and the water squelched in my boots. That the memory of those days should be so pleasant is not a little perplexing. I suspect that time has conjured with them in no small measure, garbed them with a mystical glory that never really was theirs—exaggerated the joys and almost forgotten the sorrows.

Jasper it is who shines brightest in my memory—Jasper and the things pertaining to him. Of the precise manner of his genesis into our camp I am still ignorant; I was ill at the time. I have a hazy notion that he nursed me through my delirium, a nasty nightmare with drums and trumpets as its subject. There were always drums and trumpets, all over the ceiling and walls—trumpets of uncertain size, and drums that swelled and swelled and then diminished into nothingness.

Jasper I saw as through a mist. I knew it was not my father, because the hands placed on my forehead were cooler than his could ever be. The face I could not see, because the optic portion of my brain refused a nearer focus than the opposite wall. At times my attendant Phantom would assume the most alarming proportions—grow so large that the whole caravan was filled with him, and I knew that if he got any bigger the walls must burst; and then I would scream, and down would come the cool hand again on my forehead.

There came a time when his features took more definite form, and I saw him as he really was—a great, broad-shouldered man in the midway of life, with grey eyes and scholarly features; no gipsy, that was obvious to me.

He was pessimistic in temperament—the greatest pessimist I ever knew. Nothing pleased him. He viewed life through a distorting kaleidoscope, never seeing it as it really was, magnifying the bad and refusing to acknowledge the good; and yet he had ideals—that was the strangest thing about him. Meditating on this point, I arrived at the probable solution. Those same ideals were in part responsible for his pessimism. He had built them too high—so high that, on seeking to determine their exact latitude, he quite overlooked the materially beautiful.

High up in the clouds they were—enveloped in a halo of uncertainty, but he never wished to drag them down, and that is why I loved him.

Discussing the subject with me, he would smile whimsically, and say, "Never you have ideals, Chris. All your life is spent in the pursuit of a will-o'-the-wisp across the desert of time—never realising that it may not be attained. Like the elusive tortoise of legendary fame, it has gone a little further when you arrive at where it was." Yet the things he spoke of so disparagingly he strove to instil into my own mind. From him I learned to read and write, to decline Latin nouns, and to recite "The Iliad" from the original text. He would sit and talk to me of things beautiful—great pictures by men long dead, gigantic symphonies which lifted their tremulant voices in sweet concord; sculpture by the ancient Greeks—statues by Praxiteles, whose marble limbs literally pulsated with life; and then he would damn the whole thing by some critical observation.

I gave him little enough in return for these wonders. From me he learned to make clothes pegs, and cooking pots from sheet-tin and solder. He had little skill in these matters, and we would laugh at the products of his labour—fat, clumsy pegs and saucepans which leaked.

The extent of our peregrinations was Bristol to Land's End. We traversed that glorious western coast year after year, always the same route, always the same camping ground. I see how beautiful were those journeys now that I take a retrospective glance. There were sweet flowers which grew wild along the hedgerows; honeysuckle which exhaled its perfumed breath with delicious persistence; foxgloves, a hundred on one tall stalk, shaking with silent laughter in the western wind—a tribute to creation.

Sometimes the wind blew in from the sea, sometimes from the land, but it was always good to breathe it and to feel its gentle pressure on the face. There were times when it blew hard—so hard that I thought the hair would go from my head—I never wore a cap, and Jasper would curse because the precious ashes would fly from his pipe.

Late autumn—that was the best time, when the earth discarded her bright costume to take upon her broad shoulders more sober apparel. The days were shorter and the evenings longer; there was less work to do—a great consideration to me, for I was always lazy.

My father would retire early, but Jasper would scrape together the remaining ashes of the fire and begin to talk, at first intermittently, then in more definite strain. He spoke of subjects in endless variety, delved deep into the past, brought before my wondering eyes processions of well-remembered ancients, whose hands wrought wonders when the world was younger, and whose deathless memorials mark epochs in the world's history. From Egypt I floated on wings of imagination to Persia; thence to Greece, where he laid before me the panorama of its great history, instilled into my mind the beauty of its arts; then sent me scuttling back over the centuries to more recent times, changing his theme as his mood dictated. He spoke of painting and music. On the latter subject he was particularly voluble. "Music hasn't begun yet, Chris," he whispered confidentially; "it never can begin while we restrict our tonal catalogue to some dozen octaves.

"I have heard a bird's song pitched so high that the fiddle's top note were but bass to it; sounds in nature so low that you might score ledger lines in dozens before you could fix their precise location. Can you conceive a sweeter symphony than a nightingale singing to the whispering trees? Your human creator of symphonies fixes his melody or theme, and then endeavours to weave around it an appropriate atmosphere. The nightingale ignores everything save its own sweet carolling. The woods and the trees do the rest, fixing a basis to the thing in their own incomparable fashion—a natural symphony; and they must needs be concordant—the song and the atmosphere—because the one is part of the other."

He kicked the fire into a blaze, lighted his pipe, and frowned. I knew he was raking over the nasty things

Can you Play Music at Sight?

If you cannot do so now, there is no reason why you should longer be deprived of this great pleasure. No longer need you envy those who take up any piece of music and play it really well at first sight.

The THELWALL Rapid System of SIGHT - READING enables you to do this as the result of A SINGLE COURSE OF LESSONS BY CORRESPONDENCE. The System has received the endorsement of some of the most distinguished musicians of the day.

Mr. LONDON RONALD'S endorsement of the System.
"You have my consent to use my name as being one who strongly approves of your system."

Dr. JOHN BORLAND, Musical Director of the Education Department of the L.C.C., says:
"I am in perfect agreement with practically all your method. You state you believe your method to be an improvement upon the ordinary system of training, but I think this is far too modest."

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE says:
"I do not think you require anything after Dr. Borland's excellent letter."

One important advantage is that the whole of the tuition can be received in your own home, at times convenient to yourself. Students also testify to the value of the system in such terms as these:—

"I am very glad I have taken your course. It has made all the difference to me."
"The lessons have made a tremendous difference in my ability to read at sight."

Send for particulars post free to—

THE PIANOFORTE SIGHT-READING SCHOOL,
157, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Swift Sure

3/9 spent with Achille Serre ensures a smarter appearance and longer life to your suit.

This has been proved by tens of thousands of smartly dressed men.

Our process turns a soiled and out-of-shape suit into a clean and new-looking one. We only take Four Days, and 3/9 is our fixed charge. Minor repairs are undertaken at very moderate prices.

Write for Illustrated Booklet and address of nearest Branch or Agent, who will collect and deliver free. Carriage paid one way on orders sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

in his mind, and was prepared for an outburst. It came.

"Creation serves us a dirty trick, doesn't it, Chris, boy? It sets our baby feet on this terrestrial sphere, allots to us a few weary years of existence, and then reveals to us, by means of indisputable tradition, that, be we not righteous—a quality in direct opposition to our natural inclinations—we must suffer accordingly, never deeming it fit or proper to inquire if it be our pleasure to live at all."

"But, Jasper," I ejaculated, "that is the argument of an unhealthy mind. There's plenty to live for. Haven't you sufficient 'joie de vivre'?"

"'Joie de vivre'!" he interrupted; "a palatable lie—a skeleton parading itself as the spirit of contentedness. It never did exist, save in the lower animal."

Argument was useless in the face of his present mood, so I left him to find his own peace of mind, if that were possible.

The autumn waned, and winter encroached on the land. Day by day we journeyed south, down those long Devon lanes, now robbed of their summer glory—over those great rolling hills but lately clad with purple bloom. St. Ives was our destination. It was less cold. There we would localise our wanderings till spring came and went, and the swallow heralded the summer's return.

So the years passed away. How many of them there may have been I cannot say, nor do I wish to ascertain. I would fain leave them as they are—shrouded with the cloak of delightful uncertainty. Of the happenings they contain, only the happiest survive, like holes in a black wall with the sun shining through.

Bristol marks the crisis of events. We had struck our camp early in the morning—it was midsummer day. There was no wind, and the heat of the previous day still hung heavy in the air. We entered the town from the western side, and meandered along the High Street, Jasper driving and my father and I walking behind. It was yet early, and business had not commenced.

From somewhere close at hand a bell struck the hour. I counted the slow beats, almost unconsciously. Eight! What a stifling day it would be. Already the heat was unbearable.

On the curb two men were standing. I had seen them before; for the life of me I could not think where.

As we approached one whispered something to the other, and they stepped over to us. The caravan stopped, and Jasper descended from his seat, his face deathly pale.

They spoke in low tones, and I could not hear all that was said, but I gathered the crux of the matter from one dreadful word which fell on my ear—Murder!

I was put in the witness box and asked innumerable questions. What could I say, save that I knew him to be a good man—that I loved him better than my father? Shameless confession! Fearing lest anything I might say should prejudice his case, I made guarded replies to the questions asked, a useless precaution. Nothing could make any difference. He was found guilty on his own confession.

He had committed the capital crime, and must pay the penalty—his own wife, too; but there were extenuating circumstances, so they condemned him to penal servitude for life.

He stood there in the dock—a murderer, a common felon. There was blood on his hands, and yet I cared not. He was good to me, and I'm glad to have known him—glad to have been his friend.

As they led him away he turned and looked at me—a look of unspeakable weariness that released the spring of my memory and sent my mind whirling back over the period of our friendship, and then I understood—understood his ever varying moods and wicked pessimism.

"Joie de vivre"—how he had mocked at those words. No wonder!

CORRESPONDENCE

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your able article upon the question of Enterprise in Business deals with only one omission in the Socialist argument. What of management, organisation, industry, initiative, to say nothing of character, loyalty, and other individual merits, all of which are more or less essential to success in modern business practice? What is the corrosive irony of Mr. Wells or the scintillating wit of Mr. G. Bernard Shaw but so much stupidity to practical business men, who in most cases are equally alive to the present social and economic conditions? But the Socialism of the leading propagandist never has, and never will, come to good business results. Why? Because its very essence is antagonistic to discipline, and without discipline all the essential qualities leading up to individual efforts are handicapped in the race for efficiency. It is the lack of discipline in every phase of juvenile life—especially the discipline of apprenticeship—which is largely responsible for the chaotic condition and helplessness of the working classes (so called) to-day.

Why, the Scout movement, with its well-recognised assistance in character building, is openly tabooed by Socialists. The fact is that the moment Socialists give cognisance to discipline, Socialism simultaneously disappears. Your correspondent "Railway Worker" points to the Post Office as an instance of public ownership, but does he really look upon this institution as an example of practical Socialism? Such an idea is utterly absurd. Why, it is a very school of discipline from beginning to end, and discipline, I repeat, is incompatible with Socialism. Your correspondent should be a good judge of railway efficiency, but, surely, surely he cannot consistently claim that because there are general managers who have graduated from the ranks that this is a triumph for Socialism. It is rather a triumph of individual effort—a virtue wholly inconsistent with Socialism.

Then comes the usual reference to the co-operative movement in farming, etc. There is no doubt that the co-operative principle is successful to-day in farming, and notably in the production of milk, and we shall very probably hear more of its success in due course; but co-operative farming is not Socialism. In turning towards the industrial co-operative societies, from an employee's point of view, it can scarcely be argued that they have materially benefited by the movement, for, judging by resolutions passed by their union in conference recently, they are not so well off as the employees of private firms. But perhaps "Railway Worker" refers more especially to the dividend-paying successes of the societies; if so, I hope he will not feel offended if I point out that they are not able to serve the public better (and often not so well) in the matter of value-giving as private traders, notwith-

FOOT'S

ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

Automatic Adjustable Back.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Player's Navy Mixture

IN THREE STRENGTHS.

MILD 5^d. per oz., MEDIUM 5^d. per oz.

WHITE LABEL 4½^d. per oz.

THE PENGUINS' DISCOVERY.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward testing samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

THE IMPERIAL TOBACCO CO. (OF GREAT BRITAIN & IRELAND) LTD.

The Novels of Mark Rutherford

Complete Edition, cloth, 1s. net per Volume.

"I will venture the prophecy that when the tale of the great Victorian writers is made up in the years to come, Mark Rutherford's name will lead all the rest."

—H. W. MASSINGHAM, in The Nation.

"The works of Mark Rutherford have done more for me by a great deal than the works of any other living author."

—Sir W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, in The British Weekly.

1. The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford.
2. Mark Rutherford's Deliverance.
3. The Revolution in Tanner's Lane.
4. Miriam's Schooling.
5. Clara Hopgood.
6. Catherine Furze.

ORDER FORM.

To.....

Please send me the six novels of Mark Rutherford as marked on this list, bound in cloth, at 1s. net each volume. I enclose P.O. value 6s. (post free 6s. 6d.) in payment.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London, and at all Booksellers'.

THE
ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by AUSTIN HARRISON

MAY, 1913

| | |
|---|--|
| Tea Sonnets Overruled (A Dramatic Study) This Poem Boccaccio The Red Grapes Blind Guides The Grocer's Boy The Flag of Ramilles Mr. Newton-Robinson's Poems Synthetic Mao The Gentle Art of Faking Furniture (II) The Month Play of the Month: "The Yellow Jacks" Books of the Month | G. Bernard Shaw Henri Fabre Walter Raleigh John Westroppe Norman Douglas H. M. Tomlinson Una Birch William Stebbing A. J. S. Herbert Cecilsky S. O. |
|---|--|

LONDON.
17-21, TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN

MONTHLY 1/- NET

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: 12/6 POST FREE

standing the low wages paid to their employees. The success of the whole movement is almost entirely due to the "dividend idea," which gives the management a safe plan to work upon, and permits a large covering profit to be made, because competition is practically non-existent. "Who, then, pays for this privileged position?" Why, its supporters, of course. The following little story is not without its bearing upon the point. A certain old lady called at the butchery department of a large co-operative store and asked if she could be supplied with a few bones for her dog. "Had they any?" Certainly they had, and the bones were produced. "How much?" queried the old lady. "Nothing," said the salesman. Whereupon the loyal co-operator sternly informed the salesman that she would report him to the society. "What for?" gasped the man. "What for, indeed! Why, because you have attempted to rob me of my dividend!"

You see the old lady was obsessed with an idea, as, indeed, many Socialists are, especially those who stand to some disadvantage in not coming into more practical touch with the actualities of business life, which teaches so thoroughly the fact that there is a world of difference between theory and practice.—I am, sir, etc.,
MANAGER FROM THE RANKS.
Glasgow.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In last week's issue "Railway Worker" commends the Post Office as a good example for private enterprise to imitate. This is strange advice for a worker to offer. Does he not know there are hundreds of postal servants profoundly dissatisfied with their conditions of labour, and this notwithstanding the fact that the service is run at a considerable profit? Every fair-minded man must admit that the efficiency of the Post Office is largely due to private enterprise. It seems to me that business enterprise is only possible under a capitalist system. The Socialist State would have to elect its railway managers, postal chiefs, and directors of men of all grades by public election. Now, we know from experience that the best men are not always chosen by this means. It often happens the most proficient and suitable men are cast aside without any valid reason. This would happen in the Socialist State, with the result that men of business enterprise would have to be content to grovel while the incompetent would rule.—I am, sir, etc.,

Upper Tooting, S.W.

INDIVIDUALIST.

THE ABOLITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—With regard to Mr. L. G. C. Money's article on "The Work that Must be Done" I don't quite follow his arguments and disagree with his dicta. The working classes he defines as "a most ungentlemanly institution." This reminds me of Sam Weller's story of the cook who called the cats'-meat man no gentleman, and his retort that it was a self-evident proposition. Mr. Money seems to cast aside altogether, or suppress, the fact that there is such a thing as brain labour as well as manual labour. Scholarships were never meant to be provided in order that the brightest youngsters might "cheerfully climb out of work into some soft-handed occupation."

I am astonished that Mr. Money should be seeking in vain for a sight of the working classes. If he got up early enough in the morning he would find trainloads of them, and, as to Kew Gardens on a Sunday, perhaps few of them are horticulturists.

The parent, the "member of Parliament" who wrote to Mr. Money as to a career for his child, surely did not expect a career without hard work—a "genteel occupation." The middle classes, the trading classes, the professional classes, must work nowadays with their brains as hard—nay, harder—than the manual workers. They have no eight hours' regulations, no trade unions. The unions are crippling the good all-round manual workers. I have lived for twenty years in Jersey, in the Channel Islands. Here a carpenter is an all-round man, and can turn his hand to any branch of carpentering or joinery. In England a man is boycotted by his union, forsooth, if he steps out of his groove. All honour to the working classes, say I, only give them a free hand. Their life has its compensations. They have no appearances to keep up, and get their pay regularly. Let the middle classes do more of their own manual work. I am not above blacking a pair of boots, fetching water, and sawing logs for the fire. The present system of higher education is wrong. Teach the lower classes reading, writing and arithmetic, and a trade.—I am, sir, etc., Jersey, April, 1913. ARTHUR HAILSTONE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It would, indeed, be presumption on my part if I attempted to criticise Mr. Chiozza Money's article on a subject of which he is such an experienced authority. But, at the same time, as I realise the importance of the good equipment of, and good provision for, those engaged in producing the necessities of our everyday life, I should like to thoroughly understand his argument and the meaning of some of his remarks, which to me, at any rate, appear somewhat illogical.

Firstly, he mentions that many parents wish their children to have "the right to avoid hard work," and that there must be a large margin of persons "engaged in avoiding necessary labour altogether," and refers to "those who escape work."

In each case the "hard work," "necessary labour," and "work" referred to is manual labour.

Now, surely there is other work, and hard work, too, besides manual labour? Does a clerk do no work? 'Am I a "drone" because I don't mend roads or build houses? If I want to build a house it is just as necessary to think how to build it and to draw the plan as it is to put one brick on top of another. Is not this also "Work that Must be Done"?

Secondly, he states "that every addition to the 'classes' . . . means the performance of undue work by others," and also that the "classes," by avoiding manual labour, "leave for the labourers little more than a bare subsistence"; and, again, the labouring boy asks himself, "Why pursue the excellent craft of joinery when it means poor pay and unemployment, while if you have a little common artfulness and care to exercise it, you can earn far more and be much more regularly employed in earning commissions?"

It naturally follows that if you overcrowd one class of workers from the ranks of another class the competition in the former class will increase, and consequently the wages will decrease, while the competition in the latter will decrease and the wages increase. In this way it follows that a scarcity of one class of workers is bound in time to adjust itself. How, then, can you complain of men leaving the craft of joinery (which is evidently overcrowded, since it means poor pay and unemployment) to join the ranks of those earning commissions (which is evidently understocked in comparison with joinery, since you get better pay and are more regularly employed)?

Thirdly, the tubes are not for the working classes.

How, then, is it that every one of the underground

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

The Largest Bookshop in the World.

All the best Books, English and Foreign, in every department of literature, at the lowest prices charged by any bookseller.

SEND A POSTCARD (mentioning "EVERYMAN") for any of the following:—

- Catalogue of Newly-published Books.
- Annotated Catalogue of Second hand and New Books at greatly reduced prices.
- Classified Catalogue of The Best Books on all subjects, at lowest cash prices.
- Catalogue of Books in Beautiful Bindings, suitable for presentation.
- Catalogues of Books in leading Foreign languages.
- Catalogue of the best Books for Boys and Girls.

All interested in GARDENING should write at once for our List of Seasonable Books on The GARDEN and The COUNTRY-SIDE

many of which are offered at greatly reduced prices.

ALL THE NEWEST AND MOST IMPORTANT BOOKS ARE INCLUDED IN THIS LIST.

AN UNEQUALLED CIRCULATING LIBRARY
 (PARTICULARS ON APPLICATION.)

376 to 384, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS

Another

12

Volumes

Cloth

6^{d.}

Net

A Library of New Books by Writers of Distinction, bringing within the reach of all the results of Modern Knowledge

- | | |
|---|--|
| 16. THE SCIENCE OF LIGHT By P. PHILLIPS, D.Sc. | 79. MEDIAEVAL SOCIALISM By BEDE JARRETT, O.P., M.A. |
| 20. YOUTH AND SEX: Dangers & Safeguards for Girls & Boys By MARY SCHARLIEB, M.D., M.S., & F. ARTHUR SIBLY, M.A., LL.D. | 87. CHARLES LAMB By FLORA MASSON |
| 28. ETHICS By Canon RASHDALL, D.Lit., F.B.A. | 96. GARDENING By A. CECIL BARTLETT |
| 33. THE OXFORD MOVEMENT By WILFRID WARD | 105. TRADE UNIONS By JOSEPH CLAYTON |
| 71. THE PROBLEM OF TRUTH By H. WILDON CARR | 108. SHELLEY By SYDNEY WATERLOW, M.A. |
| 75. JUDAISM By EPHRAIM LEVINE, M.A. | 110. BRITISH BIRDS (including Nests and Eggs), illustrated By F. B. KIRKMAN, B.A. |

"Here are volumes which throw open all the treasures of science, philosophy, history and literature, as they are known to scholars of the present generation, books which are planned to cover the whole range of knowledge, and summarise some particular branch in an easy and simple style that is sure to urge the reader to closer study of the subject. Was I not right in declaring that education is within everyone's reach to-day? With 'The People's Books' in hand there should be nobody of average intelligence unable to secure self-education. His library—this library—should be his all-sufficing university."—Sunday Times.

"The most amazing of all the issues of cheap books which have astonished our day and generation."—The Expository Times.

LONDON: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 67, Long Acre, W.C.
 And EDINBURGH And all Booksellers railways in London have workmen's trains running in the morning? You may, of course, travel for hours in the tubes without meeting labourers, if you choose the West-End tubes, and travel in the middle of the morning or afternoon. It would surely be wiser to look for them at the factories or the docks at that time.

Nor yet is Kew Gardens on a Sunday the rendezvous of the labouring classes in their "dirty clothes." Few labourers live at Richmond or Kew, and Mr. Chiozza Money is not, I presume, advocating unnecessary travelling on a Sunday. Victoria Park or Southwark Park should be, I imagine, a more likely place.

And, lastly, "boys and girls are not educated to fit them to be useful producers." I must point out that there are such institutions as industrial schools. I have not the statistics for the British Isles (save that in 1908-9 £200,000 was spent on them), but in London alone there are already nine of these schools. These figures are, of course, very low when we consider our enormous population, but still it is a beginning, and shows that some, at least, realise the importance of such education.—I am, sir, etc.,

Tulse Hill, S.W.

EDWARD A. ROE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your current issue Mr. Chiozza Money suggests a uniform working day of five hours. May I ask, Would the same wage be given to both the honest and the dishonest worker? If so, what will become of justice? If not, what will become of Mr. Money's prophecy as to the abolition of poverty?—I am, sir, etc.,

J. H. PROFIT.

Leytonstone, N.E., April 12th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been thinking over Mr. Chiozza Money's article, with this result: I ask myself how "The Work That Must Be Done" will ever get itself done unless there is a perfect army of inspectors to see that the workman, who is no longer a member of a class, but a free and independent being, does his task; and I fear these inspectors will not be drawn from the most estimable classes of society. Honest men would not like the job. Will lots be drawn, so that the most disagreeable jobs will not be thrust upon anyone without some show of justice? If a nobleman drew sewer work, would he be allowed to swop for a consideration?

Horace is never tired of telling us that the way to increase your wealth is to curb your desires. Care follows growing riches and the hunger for more. Are we really happier in the wearying pursuit of pleasure and racket and bustle of modern life? Is leisure worth having if we have never learnt how to employ it? But your last issue points to the true remedy for our social ills in the sketch of Dr. Chalmers's work, which a regenerate Scotland may be expected to carry on in a spirit of truly national fellowship.—I am, sir, etc.,

SESEX.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Chiozza Money appears to think that the sole object of leaving the industrial ranks is to avoid work, whereas, of course, it is to secure better pay. The community fixes the rate of remuneration according to the service rendered to itself and the rarity of the special kind of labour required. For instance, it will pay fabulous sums to the singer who possesses a voice that will charm more than any other, to the general who has the capacity to plan and the skill to win victories, or to the administrator who can rule wisely and well, though, according to Mr. Money, none of these do any work that counts.

The higher the civilisation the greater the realisation of the fact that head work is of more service to the race than hand work, and hence is worthy of larger remuneration.

Mr. Money includes transport workers amongst the producing class, but, according to his definition, it ought to be the horse or motor, rather than the man who directs the one or controls the other, that should receive the bigger pay, for it is surely he that has the "soft job" and the horse that does the effective work. Of course, the great fallacy of all those who, like Mr. Money, try to set class against class by extolling the manual worker and depreciating the brain worker is the artificial division of workers into two groups. No such separation is possible. Every hand worker must use his brain, and every head worker must use his hands. Only the greater the domination of the hands by the brain, the larger the service to the community of the work, and the more highly will it be paid. The skilled artisan deserves and receives more than the unskilled labourer, the organiser and controller of the works more than the clerk or messenger, who only does what he is told. The manufacturer is a producer just as truly as the minder of the loom, the farmer as the ploughman. All honest workers, whether they be labourers, artisans, clerks, merchants, manufacturers, farmers, lawyers, parsons, doctors, actors, authors, or statesmen, are producers, in that they either themselves aid in providing the necessaries of life or care for those who do. There are those who prey upon the workers, such as the financiers who make corners, the professional gamblers, the charlatans, the professional politicians, et hoc genus omne, who are not producers but destroyers, and who should be swept from the face of the earth. Wealth is unevenly distributed, and often unwisely spent, and officialdom is tending to absorb far too great a proportion of the national wealth; but surely the remedy is to remove the abuses and not to aim at lowering the ideal of work.

Finally, I would ask Mr. Money whether he expects the industrial workers to go to Kew Gardens on Sundays in their working clothes, or does he consider that there is some inherent distinction between the man or woman who works chiefly with his hands, or mainly with his brain, which makes it possible to recognise them as groups apart?—I am, sir, etc.,

H. J. CAMPBELL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—To make us a nation of "half-timers" would be to make confusion worse confounded, for not only would it do away with much of the economy of time and labour that follows on specialisation, but it would inevitably result in the deterioration of all the higher kinds of work.—I am, sir, etc.,

April 13th, 1913.

H. J. CAMPBELL.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The conclusion Mr. Bland arrives at is that human beings may be getting stronger, healthier, more cultured, better trained, more moral and compunctious than they were in the past, but cleverer—assuredly, no. And why? Because man has ceased to be primitive.

In the good old times a man had to be brainy. Unless specially gifted in this way he could not be sure of even the two dinners per week, and when a dainty morsel crossed his path a highly developed with 2 Artist-signed Proofs FREE.

(Continued on page 56.)

LAST FEW WEEKS

18-volume illustrated DICKENS

Only a few of these beautiful coloured proofs actually signed by Harry Furniss now remain, and we are presenting them free to a limited number of prompt subscribers to the Charles Dickens' Library. As they are autograph-signed by the Artist they will become more and more valuable as time goes on. You will receive the complete set of twelve colour proofs from which you can choose the two you like best and return the other ten to us at our expense. They will be art treasures in your home.

The Charles Dickens' Library is the finest illustrated edition of Dickens ever produced. It contains 1,100 illustrations, including those by Cruikshank and the other great original Dickens artists, as well as 500 original Dickens illustrations by Harry Furniss. To crown all, two Colour Proofs of Harry Furniss's masterly Dickens pictures (each signed by the Artist) will be presented to you free.

The entire series will be sent you carriage paid—then you can select the two you like best and send back the other ten at our expense.

These pictures are double mounted for framing. Overall size 20½ in. by 14½ in. They are just what you want for your Library, Study, or Dining-Room. As the number is limited, their value will increase yearly.

The Subjects are as follows :

1. Mr. Pecksniff leaving the Dragon.
2. Betsy Prigg and Mr. Gamp.
3. Marley's Ghost.
4. Meeting of the Pickwick Club.
5. Mr. Winkle as a Horseman.
6. "More."
7. Brimstone and Treacle.

8. Little Nell in the old Church.
9. Mr. Peggotty finds Emily at last.
10. Micawber achieves the downfall of Uriah Heep.
11. Mrs. Macstinger and Captain Cuttle.
12. Chadband at the Snagsbys'.

The 18-volume Charles Dickens Library will be a permanent source of delight in your home. What treasures of rich humanity the volumes contain! Just run over their titles:—

1. Sketches by Boz, pen-pictures of characters that live for ever.
2. The immortal Pickwick Papers, the most mirthful book ever written.
3. Oliver Twist, which exposed the stupidity and cruelty of Bumblefoot. The Child's History of England.
4. Nicholas Nickleby, which abolished the awful boarding-schools like Dotheboys Hall.
5. The Old Curiosity Shop, with its vision of "Little Nell," and Hard Times, brimful of social sympathies.
6. Barnaby Rudge, with its pictures of the "No-Popery" riots.
7. Martin Chuzzlewit. Who can forget Mrs. Gamp, Pecksniff, and Mark Tapley?
8. Christmas Books. "Dickens made Christmas."
9. Dombey and Son. What other writer could have created Capt. Cuttle?
10. David Copperfield. Dickens' favourite.
11. Bleak House, with its pictures of "the law's delays."
12. Little Dorrit. The Marshalsea Prison stands for ever in its pages.
13. Tale of Two Cities, with its story of the French Revolution. Also American Notes and Sketches from Italy.
14. Great Expectations, considered by Swinburne to be Dickens' masterpiece.
15. Our Mutual Friend, with Dickens' most elaborate plot.
16. Christmas Stories. Dickens gave to Christmas charity a warmth that will be felt throughout all time.
17. The Dickens Picture Book, containing some 600 reproductions of the work of the old master-illustrators.
18. The Dickens Companion. A unique and invaluable reference book to Dickens. It contains anecdotes of the master, a complete glossary of characters, a synopsis of every novel, and a literary chronology.

You must apply now to receive this famous Edition of Dickens with Furniss-signed proofs. Full particulars will be sent you free and post free on receipt of this Coupon.

What 5/- brings you

1. 16 Sumptuous Volumes of Dickens' completed Masterpieces, with 500 original illustrations by Harry Furniss. This is the only edition of Dickens illustrated throughout by Harry Furniss, "the Charles Dickens of illustrators."
2. The Dickens Picture Book (17th Volume), with some 600 illustrations by George Cruikshank, "Phiz," Cattermole, Leech, Doyle, Marcus Stone, etc., the original Dickens illustrators.
3. The Dickens' Companion (18th Volume), with carefully arranged stories, anecdotes and facts relating to Dickens and his works, unobtainable except in this Charles Dickens Library.
4. Two beautiful Artists' Colour Proofs of large size (20½ in. by 14½ in.), mounted in artistic double mounts ready for framing, and signed by the brilliant artist—Harry Furniss. Not printed with his signature, remember—but actually signed with his pen. You may choose two from the series of twelve of these Art Treasures which we shall send you. Then you can send the other ten back to us at our expense.

CLOSING OFFER COUPON.

To the Educational Book Co., Ltd., 17, New Bridge St., London, E.C.

Sirs,—Please send me per return full particulars showing how I can secure the 18-Volume Edition of Dickens' Works on first payment of 5/- with Two Colour Proofs of Dickens illustrations signed by Harry Furniss FREE.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Occupation.....

You can make sure of securing a set of the Charles Dickens Library and a pair of autographed Colour Proofs if you enclose your first subscription of 5/- now.

E.M.

faculty for making a quick lunch was desirable if the primitive inner man was to be saved from disappointment. That extra and deeper brain convolution which enabled a man to stop a leak in the roof is necessarily a thing of the past. Nowadays he would probably get into trouble if caught on the roof, and his family would certainly be uneasy as to his mental condition.

According to Mr. Bland's theory, one should have expected the hard lot of the curate and the clerk to give him some hope for the future. It is generally admitted they are two wretchedly paid men. I take it from the writer that they reproduce with astonishing rapidity and rear overflowing families. That being so, their struggle for bread, life, or existence, which, after all, amount to much the same thing, must be very real indeed. They must find it about as difficult as did their primitive forefathers to make both ends meet. In the case of the clerk the quick-lunch proclivity even does not seem to have been quite eradicated.

Some people might feel inclined to point out to Mr. Bland quite notable examples of brain development within recent times—Edison, Kelvin, Lister, and Marconi, for example. But these, perhaps, do not exhibit that rich convolution of brain so much to be desired.

After reading Mr. Bland's article one is convinced that the future hope of the world is not in man at all, but in that despised creature, the fox, which is proverbially most cunning and resourceful, and has never weakened these attributes by trifling with culture or morality.—I am, sir, etc., P. D. MUNRO.

Glasgow,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Surely Mr. Hubert Bland, in his interesting article on the above subject, is unduly pessimistic? We have only to review the mental work of, say, the last hundred years to find his à priori conclusions unsupported by facts. The evidence would seem to point to a progressive rather than a retrogressive movement in brain development; and, curiously enough, it is just in the matter of scientific inventiveness that this progressive development is most marked. This comparatively short period has witnessed a wealth of inventive and creative genius that has profoundly modified our whole social life; and this, too, without the impulse of the extinction alternative.

Is the extinction alternative an essential incentive to the kind of brain development required by modern civilisation? The nature of the quest and struggle for food of primitive man did certainly foster a species of brain growth, but it was a species vastly inferior and wholly inadequate to meet the demands of modern conditions. In the struggle for existence the modern man has not merely to circumvent his neighbour, but his circumventing must be more complex and accommodate itself to our improved notions of justice and humanity. While the primitive environment called for animal vitality and a certain level of intelligence, the modern environment demands of the would-be "survivor" not only a higher level of perceptual activity, but also of ideation and reflection. If the penalty of failure be less violent than formerly, it is at least unpleasant enough to make some "unfortunates" prefer self-extinction to a security of the bare necessities of life offered them by their now more humane brothers.

As Mr. Bland rightly points out, modernly regarded, the phrase "struggle for life" is a misnomer. It is not now so much a struggle for life as a struggle for the fullest life—or, as he himself puts it, "a scramble for easy-chairs." But this "scramble" is by no means the easy and comfortable process he would have us believe. One has only to turn one's hand to scientific invention or any of the professions or arts to quickly discover how much has already been done and how much brain capacity is needed if it is to be of the smallest "survival" value.

It is true that in this ill-ordered world fortunes sometimes go by favour rather than by merit; but it is by no means the majority who are able to evade the rigid and inflexible test of economic law.

But, if Mr. Bland's diagnosis is faulty, is not his remedy even more so? Granting his dismal conclusions, how can he hope for mentally or physically profitable results from unions in which the proper sex affinity is absent? Since, as he himself admits, men of conspicuous mental endowments almost invariably prefer to marry women intellectually inferior, how is the scientific brain culturist to overcome the difficulty? The treatment in the case of the lower animals is scarcely applicable here, since, broadly speaking, they are less exclusive, sexually, than man—less exclusive because the mind factor is less complex.—I am, sir, etc., F. C. CATTELL.

London, N.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your excellent number of April 11th there is one article which irritates me no less than it makes me think. I refer to Mr. Hubert Bland's "Is the Human Brain Degenerating?" I thank Mr. Bland for making me think, but I do thank him for irritating me.

His whole argument seems to hang on this, that brain degeneration is identical with social deterioration. Now, I agree with him in making such an identity, but I do not believe that he has given the proper value to each of his terms. According to him, if we have no life "push," that must necessarily imply a collective quantity of uncreative brain tissue, and vice versa.

First of all, in connection with his sigh for more creative capacity in brain power, Mr. Bland is a believer in natural selection, and yet he bemoans education as a factor in demolishing such selection. In this I entirely disagree. Through the whole of our modern education there is a growing passion for more definite specialisation. And what is specialisation but an outrageous form of natural selection? But more important still, is not this lust for excelling in one particular branch of learning exactly the state of mind conducive to creative results? Nowadays, it would appear, we must learn to find the world in a little division of its labour.

Secondly, Mr. Bland does not give a true meaning to progress. Does it not strike us all that we are getting past the days—thank heaven!—of selfish strife for daily existence, nonsensical strife for the mere pleasure of striving? As the writer points out, we have still a great deal of it. But why wish for more? In this great age of medicine those are not true optimists who cry, "The weak to the wall! Let us get back to the pagan period!" No, this is a new age, and I, for one, cannot believe with Mr. Bland that it is not an advanced age. It is, above all, an age of depth. We have never been so near the heart of things before, both scientifically and morally. I have dealt with the former of these; what of the latter?

Mr. Bland is unpoetic. We do not wish our youth to be so very sharp and self-centred. We want them to be broad-minded, healthy, and righteous. Away with grovelling cleverness! Lead our children to the

(Continued on page 58.)

HOW TO START IN JOURNALISM

By W. ASTON BASLAKE

THERE is, perhaps, no field of intellectual activity more universal in its appeal, or offering wider scope for the lucrative employment of one's leisure or whole time than the profession of journalism.

Most of us at one time or another feel a strong desire to express ourselves in print, and those who put the desire into practical effect, and are fortunate enough, or clever enough, to get their literary productions accepted, experience a keen intellectual pleasure which is in itself a sufficient reward for their labours.

But when to this pleasure is added the further satisfaction of receiving a cheque—for however small an amount—the beginner feels as a prospector might feel when he unearths his first nugget—he feels that there is an excellent chance of getting more nuggets from the same source. Similarly the budding author feels that having once produced a marketable commodity from his own brain there is no reason why he should not repeat the process.

But, as everyone must be aware, success at the first attempt is the exception rather than the rule, and the majority of those who have reached even the lower steps of the hill of Parnassus have done so at the expense of much bitter disappointment and weary waiting.

Their example need not, however, deter the aspirant for similar success from making the attempt; for if the reasons for preliminary failure be summarised and analysed, it will be found that in the majority of cases they are the same. That is to say that one man has failed at first from making precisely the same mistakes as were made by hundreds of others. But he has not had their experience to guide him, and so has had to buy his own experience—at the same price.

These mistakes are, however, avoidable by placing one's self under the direction of a capable and experienced instructor. There is no better course of instruction in the art of successful journalism than that provided by the Practical Correspondence College—the well-known institution situated in Thanet House, Strand. The method employed is essentially practical and thorough. The great success and popularity of the College is sufficient evidence on this point. The directors make a point of obtaining instructors who are of acknowledged eminence in their respective professions, and both the College and its numerous students are to be congratulated in having the services of Mr. T. Sharper Knowlson to personally conduct the Journalism Course. Mr. Knowlson's versatile genius and varied experience peculiarly fit him for setting the would-be writer on the right road to fame and fortune, and enabling him to avoid the many pitfalls which beset the path of the inexperienced.

The lessons are conducted entirely by correspondence—an admirable plan, which enables the student to do fuller justice to himself and to the instruction than would be possible by any other method.

The fees are extremely moderate, considering the exceptional value of the instruction, and every effort is made to enable the student to earn while learning. Many of the students have earned more than the entire fees before completing the course, and many others are now adding substantially to their incomes by devoting a portion of their leisure to what is undoubtedly one of the most delightful of all occupations.

The College will not accept a student unless reasonably sure of making him or her successful, and gives a free preliminary criticism of his or her work to every applicant. Full particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C.

Train Your Talent

What is your talent: is it writing, or drawing, or ideas? Train your talent—turn it to advantage. Don't waste your time at the desk or the counter when there is better work to be done and a bigger income to be gained. If you only knew the many opportunities open to the trained man or woman you would not hesitate to train your talent and apply it. We can train and qualify you for better work and a better income in your spare time at home; you need not leave your present situation until you have secured a better one.

You take no risk. Choose one of these

Five Well-paid Professions which most interests you, and send to us for a FREE ILLUSTRATED BOOK dealing with the facts and figures of that profession. We know that if you will give us the opportunity to lay our proofs before you, you will realise that you possess a bigger chance in life than you had ever hoped.

We can train and qualify you by correspondence in any of the following highly-paid professions:—

ADVERTISEMENT WRITING BLACK & WHITE ILLUSTRATING PRESS PHOTOGRAPHY
POSTER DESIGNING JOURNALISM

State clearly which profession you wish to investigate. Our system and methods are endorsed by all the leading newspapers and journals.

WRITE—SECRETARY,
PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY
AND

INEX-
PENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR MUSIC.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street E.C.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.—For Matriculation. B.A., B.Sc., and other examinations. Single subjects may be taken.—Address, Mr. J. Charleston, B.A. (Hons. Oxon. and Lond.), 14, Elsham Road, Kennington, W.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLIX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30, 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A.

5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper stars; give them a glimpse of God's immensities, and there will be plenty of life push!

To-day the concentrated, creative force of each unit is focussed on the perfecting of a small part in the complex whole, and in this we truly progress—those of us (and there are not so few, Mr. Bland) who use our brains at all.—I am, sir, etc.,

April 12th, 1913.

JOHN D'ASCHENNAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is hard to take the article under the above heading seriously; at the same time, I think it should not be allowed to pass unchallenged, even at the risk of being classed by Mr. Bland as an "average, uninstructed person."

Mr. Bland's main hypothesis is that the brain cannot improve except as the result of the daily fear of death.

Surely this is a false hypothesis, and cannot possibly be accepted by anyone who considers the change that has taken place in the world during the last century. Besides, have the present rush and feverish anxiety in the competition of business which we see ruining the health of so many of the weaker of our business men no place in the development of the brain? Is the rivalry amongst inventors in striving to conquer the air and evolving marvellous machinery of all possible kinds of no value?

Again, let us take Mr. Bland's word-picture, in which he so vividly portrays our forefathers engaged in developing their brain capacity, and incidentally ours, to which process Mr. Bland is so anxious, I suppose, we should resort. I believe it is firmly established that in those days the human skull was shallow and incapable of containing the average brain of the day. Also I believe I am right in asserting that, according to the latest views on the subject, the size of the skull must have increased before the brain capacity increased. I think it is fair to assume that the converse is true, and that as the brain "degenerates" so would the skull become shallower. Is this so? I am glad to think the evidence on this point is against Mr. Bland. I notice that Mr. Bland mentions that when our forefathers were developing their brain capacity "dinner was an affair of every three days or so." This suggests the awful thought that some of our more far-seeing Suffragettes may be stealing a march on us men.

I am glad to say I am an optimist as regards the progress of man and the world, and am inclined to think that opinions such as Mr. Bland expresses may, if not checked, easily become the "father to the fact."—I am, sir, etc.,

J. H. TAYLOR.

Southsea,

WHITTIER'S LIFE AND WORK*

THE writer of this book believes that Whittier's career is not known in this country, and she is hopeful that her brief sketch may lead to a deeper appreciation of his poems. The aim is laudable, but, in order to be entirely successful, the authoress would have required to have approached her subject in a more critical spirit. She says: "Any criticism accentuating 'cultured fastidiousness' finds no place in the purpose of this biography." That is rather an unfortunate remark, for it is difficult to see how the book is to increase the number of admirers of Whittier's poetry if the exercise of the critical faculty is withheld.

* "John Greenleaf Whittier: His Life and Work." By Georgina King Lewis. 3s. 6d. net. (Headley.)

Manifestly, a book which is intended to appeal to those who don't know Whittier ought to have sedulously avoided anything in the nature of a panegyric. But this is precisely the line the authoress has taken. Instead of providing the reader with a careful estimate of Whittier, exhibiting his weak as well as his strong points, she, for the most part, contents herself with serving up the opinions of a number of Whittier's admirers.

But while the book cannot claim to have critical value nor even literary distinction, it furnishes a gossipy narrative, recounting the main facts of Whittier's life accurately and intelligently. There are also numerous selections from his poetry and his correspondence. Much space is given to his friendship with Lloyd Garrison, and we are afforded interesting glimpses of Whittier's long and stern battle against the foes of emancipation. With the poet's religious views Miss Lewis is thoroughly in sympathy. It is in portraying this side of his character that she is most successful. And that is no small gain, for, after all, religion was the impelling force of Whittier's being.

The influence of his Quaker birth and upbringing was manifest in all he did and in all he wrote. Miss Lewis is on unassailable ground when she says:—

"Whittier was a mystic and a seer. The invisible world was the influence of his life; the spiritual world the reality. Life was one beautiful whole; no hard and fast division of secular and sacred troubled him. The fruit of the spirit could grow out of every action: every meal was a sacrament, every place was holy, every human being could be the temple of the Holy Ghost."

For frontispiece there is a photogravure of the poet. There are also illustrations of the Old Homestead at Haverhill.

SCOTTISH CHURCH HISTORY, 1690-1740

THIS is a book which it is not easy to review either fairly or coherently. It purports to be an account of the twenty-seven ministers of the Church of Scotland who were Moderators of the General Assembly between 1690 and 1740. With the notable exception of Carstares, not one of these Moderators has previously been made the subject of special study. Their history is exceedingly obscure, and can only be pieced together, and that in a fragmentary way, after much laborious burrowing among musty volumes, pamphlets, and documents.

In order, therefore, to review this book adequately, one would require to do what Mr. Warrick has evidently done—expend an enormous amount of time and labour in gleaning facts from rare authorities. Needless to say, we have not attempted so stupendous a task; but we have been able, nevertheless, to traverse a portion of the ground, and have, of course, scrutinised the sketch of Carstares, of whom an excellent biography exists by his descendant, the late Principal Story. The result of these investigations tends to show that Mr. Warrick's knowledge of the period is not only extensive, but amazingly exact. Some of his portraits are shadowy, as indeed they were almost bound to be, but the majority, thanks to his industry and enthusiasm, are skilfully and vividly drawn. He has produced a book which fully maintains the best traditions of Scottish ecclesiastical scholarship.

Was it worth while, it may be asked, to chronicle the sayings and doings of these Moderators, all of whom, with one exception, are unknown to fame? Mr.

* "The Moderators of the Church of Scotland from 1690 to 1740." By Rev. John Warrick, M.A. 10s. 6d. net. (Oliphant.)

"Popular! it speaks for itself, sir— everybody is having Hall's Distemper walls now. We used to use it most among the artistic folk and people with fancy ideas, but now it is Hall's Distemper everywhere."

And no wonder! The English public, proverbially proud of their homes, have learned that behind the artistic idea

HALL'S DISTEMPER
(REG. TRADE MARK)

gives solid practical advantages, such as are offered in no other wall covering.

It gives an even, velvety wall surface. It sets hard as cement, and does not crack, blister, nor peel off. Unlike wallpaper it never fades nor changes colour.

It is instant death to all insect and germ life, and gives clean, healthy walls which may be washed by lightly sponging with warm water.

"HOW TO DECORATE YOUR HOME"—a booklet that helps, by giving beautiful examples in colours, and useful hints, free by post on application to the Sole Manufacturers:—

SISSONS BROTHERS & CO., Ltd., HULL.
London Office: 193^B, Borough High Street, S.E.
Liverpool: 65, Mount Pleasant.
Glasgow: 113, Bath Street.
Reading: 6, Gun Street.

"THE WAY" through the labyrinth to the TRUE GOAL OF LIFE is clearly set forth in "GLAD TIDINGS!" a new book

By RADNOR H. HODGSON.

CONTENTS.—"To You"; "What is Man?"; "The Divine in Man"; "The Carnal Man"; "Selfishness and Altruism"; "Individuality"; "Self-Culture"; "Truth and Wisdom"; "The Great Illusion"; "The Great Purpose"; "Social Reform"; "Now and After."

A book with a message of great hope to all men and women.

Price 1/- net. By post, 1/1¹/₂, from RADNOR H. HODGSON, HEADLEY BROS. SOUTH VIEW, BAILDON, YORKS.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121-3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND.—REPORTING IN CUBA.—"I have been able to take political speeches for important newspapers here, which other stenographers using other systems have been unable to take down correctly. The Sloan-Duployan system is a complete success when used for the Spanish language."—From Mr. R. J. Gonzalez, P.O., Box 1309, Havana, Cuba. SLOAN-DUPOYAN is used in fourteen languages, is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to day. Interesting illustrated handbook free. Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECIIT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverbill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

AUTHORS EXPERIENCING DIFFICULTY IN FINDING a publisher are invited to submit their MSS., upon either general or special subjects, to the MUSEUM ARTS & LETTERS ASSOCIATION, 18, Bury Street, W.C. Advantageous terms of issue accorded authors whose works show promise.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A R QUADRUPLEX Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settle Course," (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTLE INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying, Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

THE LONGER YOU PAY RENT THE MORE MONEY YOU WASTE. Apply to-day for "Every Man his own Landlord," which will be sent post free to applicants mentioning this paper. Address—Managers, 246, Bishopsgate, F.C.

Shaving with a "CLEMAK" is Simple as 'A.B.C.'

No "learning how"—you feel at home with the "Clemak" at once. Never a cut, never a scratch—just a close, quick, smooth shave and skin-comfort afterwards. Acquire the "Clemak" habit—and add a new pleasure to your life.

The British-made "Clemak" is simplicity itself. There are no screws, bars or plates to bother about and nothing to remove when cleaning. The "Clemak" is self-adjusting, and, with the patent "Clemak" strop, self-stropping.

The blades are made of the best quality Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by electric process. They retain a fine shaving edge, and can be stropped over and over again. The razor itself lasts a lifetime.

Made as well and shaves as well as any guinea razor. Remember, it's a "Clemak" you want.

Obtainable from all Cutlers, Ironmongers, 8to:88, &c., or post free from the Clemak Razor Co., 17, Billiter St., London, E.C. [Works, Sheffield.]

FREE A copy of Amusing and Instructive Booklet, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

Send Coupon To-day Or a postcard will do, on mentioning this journal.

Clemak Razor and Seven Blades ... 5/-
Combination Outfit, Stropping Machine, Hide Strop, with Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.

To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
17, Billiter St., London, E.C.

Send me gratis and post free a copy of "His First Shave," which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

NAME.....
ADDRESS.....

Warrick anticipates the question and, as we think, conclusively answers it. The fifty years covered by this book was a period of transition. It was devoid of the glamour and interest which marked earlier and later epochs, and possibly on that account has received less attention. But no one can hope to master fully the subsequent history of the Church of Scotland without understanding the forces at work between 1690 and 1740, and of the men who controlled them.

In 1690, as Mr. Warrick observes in an admirable introduction, the Covenanting period was over. Presbyterianism had regained its place and power; and it is the chief claim to remembrance on the part of most of the Moderators whose careers are here narrated that they materially assisted in rooting the Scottish Church more firmly than ever in the affections of the people. The year 1740, on the other hand, witnessed the successful inauguration of the Seceder movement and the rise of the Moderates.

Many conflicting views prevail regarding the spiritual condition of the Scottish Church during this period. Mr. Warrick, who writes as a Free Churchman, presents a broad survey of the facts, citing, among other testimonies, those of evangelical divines like Wodrow and Willison, of Dundee, and concludes that the Revolution Church was full of spiritual life and vigour, at least during its earlier years. He also notes the literary barrenness of the Church at this time. Though some of the Moderators were capable scholars, not one of them has left a book which is read to-day. Mr. Warrick says they were preoccupied with the work of reorganising the worship and discipline of the Church. But surely the explanation lies deeper.

The Revolution Church carried the practice of re-electing its Moderators to a degree unsurpassed before or since. Three of the twenty-seven Moderators mentioned in this book—William Wisheart, William Mitchell, and William Hamilton—held the office no fewer than five times, while Carstares occupied the chair of the General Assembly on four occasions. The latter, as is well known, was one of the greatest of Scottish ecclesiastics; but how to explain the repeated bestowal of the honour on the other three is not easy. Either Wisheart, Mitchell, and Hamilton were more singularly gifted than even Mr. Warrick's narrative would lead us to suppose, or the Revolution Church was woefully deficient in first-rate Churchmen.

It only remains to add that the volume is furnished with excellent portraits of Carstares, Wisheart, Hamilton, and other Moderators. W. F. G.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE PRAYER LIFE: ITS PHILOSOPHY AND PRACTICE, by J. G. James, D.Lit., M.A. (National Free Church Council, 2s. 6d. net), was written at the request of the organisation under whose auspices it appears. It aims at quickening in the Churches the spirit of prayer, private and social. Dr. James, who is already favourably known by his "Problems of Prayer," here concentrates attention upon the philosophical and theological aspects of the subject. After treating of the teaching of the Bible on prayer and the psychology of prayer, he devotes three chapters each to the philosophy, the theology, and the practical aspects of his theme. Though the book is ably and lucidly written, we are inclined to think that the earlier sections are too advanced for the class of reader for whom the work is specially intended. The concluding chapters, however, fulfil their purpose admirably, and ought to be pondered by all interested in the subject. Two prayers by R. L. Stevenson, we are glad to note, are warmly commended. The Rev. H. Elvet Lewis contributes a foreword. ● ● ●

OUT OF THE BLUE (Longmans, Green and Co., 6s.), by R. Gorell Barnes. This is a love story with an idyllic setting in a coral island in the Indian Ocean. There is the inevitable shipwreck, and the hero and heroine are cast ashore on a desert island, which, like the island one remembers with such affection in "The Swiss Family Robinson," is prolific with everything needful to man—and woman. The author, however, does not overburden us with adventures in the new and enforced home, realising, perhaps, that what is acceptable in one's childhood one is apt to be somewhat sceptical of in later life. The peg upon which the story hangs is the relation between James Graham and Joan Elliott, who find themselves thus cut off from civilisation, and falling in love. The situation is somewhat complicated by the fact that Graham has a wife! We will not spoil the story by saying what is the solution which is eventually reached, but leave it to the reader to discover. The story, though it has dramatic possibilities, does not ring quite true, and it occurs to us that perhaps it would have been more convincing had the author devoted fewer chapters to analysing the feelings and varied sensations of his characters, and given us a little more incident to while away the year in the island. But perhaps Mr. Barnes has never been cast away on a desert island, which would account for a certain atmosphere of unreality which pervades the book. ● ● ●

The smell of gunpowder and the reek of the battlefield, the agonies of forced marches and the stern and frequently brutal discipline of the British army in the early part of last century, all this, and much more, is brought vividly before us in the book which Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. have recently published, WELLINGTON'S MEN (1s. net.), being some soldier biographies, edited by Mr. W. H. Fitchett, B.A., LL.D. The extracts, which are very admirably edited, are taken from "the pages of battle literature written by the hands of soldiers," and they bring before us in all its horror the actual meaning of war from the standpoint of the soldier fighting in the ranks. It is hard to realise, when turning these pages full of thrilling incident and heroic deeds, that the hands which wrote it all down so vividly are now still for ever. It is wonderful to feel we are actually face to face with the men who made the history of that day, and to feel we are reading at first hand the experiences of the soldiers who fought in the Peninsula and who won Waterloo. The account of that terrible retreat to Corunna is wonderfully and strikingly brought before us. Who has not felt the horror of that heroic march when reading it in the cold and unsympathetic print of an orthodox volume of history, but when it is told in the simple words of a man who marched with Craufurd to Vigo, then, indeed, one can begin to appreciate what war meant to the soldier in the ranks—and to his wife. There is a chapter on "Soldiers' Wives" which the reader would do well to note carefully, so admirably does it depict the devotion and quiet heroism with which the women marched with the men and shared all their hardships. The book is, however, not entirely devoted to the dark side of those dreadful days. We are occasionally enlivened with amusing accounts of the idiosyncrasies of some of the great men themselves. There are diverting instances of Wellington's irritability, as when he issued a general order that "British officers would in future abstain from beating Marshals of France," consequent upon the complaint of a French

Every ride a pleasure trip if you use a

Renold Chain

The chain is apparently an insignificant part of the cycle, yet it can make or mar the whole pleasure of your cycling.

The quality of the chain is of the utmost importance—that is why it should be a Renold Chain.

If your cycle is a high-grade machine the Renold will add the last touch of quality to it. If it is a popular grade machine then get a Renold fitted, and it will possess an important feature of the high-grade model.

Of all dealers—one price 5/6
(Fitting extra).

Write for Cyclist or Motor-cyclist Booklet, free.

HANS RENOLD Ltd. (Dept. 14), Manchester.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws," on Card. Something new. How the New Knowledge aids in daily life, study, &c. "Thought: Its Ten Laws," Companion Card, 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON. — SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL PROGRAMME, illustrated. Tariff for board-residence, also Whitsuntide holidays in Shakespear land; boating, punting.—Proprietors, Avendene Private Hotel.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 publishers and periodicals at highest prices. You write—We sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

Shorthand

80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, W. — A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Large house. Access to gardens. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SERVICE.

WELL-PAID — PERMANENT — PENSION-BEARING POSTS.
MEN AND WOMEN; 18 to 40; £70 to £350.

No Entrance Exams. for L.G. Service.

For qualifying preparations—Official—Authoritative—until successful, and particulars of vacancies in L.G., Nat. H. Ins., Lab. Exs., and Gov't posts open to above ages—how to secure appointment, address—Modern and Poor Law Correspondence College, 120, Goschen Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and General MSS. and Plays, 8d. per 1,000 words. Paper and Carbon copy included. Cheap Duplicating.—C. GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

MSS. should be typed before submitting to Agents and Publishers. Lowest prices and best work.—Write Miss Beare, — Rist & Co., 56, Ludgate Hill, E.C., for terms and appointment, or 'phone 7411 City.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

ROSENBLUM'S ANGLO-FRENCH JOURNAL, 1d. monthly, or 1½d. post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. Subscription 1/6 per annum. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French." £1 is. prize offered in April issue for best essay on languages.

Just a postcard will bring you a beautifully illustrated catalogue of—

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

For the Home. Cash or Easy Payments. Prices from £37.6. The popular size, 6 ft. 4 in., costs £55.0. Seven days' free trial.

E. J. RILEY, Ltd.,
ONDINE WORKS, ACCRINGTON.

Marshal who had been knocked down by an Englishman on the boulevard, but was unable to identify his aggressor! Then, again, there is the incident of the officer who lost his wig, and after a victorious battle went frantically riding over the field, bald-headed, and shouting, "A guinea to the man who will find my wig"! These little anecdotes are a welcome relief from the tales of blood and suffering with which the book abounds. The men, though brutal, and in many instances seeming half savage, are nevertheless worthy of an admiration that one wonders whether one could so readily accord to the soldier of to-day. Their life was harder—one doubts if the present generation could stand a quarter what they had to bear—but it was a life which made heroes—and heroes, too, who thought nothing of what they did, but took it all in the day's work. The book will fill a present need in giving the student (too often addicted to taking his history in pre-digested tabloid form) a human insight into the everyday life of the men who made England.

LOP-EARED DICK (John Ouseley, Ltd., 6s.), by G. F. Monckton. This is a "disjointed account of the trials of a genial Cow-boy in a World of Widows and Wild Animals." The reader will doubtless be much diverted by the adventures of the hero, which are recounted in a number of short tales. Dick tells us in his "appendage" that "this here book ain't nun of my work. The man that dun it he can't spel and is considrbbl of a lyer, . . . so wenn you rede this here book, if it gives you a pane in your inside ware you kepe yor laffs, . . . say the cusswords over him, not over mee." We will not go so far as to say we said cusswords over anybody—neither did we have a very bad "pane" where we "kepe our laffs," though we will admit we found "Concerning Bulldogs" rather funny. "A Revolt of Women" is also quite amusing, but we cannot say we were altogether sorry when we had finished the book. It strikes us that Mr. Monckton is aspiring to be a second "Artemus Ward," and if that is so, our advice is that of Mr. Punch, "Don't."

Mr. Phillips Oppenheim is always readable. Almost alone among those writers who appeal to the public through the medium of the serial, his characterisation is clever and occasionally subtle, and, as inevitably happens when you find this in a writer, his plot is not only credible, but workmanlike, and in its involutions invariably original. The author knows how to intrigue the interest, and to keep alive the reader's curiosity of interest without losing sight of the story as a whole. There are no sudden and disjointed effects in THE TEMPTATION OF TAVERNAKE (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). The episodes are striking and arresting, but they fit into the framework of the novel as a whole, and the perspective is never thrown out by a sudden and abrupt transition from a love scene to a murder, a domestic interior to a midnight burglary. Tavernake is a popular type of hero, the Napoleonic man with a capacity for concentration "upon the things of the passing moment, which was in itself impressive, and which somehow disarmed criticism." The opening scene, when he taxes the heroine with the theft of a bracelet, is cleverly conceived and carried out, and the girl herself is a more subtle type than we usually find. The interest is kept up throughout the book, and every now and again we chance on descriptions notable for the vividness and colour. At times Mr. Oppenheim achieves a high level of word painting. "A late spring—late, at any rate, in this quaint corner of the world—stole like some wonderful enchantment across the face of the moors and the marshes. Yellow gorse starred with golden clumps the brown hillside; and while lavender gleamed in patches across the silver street marshes, the dead hedges came blossoming into life. Crocuses, a long line of yellow and purple crocuses, broke from waxy buds into star-like blossoms along the front of Matthew Nicholls' garden. And with the coming of spring Tavernake suddenly found himself able to think of the past." After reading this and similar passages one wishes that Mr. Oppenheim, while we fully appreciate his talent and capacity for originating and developing a powerful plot, would turn his talents in the direction of a quieter and at the same time a more spontaneous channel.

THE BLUE WOLF (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is written with a swing. It is a story of Texas, and treats of a big ranch and of the life of the Guachos. South America is as yet fairly unexploited by the novelist, except for those wild and whirling romances that centre round presidential crises in one of the small Republics that lend themselves so ably to the melodramatic happenings. The chase of the blue wolf, the animal that plays an actual and symbolic part in the story, is powerfully described. The women, fresh, healthy creatures, impress one with their vitality, and the love interest is convincing and well sustained.

Mr. Robert Chambers paints with a magic brush. In his latest volume, THE GAY REBELLION (Appletons, 6s.), he portrays with a most delicious humour both the suffragette movement and faddists in Eugenics. America is pictured as under feminine rule; women reign supreme by means of the suffrage strike, and marriages are few and far between. While men refuse the vote, women decline to notice them. Husbands, fathers, uncles, fiancés, bachelors—all are excluded; shut out from womanly smiles and feminine fascinations. The Eugenists, as a side line, start the New Race University for the purpose of scientific propagation, and lively girls capture athletic and well-proportioned young men and hand them over to the authorities of the institution. These are the sentiments voiced by the movement: "Mr. Langdon, the day is past when women will either countenance or take part in any disrespectful witticisms, slurs, or jests at the expense of their own sex. Once—and that not very long ago—they did it." The farce, sustained to the end, helps to make the book one of the most amusing we have read for a long time.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.: Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.

SALISBURY PLAIN:

And Its Stones, Cathedral
City, Villages and Folk.

By ELLA NOYES.

Illustrated by DORA NOYES. Square medium 8vo,
10s. 6d. net.

DREAMS AND THE WAY OF DREAMS.

By R. L. HINE.

A Study of dreams in general, their significance, their dramatic, imaginative and practical value.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SWINBURNE: A Study.

By JOHN DRINKWATER.

Small demy 8vo, 5s. net.

Morning Post.—"From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

THE MYSTIC WAY.

A Study in Christian Origins.

By EVELYN UNDERHILL.

Square demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"Miss Underhill's book is a triumph of erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

CAMPING WITH MOTOR CAR AND CAMERA.

By

ALFRED F. BARKER.

Illustrated, Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

RAVENNA.

By EDWARD HUTTON.

With Illustrations in Line and Colour by HARALD SUND.

10s. 6d. net.

Daily Express.—"I have found 'Ravenna' absorbingly interesting, and I most heartily commend it to the reader who cares for drama and romance—this is to say, who cares for history."

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUSES.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

TO BE COMPLETED IN 12 VOLUMES.

CLOTH,

1/- NET

VOLUME 4 READY APRIL 29th.

LEATHER,

2/- NET

EACH VOLUME CONTAINS 640 PAGES COMPRISING
OVER 500,000 WORDS, MAKING THE TOTAL NUMBER
OF WORDS IN THE COMPLETE WORK OVER 6,000,000.

DENT'S SCIENTIFIC PRIMERS.

CLOTH, 1/- NET PER VOLUME.

ASTRONOMY

Prof. F. W. DYSON, F.R.S., Astronomer Royal.

BIOLOGY

Prof. HARVEY GIBSON, Professor of Botany in the University of Liverpool.

BOTANY

Dr. J. REYNOLDS GREEN, F.R.S., Fellow of Downing College, Cambridge.

CHEMISTRY

Sir W. A. TILDEN, F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry in the Royal College of Science, South Kensington.

GEOLOGY

Prof. J. W. GREGORY, F.R.S., Professor of Geology in the University of Glasgow.

PHYSIOLOGY

By Prof. W. D. HALLIBURTON, M.D., F.R.S., Hon. LL.D., Professor of Physiology, King's College, London.

ZOOLOGY

Prof. J. GRAHAM KERR, F.R.S., Regius Professor of Zoology in the University of Glasgow.

137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

A NOVEL OF UNUSUAL MERIT

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL

By GRACE RHYS,
Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc. 6s.

The Nation: "Mrs. Grace Rhys has achieved an unusual success. The language in its clear colouring, limpid ease and freshness, is free, on the one hand, from Wardour Street Archaism, and on the other, from following modes. It is so happily phrased as to seem a natural medium of communication between the character and an audience of our time."

TO BE OBTAINED
AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

By EDWARD GORDON CRAIG

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE

40 DESIGNS FOR STAGE SCENES WITH CRITICAL NOTES BY THE INVENTOR

Square Royal 4to, 21s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH:

"His Pictures are like dreams. Often he seems to achieve in line a beauty as vague and as pleasurable as that produced by Maeterlinck in subtly chosen words. His work is beyond question stimulating, and causes us to look on the scenic art of the theatre with new and questioning eyes."

Please send for Illustrated Prospectus.

JOHN DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

DARN NO MORE

STOCKINGS AND SOCKS THAT DON'T WANT MENDING.

Read the following Guarantee, which is given with every pair of Hose we sell:

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will REPLACE THEM ABSOLUTELY FREE!

Holeproof Hose.

To save uncongenial labour, to make life happier and sweeter for every human being, to increase the leisure time of the over-worked—these things are the objects which inventors have striven to attain. Bell, the inventor of the telephone, placed all the world on chatting terms over the wires. He showed us how to laugh at space. Edison applied electricity and enables us to brighten the darkest night. Arrien has mastered the art of flying so what is there left

WHY, OUR GARMENTS STILL WEAR OUT.

But your Hosiery need not if you will keep pace with the times, for there is now Hosiery that is Holeproof.

WHY THIS HOSIERY IS HOLEPROOF.

The explanation of the durability of "V. & H. Holeproof Hosiery is made here, so that every person can see for himself, or herself, the genuineness of it. Your own brain will show you the truth of it. This "V. & H. Holeproof Hosiery is made in a new way from a specially privately manufactured yarn. This yarn is lighter in weight and at the same time tougher and stronger than any other brand. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear, just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still have no damage done to its fabric. There is hardly any spring or elastic stretch in ordinary hose, even of the most expensive kind, and this accounts for the rapid appearance of holes and thin places. Luxuriously comfortable, shapely and well-made, "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is a revelation to all.

Look at our "GUARANTEE" Ticket which is sent with every pair we sell

TRY THEM FOR TWO MONTHS.

Then, if within that time a hole should appear, send them back to us at once with ticket, and we will present you with new hose without extra cost.

No such guarantee could be given with hose made in the ordinary way. But with "V. & H." Holeproof Hose you can be free from the fear of a hole suddenly showing—not only just at that point at the heel where the eyes of everyone can see, but at no part of "V. & H." Holeproof Hose will there be a hole. That we guarantee for two whole months.

The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy house-wives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable.

Everyone in the country will be wearing "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery after we can get them just to TRY it once. Orders are now pouring in from the friends of those who already are wearing the new "V. & H." Holeproof Hose. The price is—

TWO PAIRS Ladies' Stockings, 3/10, postage 2d.

TWO PAIRS Gents' Socks, 2/10, postage 2d.

COLOURS stocked: Brown, Tan, Saxe, Black, Navy, Champagne, Pearl Grey and Light Mole.

SILK HOLEPROOF.

Sold under same guarantee as above. Two pairs of Gents' Socks, 7/6, postage 2d. Two pairs of Ladies' Stockings, 10/6, postage 2d. Colours: Ladies'—Champagne, White, Navy, Empire Blue, Pearl Grey, Tan, Black, Men's—Tan, Navy, Pearl Grey, State Boot Size.

Remember it is easier to TRY "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery than to darn a batch of socks and stockings every week.

Please state boot size, write name and address plainly, and go for your postal order now. Don't let good inventions pass you.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER, (Dept. 154)

THE Mail Order House, QUEEN'S ROAD,
BRIGHTON.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 29. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MAY 2, 1913

One Penny.

GEORGE BORROW, NATUS 1803,
OBIIT 1881.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of George Borrow | 65 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 66 |
| The Birth of a New Civilisation—By the Rev. Lord William Gascoyne Cecil | 67 |
| William Cobbett: A Great Englishman—By F. E. Green ... | 68 |
| Literary Competition | 69 |
| Women at Work. X.—The Canvasser—By Margaret Hamilton | 70 |
| The Lloyd George Crusade. II.—The Wage Problem. By P. W. Wilson | 72 |
| George Borrow—By E. Hermann | 73 |
| The Real Napoleon—By Charles Sarolea | 74 |
| Mr. F. R. Benson and the Stratford Festival—By C. B. Purdom | 75 |
| Everyman's French Page—Joseph de Maistre on the Inequality of the Sexes | 76 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance"—By C. Sheridan Jones | 77 |
| Rome and an Excursion | 78 |
| The Mannequin. Short Story—By V. Blasco Ibañez ... | 80 |
| Literary Notes | 82 |
| A Lay Sermon on the Art of Reading | 84 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Paganism and Christianity | 86 |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? | 87 |
| Australia | 87 |
| Enterprise in Business | 88 |
| The Use of Books to Working Men | 89 |
| Phillimore on Cromwell | 91 |
| Books of the Week | 91 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SCUTARI continues to be the all-absorbing topic of foreign politics. The Montenegrins have secured the fortress at the cost of heroic sacrifice, and they have made up their minds to retain it. They are determined that Scutari shall be the capital of Greater Montenegro. Austria is determined that it shall be the capital of an autonomous Albania. Montenegro is under the indirect protectorate of Russia, Albania is under the direct protectorate of Austria, which for years has subsidised Albanian Catholic churches. If Austria carries out her threats, war with Russia is a certainty. There is one disquieting feature of the Russian situation: at the time of the Japanese war it was the Russian Government which was in favour of hostilities, whilst the people were against it. In the present case it is the Russian Government which is pacific, and it is the Russian people that are bellicose.

Without taking any sides in a complex question, it is amusing to see the arguments adduced by the British Press in favour of Scutari becoming the capital of Albania. We are informed that the majority of the population are of Albanian race, that only a small minority are Serbs, and that, therefore, the Scutari district ought to form part of Albania. Are the journalists who use this argument aware of its grim irony and its profound immorality? A band of burglars invade a country house, murder the majority of its inhabitants, and say to them, "We are the majority; therefore the house shall belong to us." Such is exactly the relative position of the Serbs and the Albanians. The Serbs resisted the Turks, remained Christians, and refused to become renegades. The Albanians submitted to the Turks, and for centuries became the dreaded Janissaries, the henchmen and the hangmen of the Sultan. For centuries they have lived by murder. They are the last surviving tribes of mountaineer brigands. We do not deny that they are eminently picturesque, but to say that they have the right over a territory simply because they have massacred its inhabitants, is to carry a little too far the right of occupancy and the principle of nationalities.

The Belgian strike has come to an ignominious end. The Belgian leaders, to retrieve the position, affirm that it has been eminently successful. It is true that the Belgian Conservative Prime Minister has promised that a joint committee of Parliament will be arranged to consider the revision of the electoral law. If such a platonic promise satisfies the Belgian workmen we can only say that they are not difficult to please. In justice to the leaders, it must be granted that, from the beginning, they were against the strike, that on no one day was it anything like general, and that, even without the present agreement, the strike would have ended in a complete collapse. At the same time, one cannot help contrasting the levity and the weakness of the Belgian workmen with the grim determination of the British workmen in the railway strike. The present lamentable experience, however, may be of service to the Belgians. It may teach them the very necessary lesson that a general strike is too formidable a weapon to be used unless there is a firm determination to hold out until the bitter end.

The Insurance Act is getting more and more of a muddle, and it is about time that the country should awaken to the realities of a scandalous situation. Patience is not only a commendable Christian virtue, but an indispensable political virtue, and we ought to make full allowance in favour of those who have had to organise a huge scheme of social reform. But when patience is exercised at the expense of millions of suffering fellow-citizens, it may be carried too far. Mr. Rockliff, secretary of the Joint Committee of Approved Societies, which is a committee representing over seven millions of insured persons (more than half the insured in the country), declares that tens of thousands of insured persons are not obtaining anything like proper attention under the Act, and that many are paying for a private doctor. The grievance is not only that 386 doctors under the panel have over a thousand patients each, and that a few doctors have between five and seven thousand patients, but that an insured person, once he has selected his doctor, cannot change him for another, even if he is getting no treatment at all. Mr. Rockliff gives a few statistics showing the enormous numbers which some doctors have undertaken to treat.

| Doctors. | Patients. | Doctors. | Patients. |
|----------|-------------|----------|-------------|
| 93 | 1,500—2,000 | 3 | 4,000—5,000 |
| 80 | 2,000—3,000 | 3 | 5,000—7,000 |
| 20 | 3,000—4,000 | | |

Dr. Liebknecht and his Socialist colleagues are doing splendid service in the Reichstag by throwing fresh light on the world-wide organisation of the German Armaments Trust. It had long been known that huge industrial concerns were directly interested in artificially stirring up national feeling, and in running up the military and naval expenditure, and that the Trust largely used the "armoured plate" press to further their ends. The recent Krupp revelations have already resulted in the changed attitude of German public opinion with regard to the new Military Bill. The enthusiasm with which the German people five weeks ago received it has vanished, and it may not be too much to hope that wiser counsels may still prevail, and that the Bill may not pass the Reichstag.

NOTICE.—In our next number we hope to publish an article by Maurice Maeterlinck.

THE BIRTH OF A NEW CIVILISATION

BY THE REV. LORD WILLIAM GASCOYNE CECIL

IN the admirable article which appears in your paper you speak of the Westernising movement in China. This is not merely a question of temporary interest to those who have mercantile dealings there; certainly it is not a question which should be viewed with amusement as a quaint abnormality like the bearded woman at the fair, a freak development of civilisation; it is, in truth, one of the great milestones that mark the development of the world.

Of course, there is a humorous side to the whole question; the painful efforts of the Oriental mind to understand the illogical systems of Western Government are as comic as a Chinese gentleman dressing in a frock-coat and trousers of brocaded silk. For as the silk that his country produces does not suit the hideous garment of the West, so neither do the great Confucian tenets, which put especial value on education, suit a democracy which gives equal rights to the village idiot or the University professor. The Chinese idea of democracy is perhaps an improvement on the Western scheme. The voter must have some claim to be an educated man before he can have a share in the government of his country. In like manner the Chinese have every nominal respect for our slow Western methods of justice, yet when they are in a hole they revert to the efficient Eastern statecraft: they cut off the dangerous man's head first, so that he can no longer do any damage to the Republic, and then, to show their pupils they respect Western methods, they hold a fair and just trial to see if he was guilty. When one hears of the Chinese becoming Western, the word "incongruous" keeps returning to the mind.

Yes, incongruous, not inefficient; they were that before they westernised, but since they have westernised they seem more efficient. They carried out their Revolution in a most efficient way, with a minimum of fighting, and only a massacre here and there in parts of the country, such as in the north-west, where those in command must have had but little authority. When they had defeated the Manchus, they did not make the common Oriental mistake of driving their fallen foes to despair, and so prolonging disorder and incurring heavy expense. With true wisdom they showed mercy, with the result that the opposition to the Revolution collapsed.

In some ways they are too efficient. Western knowledge has taught them, for instance, that leprosy is contagious, that it may be carried by flies to all sorts of people who are not in direct contact with it; so one governor killed a whole colony of lepers—a very efficient way of stamping out disease, but hardly congruous to our ideas of civilisation.

This incongruity makes one ask oneself, Will the new civilisation really be Western? From the conceited Anglo-Saxon's point of view nothing is worthy of the name of civilisation except the civilisation to which he belongs; but, of course, that is not sound reasoning. The world has seen many civilisations, some with one characteristic and some with another, and it is hard to say which is the strongest. Western civilisation has great efficiency in mechanics; but it has no respect for authority or antiquity, and thus lacks the element of durability. It is always changing; in fact, that is its ideal. As we say in many an after-dinner speech, "We are progressive." That is all very well when you start with having a sufficient mass of abuses to abolish; but when you have abolished all the abuses, the spirit of change will induce you to found other abuses. Change is all very well till you have reached efficiency; but a civilisation which has change as one of its characteristics is apt to run past efficiency.

The Eastern civilisation is just the opposite. It respects authority and values antiquity, and the question is, when the Easterner tastes the Western civilisation, with its kaleidoscopic changes, whether he will not prefer to go back a little to the Eastern principle and find again a world which does not always change.

Probably we are seeing the birth-pains of a new civilisation, for as it is certain that England will never become Chinese, it is most improbable that China will ever become Anglo-Saxon, and therefore a compromise will have to be found somewhere. What will that compromise be?

Pessimists have already settled that the new civilisation will surely be a mixture of Eastern and Western vices, a very devil among civilisations—an efficient devil, very probably, with longer horns and a more mischievously poisonous tail than China has yet seen, but essentially a devil. A French diplomatist took that line in conversation the other day. We Anglo-Saxons were the fishermen who had uncorked the bottle and let out the jinnee, and he asked why our educators could not have left the Chinese alone. His whole tone was, "There! You have gone and done it!"

Optimists, especially if they come from the other side of the Atlantic, are, on the other hand, in no doubt as to what is going to happen. China is going to become an Asiatic United States, with a George Washington, in the person of Sun Yat Sen, and all the other incidents of American oratory. In some American schools in China, when we were there, they were teaching the science of history as it is understood in America; but one felt that those olive-hued, impassive faces must have quite a different national history to the vigorous and energetic races of North America.

Probably the new civilisation will contain good and bad elements, coming from both East and West; but the national individuality of China will make itself felt, and the Eastern civilisation will be this incongruous thing, a Western civilisation which is essentially Chinese. One thing seems certain, that this new civilisation will be dominant in the Far East, and will probably become prominent in all the sub-tropical countries of the world.

The Chinaman, after all, prospers in the sub-tropical region, though he can live anywhere; in fact, he becomes happy in just that latitude in which the Anglo-Saxon begins to become unhappy; and as he is essentially a civilised man, he probably will become the great vehicle for civilisation in all the regions where the white man can only be a temporary resident.

That is why it becomes so important to consider what this civilisation is going to be. The Chinaman is not "a nigger"; he is a thinker, an organiser, and, above all, a worker. One has only to look at the way he succeeds in Tonkin and the Straits Settlements to see that his future belongs to a much wider world than to China.

It seems as if he were going to be the apostle of authority and education, obey the powers that be, and learn Western knowledge. But he also may exaggerate the methods of municipal dishonesty which are characteristic of our Western life in so many countries. We understand all about graft and illegal commission, but do we understand the Chinese "squeeze"? He will teach as well as learn.

Certainly I think it very foolish of Western thinkers to ignore the developments in China. I do not think we had any right to open up the country with our army and navy and with our trade, unless we were prepared to teach her the good side of our civilisation; and just at this moment we can do so very much. All these young Chinese thinkers are trying to understand Western civilisation, and to accommodate it to the conditions of Chinese nationality. Now, if we could but show them the true aspects of our civilisation, what a lot of misery we might save millions upon millions of people hereafter! Even if we are pessimists, we might put knobs on the devil's horns and just blunt the point of his tail.

But if we are optimists, what dreams may we not dream, especially when we read such a book as Milman's "Latin Christianity"! May not the Mongolian world be as much higher in moral standard to the Anglo-Saxon world as the Anglo-Saxon has been to the mediæval Latin world, and the mediæval to the Pagan world?

As a Christian, one can see in the entry of a new race into the Christian thought a revivifying influence in a system which in some respects is showing weakness. Every national mind sees a new aspect of the truth, and we badly need the eyes of the Chinese thinker to see another and a holier view of Christianity.

Of course, the ideal way to help China is not only to send missions to her, much less gunboats to compel her to take the opium she does not want, but to give her educators, enlightened men, who will teach her the truth.

The Americans see this, and they are founding universities all over China; and I am much afraid the future Chinese History of China will have a chapter comparing the English and American methods, and that chapter will not be very pleasant reading for an Englishman.

If you doubt this, go to Liverpool Street and buy a ticket for Peking. The journey is very comfortable, and there is an excellent hotel. And then go from Peking down to Hankow, take the boat and slip down the river to Nanking, and so to Shanghai; and, as you go, ask to see all the English and all the American mission stations. I am certain—though you will be proud of the English missionary—you will feel rather ashamed of his station.

I have tried to persuade my fellow-countrymen to build a university in Central China, where the young Chinese would learn the truth about the Western thought; and they would be then in a position to help their fellow-countrymen.

Of course, this can be recommended for Christian and philanthropic reasons; but it is also a good business proposition for England. The young Chinese who have studied in an English university will be more disposed to trade with England. But, so far, the scheme has not met with adequate support.

WILLIAM COBBETT: A GREAT ENGLISHMAN

By F. E. GREEN.

STOUT of limb, girt in his dust-coloured coat and drab breeches, with round and ruddy face, combative he stands before us, a live man, a figure breathing of English manhood from his bull neck, his strong, argumentative chin, his firm upper lip and fine shaped mouth, his pugnacious nose, to his clear eye, fired by a passion for justice, and lightened by a rapier glance of irony. Thus does his striking personality with characteristic insistence stride through the pages of Mr. Lewis Melville's fascinating book, "The Life and Letters of William Cobbett," issued by Mr. John Lane last month.

It is a pity that the life of so great and typical an Englishman should have to be issued at a price (32s. net) beyond the means of most students of literature. Indeed, destiny has been somewhat ironical in its treatment of this great publicist, who was the first journalist to introduce a cheap journal in this country in the form of Twopenny Trash, in defiance, too, of a Government supported by a shilling newspaper electorate. In our own generation, it was not until Messrs. Dent issued the Everyman edition of "Rural Rides" that we could buy a cheap edition of this incomparable work.

There are two other "live" books of Cobbett's still circulated by publishers, and these are "Advice to Young Men" (1829) and "Cobbett's Grammar" (1818). At second-hand bookstalls you can still pick up copies of Cobbett's exceedingly racy "Legacy to Parsons" (1835) and his trenchant "History of the Protestant Reformation" (1824).

Cobbett, apparently, had no feelings of revolt in his nature as a boy. Like the sons of most of our peasantry, he saw the world—that is, England—as a jolly fine place for adventures. He was quite content to take things as they were. His grandfather was a day-labourer; his father started as a labourer and became a small farmer, keeping at Farnham a public-house, "The Jolly Farmer." Here William was born, as anyone may learn by reading the large inscription painted with pride on the face of this inn.

At the age of eleven William was lured away from home by a chance description of that gardener's paradise—Kew. He set out to walk there with 6½d. in his pocket, and near the end of his journey, at Richmond, the expenditure of 3d. of his capital on "The Tale of a Tub" sent him supperless to bed behind a haystack, where he read until he could see no longer. This superb piece of satiric writing may have given this healthy-minded boy a taste for literature. Thus, through a garden gate, Cobbett entered Grub Street.

He did not learn English grammar until he was twenty-three. He mastered syntax whilst he was a soldier stationed at Nova Scotia, and mark you, oh, pampered collegians, he had to learn it in the guard-room, by the light of one common fire, surrounded by noisy, quarrelsome, half-drunken comrades! In this we get an instance, together with the young man's forswearing all alcoholic liquors and cards during his eight years' service, of Cobbett's bull-dog determination of purpose.

In two years Cobbett became sergeant-major, and even instructor to and writer of despatches for his officers. He was a Tory, which meant that he held by tradition certain ideals of England and English government. A man of shining honesty, he imagined that a government of men who had been given every opportunity of culture in life must be incorruptible. Like most soldiers, he had not begun to think politically. His disillusionment began when he landed in England, and tried to bring to light before a court martial the corrupt practices of certain officers in the commissariat department who plundered the poor private soldier.

Then he went to America after his romantic marriage, and soon became famous as a truculent defender of Monarchy. His innate English patriotism and combativeness made him stand up for English institutions when he heard them abused by republicans. He did not particularly mind hearing foreigners run down England, but he had John Bull's strong aversion to hearing an Englishman do so abroad.

When he returned to England he was fêted by the Tory Ministers, and could have had anything he liked to demand. He was offered the control of a Government journal. But no party could trammel this invincible Free Lance. "No Government was ever rich enough," as Mr. Melville has truly said, "to buy him."

Though his faith in Pitt and the Tory party was soon shaken, Cobbett never became a Whig. If as anything, we may describe him as the first great Independent Labour representative that ever appeared in the House of Commons. It was inconceivable that this sturdy champion of the rural poor should remain long a supporter of a Prime Minister who, at about this time (as we learn from the Hammonds' "Village Labourer"), relinquished a Poor Law Bill because he owned himself "inexperienced in country affairs and in the condition of the poor"!

But Cobbett was soon to pay the penalty of his refusal to come to heel at the dictate of a political party. The great Free Lance, which could sell 30,000 copies of his Political Register, whilst the Morning Post could sell only 1,250, must be broken. An indictment for sedition descended upon Cobbett when he poured his vitriolic irony on the heads of the Government for inflicting 500 lashes on the bare backs of English soldiers whilst a German legion stood on guard.

By imposing a savage fine of £1,000 and keeping him within prison walls for two years the Government thought they had completely broken this Free Lance. They ruined him financially, it is true, but they never broke the power of that lance which sharpened its point upon prison walls. It struck deeper than ever into the vitals of oppression and corruption.

Once more, twenty years afterwards, the Government tried him for sedition—tried the man that Brougham, as Minister, appealed to in order to subdue, by the power of his pen, the Luddite riots. This time Cobbett left the Court triumphant, and became the First Man in the reign of the First Gentleman of Europe. Thereafter the Government left him alone.

Cobbett's style was hammered out of his character. Therein lay its success. He was sincere, simple, colloquial, and personal—outrageously personal. In the use of the invective lay his great strength. He had the common sense of the Englishman who knows that if he is to be listened to, it was no use writing like Adam Smith, Ricardo, or Godwin.

Had he lived in this kid-gloved age, Cobbett would not have been tolerated at our London School of Economics, nor would the Fabian Society ever have asked him to write a tract. Cobbett knew nothing about Political Economy, though he may have imagined he did, and he was far too personal to suit the amenities of modern propagandist societies.

Listen to this diatribe, taken from the "Rural Rides." After showing that "honest labourers were far worse off than felons," he breaks out with:

"Oh! you wish to keep up the price of corn for the good of the poor devils of labourers who have hardly a rag to cover them! Admirable feeling, tender-hearted souls! Did not—oh, oh! did not care even about the farmers! It was only for the sake of the poor naked devils of labourers. . . . This was the only reason for their wanting corn to sell at a high price! . . ."

"There is in the men calling themselves 'English country gentlemen' something superlatively base. They are, I sincerely believe, the most cruel, the most unfeeling, the most brutally insolent; but I know, I can prove, I can safely take my oath, that they are the most base of all the creatures that God ever shaped to disgrace the human shape."

Cobbett understood that it was no use to write in an academic way about landlordism. He knew that the most successful way to destroy landlordism was to show up the baseness of landlords. Yet this truculent pamphleteer was one of the wisest and the most affectionate of husbands and fathers. The gentle-hearted Miss Mitford shows us this in her description of Cobbett's home life at Botley. And those of us who love "Rural Rides" get an illuminating index to Cobbett's domestic character in that charming passage describing a ride from Winchester to Burghclere (see Everyman "Rural Rides," vol. i., page 295).

Cobbett had been a little put out (on an empty stomach) at Richard's portmanteau breaking loose from his saddle. "I jumped off, saying, 'Here, I'll carry it myself.' And then I began to take off the remaining strap, pulling with great violence and great haste. Just at this time my eyes met his, in which I saw great surprise; and, feeling the just rebuke, feeling heartily ashamed of myself, I instantly changed my tone and manner. . . . Now, if such was the effect produced on me by the want of food for only two or three hours, me, who had dined well the day before and eaten toast and butter the over-night; . . . if the not having breakfasted could, and under such circumstances, make me what you may call 'cross' to a child like this, whom I must necessarily love so much, and to whom I never speak but in the kindest manner . . . how great are the allowances that we ought to make for the poor creatures who, in this once happy and now miserable country, are doomed to lead a life of constant labour and half-starvation!"

Behind Cobbett's bracing egotism always loomed the spectre of the army of the dispossessed.

LITERARY COMPETITION

The Editor of EVERYMAN offers a prize of Two Guineas for the Best Essay on "The Working of the Medical Insurance Act: Criticisms and Suggestions," the essay not to exceed 1,800 words. All entries for this competition should be addressed to the

COMPETITION EDITOR,

21, Royal Terrace,

Edinburgh,

and must reach him not later than June 1st. It is recommended that the essays be typewritten.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

X.—THE CANVASSER

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

ONE of the most extraordinary developments that has taken place of recent years in regard to woman's work has been the enrolling of some tens of thousands of the sex in the great army of canvassers who are at work all day, and every day, selling, or trying to sell, a huge variety of articles, from pianos to india-rubber stamps, and from sewing machines to jewellery. So far as I am aware, there are no statistics available as to the exact number of women who are earning their living in this way, but to judge from the innumerable calls that the suburban householder receives daily from all sorts and conditions of women canvassers, and from the fact that they are as persistent in their visitations at the ordinary City office, there must be many, very many thousands of young girls and young women who have been compelled to adopt this most arduous occupation, in its way the hardest, most vexatious and dispiriting that a human being can follow.

I suppose one ought not to be very surprised at this fact. As a general rule women are infinitely superior to men where this kind of work is concerned. To use an Americanism, they beat the mere man "to a frazzle" when it is a question of selling anything to anybody. Their tact, their shrewd intuition, and more equable tempers give them enormous advantages. Moreover, the instinctive chivalry that even the hardest hearted employer feels for the weaker sex makes it difficult for him to turn empty away that tired-looking, worn young girl who has brought him a new Shakespeare to subscribe for, or who is eager to put his name down amongst the list of donors to a charity. A mere man would be promptly "turned down." But it goes against the grain to refuse a woman unless the request is quite outrageous. No doubt it was a recognition of that fact which has led to the employment on so huge a scale of the woman canvasser.

Like many other interesting innovations, the woman canvasser had her rise in America, and it was in selling books on the subscription basis that she achieved her most brilliant successes. Here, at home, it is on what is called the "advertisement side" of certain enterprising newspapers that she has scored most heavily. And deservedly so. There are journals today reaping revenues that run into thousands a year, which have been won for them by smart lady canvassers; canvassers who do the thing on a grand scale, driving round to the best shops up West in a well-appointed coupé or motor car, and taking care, we may be sure, to see no one but the manager or the heads of departments. These are ladies who would disdain the title of "canvasser." Probably they never mention so mundane a subject as an order for space, but the recognition of their intelligent and appreciative "write ups" in the papers they represent invariably takes that form. Their intimate knowledge of all the latest developments of fashion, their quick perception of anything new that is coming along, above all the fact that most of them contrive somehow or other to know everybody who is anybody, together with the fact that they can write brightly and well on the various questions that interest women, render them invaluable to fashionable organs as "business getters." Frequently they are paid on commission alone, with a liberal allowance for expenses. Often the first item will bring them in some hundreds a year. There is one organ well known to the writer, of great repute though attenuated circulation, which enjoys an income of some thousands per annum, due largely to the personality, energy, and cleverness of the brilliant lady who presides over its advertising pages. Personally popular, and a shrewd judge of men and things, her opinion is eagerly sought by many of the heads of the great houses "up West," and, to use another Americanism, "what she says, goes." She is an invaluable asset to the paper she represents, and, as part of her work is to go everywhere, and be seen by everybody, we may take it that she has a fairly good time of it. The social whirl, the very latest fashionable distraction, all the most brilliant events of the London season, these are not only her pleasures but her business also, and the paper she represents benefits to the tune of some thousands a year, paid for advertisements, which, whatever other journal is passed over, must be given to the weekly to which this bright particular star is attached.

Contrast with this lady, brilliant, well dressed, eminently successful, her sisters at the other end of the ladder. The difference is indeed a marked one.

Let us take the case of a girl known to the writer of this article—an exceptionally smart canvasser and hard worker. Her method is simple but ingenious. She calls on the better class of suburban householders, and succeeds, by dint of cleverness and persistence, in getting through to the mistress, to whom she promptly makes a present of a little pad. No doubt, she goes on to say, the lady would like a stamp of her name or initials also. Deftly and swiftly she sets the type up. If she is lucky, and the children of the house are with their mother when she calls, then their delight is unbounded, and immediately she is requested to set up stamps for the children's names also. In that case victory is assured, for, of course, without ink, neither the children's names nor their mother's can be stamped anywhere, and ink is not given away, but sold at the rate of 1s. a bottle. In nine cases out of ten this strategy is successful, and the ink finds a purchaser.

The wages earned by these suburban canvassers are wretchedly inadequate, often miserable in the extreme, such as even the dock labourer, to say nothing of the domestic servant, would turn their nose up at. In one case details of which have just been given me, girls were engaged by a certain firm to canvass for the enlargements of photographs. They were to call on likely people in the suburbs, and to offer enlargements of the photographs of relatives, etc., at a moderate charge. The pay was as follows: There was a salary of 10s. per week, together with a bonus of 3d. on every enlargement of a photo from ordinary to cabinet size, and of 1s. from cabinet to full-size. My information is that none of the girls who accepted this offer were able to make more than 17s. per week.

Of course, if we contrast this form of canvassing with that of "touting" for advertisements, we may see at once the advantage which the latter possesses. An advertisement canvasser is entitled to a commission on his "renewals." That is to say, when once a firm comes into a paper, and, finding the experiment profitable, repeats it, the canvasser who introduced the order can claim a commission on the repeat. But, of course, the suburban householder, who requires the lineaments of his grandfather elaborated, does not repeat, and there is no commission on renewal to be hoped for. What is the result? The earnings of these girls, canvassing up and down the suburbs, are cruelly meagre. They are out from early morning till late at night. Their expenditure on 'bus and tram fares is considerable. When midday comes, they can afford, alas! only a cup of tea and a piece of cake. They leave Lyons' or the A. B. C. positively hungry. Perhaps sick even for the want of good, nourishing food; but they must pull themselves together, so that the next possible customer they call on does not "turn them down." It is just that "extra little bit of ginger that pulls the orders," a very clever canvasser once said in my hearing. He was right. He lunched every day at Romano's, and took care to do himself well. His very laugh was infectious. His look spelt confidence. Yes, I could see the customers surrendering to his well fortified affability. Then I thought of the peaked-faced girls trudging up and down the suburban streets, hungry and dispirited, unable to take an order, and, oh so tired!

When it comes to this sort of canvassing, when the boots are down at heel, and the pavement is hot and dusty, and the throat parched, a man will do better under such an ordeal than his womanly competitors. To begin with, he has greater reserves of energy to call up, and, driven into a corner, makes the better fight of it. I have known men and women canvassers go out on the same proposition. The women were by far the more assiduous. They worked right through the week steadily and persistently. The men, on the other hand, left the actual work to the last couple of days. Then they put out all their strength, and pulled double the business of the women.

Men, too, have another advantage over women canvassers. While the latter are tactful, eloquent talkers, quiet, insistent, and persuasive, they have not often the strange quality of geniality that some men possess. Geniality we have got to think of as a rich man's gift; but many a poor canvasser has captured an order through it. I remember well hearing a canvasser of my acquaintance relate how he went swaggering into the shop of a rich tradesman, to whom he put up his proposition. "Is that all?" replied Dives. "Why, bless my soul, I'd thought you'd come to buy my business." The canvasser, of the male gender, was unabashed. "I should like to," he said; "but just now I can't afford it." Against his will, the principal gave a sepulchral laugh, and the canvasser knew that the order was captured!

On the other hand, women canvassers are infinitely more conscientious, hard-working, and reliable.

It is, I suppose, this quality of reliability that they possess in so high a degree as compared with male canvassers that has led to women being employed so largely in this direction. One of the most interesting developments that this same quality has led to—a development that somehow one does not like to think about overmuch—is the increasing employment of women as debt collectors and process servers. It is not nice, of course, to reflect that the modest-looking, soft-voiced young lady, who has called without an invitation on the elusive owner of that house in the square where they stay so exceedingly late of a night, and make such a noise occasionally over those card games they delight in—it is not very nice, I say, to reflect that this young lady has a writ or a judgment summons for the owner of the said house, and has followed him through all sorts of neighbourhoods and vicissitudes until he has been duly served. Still, it is found in actual practice that women do this sort of work more faithfully, more assiduously than men, and that they are infinitely more successful in obtaining results. The first essential of a good canvasser is to get through to the principal that he or she desires to interview. Here women are infinitely more successful than men. "Is it about advertisements?" is a phrase that many a canvasser of the male sex has heard from the office boy, with a sinking heart, a feeling of suppressed rage. Inevitably the answer is in the affirmative, and inevitably he does not see his man. There is nothing doing. Somehow women are cleverer at overcoming these difficulties. Perhaps the office boy, like the Lord Chancellor in Iolanthe, is "rather susceptible." Perhaps he thinks the lady is a distant cousin of the manager. Anyway, the lady canvasser laughs at bolts and bars, and gets through under circumstances that would deter the most resolute "business getter" of the other sex.

Of course there are other developments of her canvassing from which one does not shrink so much. Many of the West End houses have skilled "demonstrators" at work all day showing off their blouses or corsets to the very best advantage, and getting customers, we may be sure, when nothing else would suffice. This quite recent development has already "caught on" considerably, and brings the girls engaged good earnings in the form of commission, their gross receipts far exceeding the emoluments offered by other firms trading in less expensive articles. Not long ago, for instance, a well-known firm of sweet manufacturers offered for picked lady canvassers 30s. a week and a commission of 2½ per cent. Of course, when one recollects how very heavy the canvasser's expenses necessarily are, we see at once that the terms are hardly equivalent to the wages of a typist or of a domestic servant. But they are princely compared to some of the earnings of the humbler class of canvassers. The earnings of women who call at house after house in the suburbs trying to sell tea or to obtain orders for sewing machines or wringers are wretchedly low, hard and dispiriting as their work may be; and if any of my readers should by any chance be driven to adopt canvassing as a livelihood, let them take good care to have only expensive articles to sell.

I suppose one of the most profitable developments in connection with the canvassing activities of women is that part of them devoted to obtaining subscriptions for charities, hospitals, and the like. Women are extraordinarily successful in this direction, and, quite properly, are very well paid indeed. So much so, that the various institutions which employ them have incurred criticism from time to time for paying so large a proportion of their receipts away in this direction. But the labourer is worthy of her hire, even though she does not serve Mammon; and one is glad to reflect that, at all events, in one department of her work she is well remunerated. For the most part, alas! one has to think of her as ill-fed, badly clothed, with thin boots, and an aching heart, calling on herself for efforts that I, at all events, am old-fashioned enough to believe should be spared mothers and sisters of a great, a prosperous, and a proud people.

THE index to the first volume of EVERYMAN is now ready, and will be sent post free to any reader on application, accompanied by 4d. in stamps. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 8d.; also Vol. I. of EVERYMAN, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d., carriage paid 4s. Those desirous of obtaining the above should write AT ONCE to the EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C., as numerous applications have already been received.

THE LLOYD GEORGE CRUSADE BY

P. W. WILSON II.—THE WAGE PROBLEM

IN explaining the attitude of Mr. Lloyd George towards the wage problem I may recall the fact that year by year the Labour party submits to Parliament its resolution in favour of a minimum of 30s. a week. After an hour or two of amiable conversation, the benches being for the most part empty, the subject is dropped and the statistics roll on for another twelve months. This is the pitiful answer of Parliament to the cry that the homes of the people are undermined. Moreover, Mr. Lloyd George and the Socialists agree in urging that the remedy lies deeper than strikes and arbitration. Here and there negotiation may level up some sweated industry, but this is mere adjustment, hardly amounting in the aggregate to a defence of the status quo, especially if boom prices be taken into the reckoning. Prosperity doubtless brings employment, but it is the Nemesis of prosperity that on the same wage the employed person is actually worse off than he would be if at work during a slump. If we are to set on one side the Socialist policy of general nationalisation, what is the alternative remedy for inadequate wages?

Mr. Lloyd George was bred in a village. He has witnessed at first hand the recruitment of the labour market from the countryside. He holds that wage scales throughout modern industry are determined broadly by the remuneration of the agricultural labourer. The railwayman is modestly paid because every rural station is a feeder whereby village lads to whom 16s. a week is wealth can be drawn into the system. You cannot impose a minimum of 30s. a week on railways until something like this sum is paid upon the farm. The same reasoning applies to the police, to the docker, to the building trades—indeed, more or less to the whole range of employment. In past years it was the Irish immigrant—exiled and embittered—who furnished a reservoir of labour at low wages. The agrarian revolution in Ireland has altered that, and what Mr. Lloyd George advocates for Great Britain is a revolution, essentially similar, though widely diverse in its legislative expression—a revolution which would shatter the magnetism of a mere 16s. a week as railway porter and turn the countryside into an arena which young men and women will only leave when offered a substantial compensation elsewhere.

How to raise agricultural wages is thus the central problem of social reform, as it is regarded by the Lloyd George Crusaders. Methods, both direct and indirect, are suggested. Lord Henry Bentinck frankly advocates an extension of Trade Boards to agriculture.

He points out that in Dorsetshire thirty-six labourers at 16s. a week are required to work 1,000 acres of the kind of land which in Durham, where mines are contiguous, is worked successfully by nine-teen labourers at 22s. a week. Owing to various circumstances the Durham farmer has had to pay an additional 6s., but he has obtained for this sum a labourer of double the efficiency in comparison with Dorset. The reason is simple. Scarcity of cottages is admitted, and this scarcity means that young men migrate, leaving the veterans to garrison the soil. The veterans cannot fight the battle for a living wage, first, because they are not always economically worth £1 a week, and, secondly, because they are tied to the farmer by a double bond—he is their landlord as well as their employer. If on the countryside you had abundance of cottages, held independently, whether of landowner or of the farmer, and reinforced by allotments, the result would be a race of capable young labourers, secure against eviction, who would be able to claim their price. To get such cottages requires, first, the right to take over land at Budget valuation; secondly, a building loan from the State; and thirdly, cheap and scientific construction. There has just been concluded at the Board of Agriculture a complete inquiry into buildings for small holdings and agricultural labourers. This inquiry shows that for £150 a decent cottage, with three bedrooms, not ill-designed from the æsthetic standpoint, can be provided. Every £150 so devoted works out at about 2s. a week in rent—this inclusive of sinking fund—so that for £150 cottages at 3s. a week are now rendered possible, as in Sweden—this without resort to wood or concrete for walls. In Ireland the cottages have been given to the people at little over half their cost price. In Great Britain there is no reason why a loan of, say, £15,000,000 should not be represented by assets fully equal to its par value, and be repaid within the lifetime of the fabric. Such a loan would furnish about 100,000 cottages. For some years to come it would steady the building industry, and, by furnishing alternative employment on the countryside, would set in motion the rise in wages for agricultural labour which more permanent causes would afterwards sustain. Such a 100,000 homes, to be independent of the farmer and of the landowner, must be under the control, not of the County Council, which the farmer and the landowner dominate, but of the Small Holdings Commissioners or other central authority. Tenants might be allowed to purchase their cottages on strictly business terms, with the proviso that the State shall have the option to repurchase in all cases where the owner wishes to sell. Experience has, however, shown that in England ownership has no magical superiority over tenure at a reasonable rental, with security against disturbance.

The wage value of the cottage is enhanced with every small holding that commences a successful career. Such small holding adds one to the number of competing employers, and in many cases it rescues a unit from the ranks of the employed. At present the Act has placed about 160,000 acres under small holdings, an achievement still far below the possibilities.

Want of space forbids that I should here enter into other questions, like agricultural organisation, credit banks, and so forth. I will only remark that the productiveness of the soil must, in the long run, go far to determine the wages derived therefrom, and that in many counties it has yet to be realised that agriculture is at once a business and a science. The broad argument here is that at present low wages mean low rents, and low rents mean a famine in dwellings. What the Lloyd Georgeites desire is to reverse the vicious circle, securing by means of cottages valuable men on the land who are worth good wages, and so, by means of good wages, stimulating the further demand for cottages.

How land taxation would affect this problem is a question for separate treatment.

GEORGE BORROW

* * * BY E. HERMANN

THE man who would attempt to explain or analyse the charm of Borrow might as well undertake to catch the ocean wave in a net. Who can decompose an enchantment that owes little to verbal cunning, and still less to artistic ecstasy, moral passion, or intellectual strength—a charm which is a mysterious contagion, an irrational and dizzy joy, a weird and intoxicating delight, and which crumbles at the first application of the critical calculus? Mr. Birrell is entirely right when he assures us that Borrowians are born, not made. The true Borrowian simply loves George Borrow, accepting him as a man accepts the woman he loves, and joyfully forgiving a hundred contrarities, vagaries, caprices, and cruelties. Men blown together from all parts of the globe will wax comradely over a talk about "Lavengro" or "The Bible in Spain," as men of antipodean temperament and character will discover a thousand affinities if they have once lit their dreams at the same woman's eyes. Nor does it need the witching hour of night, when the spirit of frank confidence descends upon the most reticent, to loosen the Borrowian's tongue. His love will stand the ordeal of the sun—it is, indeed, essentially a thing for daylight wear and for the open air. If Borrow was anything he was a genuine "open-air man," and for a really satisfactory talk about Isopel Berners, the Flaming Tinman, Ursula the wife of Sylvester, the Old Woman on London Bridge, the Bruisers of England, and all those other Borrowian folk whom we know so much better than our fellow-workers in shop or office, give us a ramble along the open road. I do not know what sore-hearted woman it was who said that she had rather be loved than respected. If such a wistful conviction ever came to the unbeloved Vagabond of Oulton Broad, death has given him in overflowing measure what life so persistently withheld.

George Borrow's life-tragedy began early. A weird, futile, morose child, living in a dream world, and dividing his time between black fits of unchildlike melancholy and an alarming taste for low company, some inscrutable destiny had pitchforked him into as respectable and conventional a family as could be found anywhere in England. Between him and his father, from whom he inherited his strong physique, unquenchable love of fighting and anti-Catholic prejudices, there was an early-ripened misunderstanding, which gathered bitterness as the years went on, and brought a constant nagging pain. What man who has read Borrow with any sort of understanding will ever forget that pitiless picture of himself and his dying father in "Lavengro"—a cold, hard, word-etching, with every line bitten clean and true, and rivalled only by Defoe for its compelling power of sheer, naked authenticity. The son's voluble, yet far from willing answers to the father's monotonous and inquisitorial "Well?" suggest a hell of quiet torture. As one reads, the calm but unequivocally hostile quality of that "Well?" scrapes and rasps upon the mind to the point of physical pain. It is a masterpiece of vital evocation with the utmost economy of verbal machinery.

After his father's death Borrow came to London, convinced, as many before him, that London was there for his conquering. London all but conquered him. His translations from all the languages whose acquirement had beguiled the tedium of his early years found no market. He had to sharpen his literary tools on the chronicles of notorious highwaymen and other gaol-birds. And at the last, even hack-work did not avail to keep body and soul together, and he turned his back upon cities and chose the roving life which was his final step to greatness. He bought the stock-in-trade of a gipsy tinker, and, with cart and donkey, embarked on the life of a nomad. Strong as a giant, and full of courage and the spirit of adventure, a lover of the open air, and of everything in man or beast that was picturesque and out of the common—how could he fail to suck some happiness out of a life such as that? His eyes took a keen hold on all he saw, and they remembered well; years after, in "Lavengro" and elsewhere, he recalled the strange company he consorted with then with a vivid accuracy that startles and charms. Moreover, it was then he met Isopel Berners—the woman all Borrowians love as if they had drowsed through honey-sweet hours with her in the dingle, and questioned the stars by her side. Borrow counted the love of this strange, fierce, deep-hearted girl as water spilt upon the ground, and tortured her into flight to an unknown land, and he knew not what horrible fate. But if the thought of her stung like fire afterwards, he must have drunk deep draughts of enchantment over the camp fire in the dingle.

There followed closely shrouded years of humiliation and disappointment, and then his wonderful linguistic gifts secured to him the strangely incongruous position of translator and colporteur to the British and Foreign Bible Society. With all their reputed narrowness, the directors of the Bible Society knew how to appreciate this most unconventional missionary; and George Borrow performed his duties not only with characteristic vigour, but with a scrupulous fidelity in rendering accounts. Having performed the miracle of learning Manchu in three or four weeks, and translating part of the Bible into that language, he went as a colporteur to Spain and Portugal, and thus "The Bible in Spain" came into being. This book is the favourite of most Borrowians, not a few exalting it to the great detriment of "Lavengro." But one would be inclined to quarrel with such a judgment. "The Bible in Spain" has the magic of spontaneity. It carries one along with a glorious stride—a breathless contagion of life and motion. "Lavengro" bears the mark of deliberate and irksome toil; but for depth of suggestion and evocative power it stands supreme.

There followed long, dreary years of comparative failure, disillusionment, and much bitter railing against injustice and lack of appreciation. Gradually Borrow sank into the dreary loneliness of disappointment. Finally he settled down in an old farmhouse on Oulton Broad—a recluse and somewhat of an ogre to the simple country folk around him, who feared and avoided him. There he died, alone. From there his body was despatched by train in a deal box hurriedly put together by the village carpenter.

I have said that a tramp in the open is best for a really good talk about "Lavengro." But better still is a tramp in the open with "Lavengro" in one's pocket and no talk at all. Alone on the open road, a tramp for the time being, with the curious sense of power and freedom that comes of utter loneliness and lack of responsibility—it is then that the world of the open road becomes real and enters into a man. Then, if he opens his "Lavengro," though he be sweltering in a sun-baked, windless place, he will hear, blowing through the wide, vague spaces of his soul "the wind on the heath, brother; the wind on the heath!"

THE REAL NAPOLEON BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THERE is probably no historical character on whom so much has been written as on Napoleon. The last twenty years especially have witnessed in every country a veritable flood of Napoleonic literature. In France Memoirs of Napoleon sell even better than objectionable novels, and their market is world-wide. Even in England there is an increasing output of Napoleonic books, and the historical schools of our Universities give precedence to the little Corsican over the heroes of national history.

Amongst the innumerable volumes which have thus been added to that Napoleonic literature one book stands out as having completely changed our view of the Emperor's personality. I am referring to the masterpiece of Monsieur Arthur-Levy, "Napoléon Intime." "Napoléon Intime" is the work of a distinguished business man, and not of a professional historian, and for a long time professional and academic historians have tried to ignore it. But its conclusions have gradually made their way, and are to-day more and more generally accepted by those best qualified to judge. Quite recently the greatest historian of contemporary France, Count Vandal, left on record his appreciation of the unique value of Monsieur Levy's research.

In order to put the character of Napoleon in an entirely different light, all that the author has had to do has been to study his hero, not in his public activities, but in his private life, in his home surroundings, in his capacity as a son and a husband, as a brother and a friend. We are often told that the private life of a great man does not concern us, and English historians do not like to pry into the intimacy of their national heroes. For instance, the historians of Wellington in their voluminous biographies carefully refrain from telling us anything of the love affairs of the Iron Duke. On the other hand, French historians instinctively have always shown much reticence. They have always felt that it is the private man that gives the key to the public man. Monsieur Arthur-Levy has proved once more that the French instinct is a right one, at least from the point of view of historical truth, and that, so far as Napoleon is concerned, whereas the soldier and Emperor is only an actor playing a part on the stage of universal history, his real personality and humanity are revealed to us in his love letters, in his domestic correspondence, in the intimacy of his home life.

II.

The main conclusion of Monsieur Arthur-Levy may be summed up in the one contention that the truth about Napoleon's character is exactly the reverse of the truth which hitherto has been universally accepted.

It is universally assumed that Napoleon was, above all, a man of blood and iron, that the intellectual side of his nature and his formidable will power had been developed at the expense of all human feeling. Monsieur Levy, on the contrary, conclusively proves that the emotional side of Napoleon's character was as strongly developed as the intellectual, that the tender passions were as active and intense as the manly passions, and that as a lover Napoleon might almost be described as a sentimentalist.

Again, it is the universal opinion that Napoleon was a kind of miracle, a "monstrum" in the Latin sense, and a "Superman" in the Nietzschean sense; that he was a savage Corsican whom circumstances brought to rule over a civilised community: in one word, that he was not normal, but abnormal. Monsieur Levy, on the contrary, proves that Napoleon is entirely normal; that his greatness consists, not in his possessing qualities of which the average man is deprived, but in his possessing, in the highest degree and in their fullness, all the characteristics of the ordinary man.

And, finally, it is the general opinion that Napoleon recognised no rule but his own will; that he trampled down every law, human and divine; that he was like an elemental force of nature, uncontrolled and unrestrained. Monsieur Arthur-Levy proves that Napoleon was bound by the rules and conventions of commonplace morality; that he possessed not only the virtues which make the successful business man, hard work, order, method, integrity, but also the domestic and private virtues, integrity, filial piety, loyalty to friends, honesty.

There, according to our author, lies the supreme morality of Napoleon's career. He is not an exception to the law, but he confirms it. He does not challenge morality, but strengthens it. If so prodigious and unique a career can at all be adduced as an example and an illustration to point a lesson, Napoleon can only be adduced by those who believe in the accepted foundations of moral and social life. Napoleon did not take any short cuts to power. He took the royal road. He is not a hero according to the heart of Nietzsche; he is rather a hero of Plutarch. One might almost say he is a hero conforming to the middle-class standard of Mr. Samuel Smiles. He achieved greatness because he was a good son and a loyal friend, an honest, hard-working bourgeois. And he only forfeited greatness when, through the abuse of power, he lost those qualities and virtues which had raised him to the pinnacle. Considered in that light, Napoleon may appear a less epic and a less poetic figure, but he becomes more human, more intelligible, more intensely interesting to the philosopher, because more on a level with eternal human nature.

III.

Let us first consider Napoleon in his relation to women. We have had endless books on the love intrigues of the Emperor. We are constantly told of his cynicism, of his brutality, but we have had no single exhaustive study on the one true love story of his life, on his all-absorbing passion for Josephine. Yet there are few love stories more fascinating in the annals of human passion. And, by virtue of this one central episode in his life, Napoleon is entitled to rank as one of the great lovers of literature. For, even considered merely as literature, his love letters do take a very high place. They are as eloquent as the Letters of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, and they have a much more genuine ring. Lockhart, in his biography (in "Everyman's Library"), which, after eighty-five years, remains one of the best summary accounts of Napoleon's career, may object to their "indelicate," but he forgets that a Southern Corsican temperament and a Revolutionary age were not exactly conducive to reticence and restraint.

Very often in the biography of statesmen and rulers and thinkers we find that Love and ambition are mutually exclusive. Love plays little part in the lives of Lord Bacon, of William Pitt, of Frederick the Great, as it plays no part whatever in the lives of the supreme philosophers, inveterate bachelors, such as Descartes, Spinoza, and Kant. On the contrary, Love has been the one supreme event in Napoleon's youth. In love, I repeat it, Napoleon is a sentimentalist. His passion for Josephine burst out at twenty-six years of age with all the violence of a first love, and for the time being fills his whole nature. His military triumphs are all laid at the feet of the adored. But, alas! that first love was also destined to be the last, and that great romance was also destined to be a great tragedy. For the passion of Napoleon was not requited. The Creole Society woman, the "mondaine" and "demi-mondaine" despised the little, lean, haggard, upstart Corsican. Josephine was not only frivolous and heartless; she is now proved to have been unfaithful almost on the morrow of her marriage. She is primarily answerable for the sad change which took place in Napoleon's attitude to women, and in his attitude to life. He left Italy a naïve enthusiast. He returned from Egypt a disillusioned cynic. He forgave Josephine, as he generally forgave those who wronged him, because magnanimity was part of his nature, but he could not forget her betrayal. The evil done was irreparable. Josephine had inflicted an incurable wound. Henceforth the character of Napoleon is hardened, and is impervious to the softer emotions. Henceforth the epigram which we find in his early Dialogue on Love truly expresses his attitude: "I believe that Love is harmful both to Society and to the individual. I believe that Love does more evil than good" (Yung, "Bonaparte and his Times," page 75).

(To be continued.)

MR. F. R. BENSON AND THE STRATFORD FESTIVAL

I.

THIS week and next, and the two weeks after, all good, wise people steal a couple of days from their business and go to Stratford-on-Avon, for there Mr. F. R. Benson holds his annual Shakespeare Festival, and every man and woman with the dust of cities upon them can get a breath of the atmosphere of merry England to last them the whole year after. There is nothing like it to be found anywhere else, and it is the best spring tonic you can have. And there is no mere fake or clumsy imitation about it. You pass down the streets of the old town, streaming with flags, enter the theatre for the play, and afterwards walk by the still banks of the Avon, and the feeling you get is not that of the revival of some dusty ghostliness raked out from forgotten corners, but of the abounding energy of creative life springing up anew. No one who has only read about the Festival in the papers can have any idea of its intense vitality. It is not a mere scholastic or antiquarian outing. It is as bright and fresh as the dew in the morning, and as gay as spring flowers. Good EVERYMAN, I beseech you, go there and be made young again, if you are old, or go and keep your youth, if age hath not yet staled you.

II.

The strong note of enthusiasm characteristic of the Festival is due to one man. That man is F. R. Benson, the lightest-hearted, hardest-working, choicest spirit there. You will see him with the children—oh, not a heart more overflowing with enjoyment than his! you will see him on the stage—Shylock, Benedick, Malvolio, Henry V.; you will see him (if you are lucky) in his dressing-room talking with infinite patience to all sorts of men—"from the four corners of the earth they come"; you will see him in the streets nodding to the townsmen and at home with them. A wonderful man, who sheds the fire of his optimism and imagination on all. You will talk to him and hardly believe your ears, for here is a man grown old in the service of his art, who has sounded the depths of disappointment and stood to lose all that he had, who speaks like a boy with the world before him, unheeding, because unknowing, the formidable obstacles in his path. He will talk to you with simple eagerness which will make you forget your own difficulties. The good times for the drama are to come, he will say. We are yet only at the beginning. This Stratford Festival—why, the Festival spirit is coming back into the whole of England! What you see at Stratford you will see in every town. Dancing, happy children, men and women forgetting their cares, gaiety and brightness once more irradiating life—that is what he prophesies. And he gets his belief, his courage, his whole philosophy from Shakespeare.

III.

Yes, Shakespeare is the key to this man. He is so steeped in him, so drenched in his spirit, that, instead of an actor, a mere mime, he has become a prophet and a poet. He is himself a creator. At Stratford you do not think of the plays as "revivals." They are new, they are Benson's. He makes them as up to date as Shaw. Not that you will find any new interpretation, business, or "decoration" in them. Everything is as old-fashioned as the forty-year-old scenery. But the spirit, the "go," the original living mind, that is what transforms the whole. The Memorial Theatre is a beastly theatre—yes, beastly is the only word; but when you are there you don't care about that. You don't look at the theatre; you look at the scene on the stage—at Illyria, Messina, Verona, at the fairyland of Puck. You let yourself be taken out of the Marconi world into a region where controversies are over and forgotten.

"This music crept to me upon the waters,
Allaying both their fury and their passion,
With its sweet air."

IV.

The Benson Company play as though Shakespeare were their ordinary speech. The poetry comes off their tongues as though they had made it. They move about amid familiar scenes, and are as much at home in the courts of old English kings and on the coast of Bohemia as we are in the Strand. And they don't mind showing how much they are at home and how much they enjoy being there. There is no shyness about them. Polonius well described them when he spoke of "the best actors in the world." Truly, nothing is too heavy for them, and nothing too light.

V.

The Shakespeare Memorial Theatre is the only endowed theatre in this country. In it all the plays of Shakespeare except three have been produced, and other dramatists also, from Marlowe to Shaw, and from Ben Jonson to Stephen Phillips, have been represented. In Mr. Benson's hands it is a centre of inspiration for noble living, and its influence is increasing yearly in extent. Now in the spring, and again in the summer, it attracts great numbers who find it a means of imperishable delight. All lovers of England hold it in honour. As I write this at the beginning of the Festival I hear the call of "The Piper," the play which belongs specially to Stratford and the Festival, for it was first produced there, and it is Mr. Benson the wizard, the man with the pipe, who charms us and draws us after him:—

"Out of your cage,
Come out of your cage,
And take your soul on a pilgrimage!
Pease in your shoes, an if you must!
But out and away, before you're dust:
Scribe and Stay-at-home,
Saint and sage,
Out of your cage,
Out of your cage!"

C. B. PURDOM.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

JOSEPH DE MAISTRE ON THE INEQUALITY OF THE SEXES

Lettre à Mademoiselle Constance de Maistre.

Tu me demandes, ma chère enfant, après avoir lu mon sermon sur la science des femmes, d'où vient qu'elles sont condamnées à la médiocrité? Tu me demandes en cela la raison d'une chose qui n'existe pas et que je n'ai jamais dite. Les femmes ne sont nullement condamnées à la médiocrité, elles peuvent même prétendre au sublime, mais au sublime féminin. Chaque être doit se tenir à sa place, et ne pas affecter d'autres perfections que celles qui lui appartiennent.

Si une belle dame m'avait demandé il y a vingt ans: "Ne croyez-vous pas, monsieur, qu'une dame pourrait être un grand général comme un homme?" je n'aurais pas manqué de lui répondre: "Sans doute, madame, si vous commandiez une armée, l'ennemi se jetterait à vos genoux, comme j'y suis moi-même; personne n'oserait tirer, et vous entreriez dans la capitale ennemie au son du violon et des tambourins." Si elle m'avait dit: "Qui m'empêche d'en savoir en astronomie autant que Newton?" je lui aurais répondu tout aussi sincèrement: "Rien du tout, ma divine beauté. Prenez le télescope, les astres tiendront à grand honneur d'être lorgnés par vos beaux yeux, et ils s'empresseront de vous dire tous leurs secrets." Voilà comment on parle aux femmes en vers et même en prose. Mais celle qui prend cela pour argent comptant est bien sottée. Comme tu te trompes, ma chère enfant, en me parlant du mérite un peu vulgaire d'être mère! Avoir des enfants, ce n'est que de la peine; mais le grand honneur est de faire des hommes, et c'est ce que les femmes font mieux que nous. Crois-tu que j'aurais beaucoup d'obligations à ta mère si elle avait composé un roman au lieu de me donner ton frère? Mais le mérite, ce n'est pas de le mettre au monde et le poser dans son berceau: c'est d'en faire un brave jeune homme, qui croit en Dieu et n'a pas peur du canon.

Le mérite de la femme est de régler sa maison, de rendre son mari heureux, de le consoler, de l'encourager, et d'élever ses enfants, c'est-à-dire de faire des hommes; voilà le grand accouchement, qui n'a pas été maudit comme l'autre. Au reste, ma chère enfant, il ne faut rien exagérer; je crois que les femmes en général ne doivent point se livrer à des connaissances qui contrarient leurs devoirs; mais je suis fort éloigné de croire qu'elles doivent être parfaitement ignorantes. Je ne veux pas qu'elles croient que Pekin est en France, ni qu'Alexandre le Grand demanda en mariage la fille de Louis XIV. La saine littérature, les moralistes, les grands orateurs, etc., suffisent pour donner aux femmes la culture dont elles ont besoin.

Quand tu parles de l'éducation des femmes qui étouffent le génie, tu ne fais pas attention que ce n'est pas l'éducation qui produit la faiblesse, mais que c'est la faiblesse qui souffre cette éducation. S'il y avait un pays d'amazones qui se procurassent une colonie de petits garçons pour les élever comme on élève les femmes, bientôt les hommes prendraient la première place, et donneraient le fouet aux amazones. En un mot, la femme ne peut être supérieure que comme femme, mais dès qu'elle veut émuler l'homme, ce n'est qu'un singe.

Adieu, petit singe. Je t'aime presque autant que Biribi, qui a cependant une réputation immense à Saint Petersburg.

Letter to Mademoiselle Constance de Maistre.

YOU ask me, my dear child, after reading my lay sermon on the education of woman, how it is that they are condemned to mediocrity? There you ask me to prove something which does not exist, and something which I never said. Women are not at all condemned to mediocrity; they may even aspire to sublimity, but only to feminine sublimity. We should all keep our own places, and only affect those qualities which belong to us.

Had a beautiful lady asked me twenty years ago, "Do you not believe, sir, that a lady could be as great a general as a man?" I should not have failed to reply, "Undoubtedly, madam, if you commanded an army, the enemy would throw themselves at your feet, as I do. Nobody would dare to shoot, and you would enter into the enemy's capital to the sound of the violin and tambourins." If she had asked me, "What prevents me from knowing as much about astronomy as Newton?" I should have told her just as sincerely, "Nothing at all, my heavenly beauty! Take the telescope; the stars would consider it a great honour to be ogled at by your lovely eyes, and would hasten to tell you all their secrets." That is how one talks to women in verse and in prose. But she who takes that as ready money is truly foolish. What a mistake you make, my dear child, in speaking to me of "the rather vulgar merit of being a mother." Merely to have children may require nothing but trouble, but the great honour is to make men, and that is what women can do better than ourselves. Do you think I should have been very much obliged to your mother if she had composed a novel instead of giving me your brother? But the credit lies not in bringing him into the world and placing him in his cradle; it is in making an honest young man of him, one who believes in God and has no fear of cannon.

Woman's mission is to regulate the house, to make her husband happy, to console him, to encourage him, and to rear up his children—that is to say, to make men; that is the great "travail," which has not been cursed as the other.

At the same time, my dear child, one must exaggerate nothing. I believe that women in general ought never to devote themselves to knowledge contrary to their duty. But I am far from believing that they ought to be perfectly ignorant. I do not wish them to believe that Pekin is in France, or that Alexander the Great asked to marry Louis XIV.'s daughter. Wholesome literature, moralists, great orators, etc., suffice to give women the culture they require.

When you speak of the present education of women destroying genius you forget that it is not the education which produces the weakness, but it is the weakness which produces the education. If there existed a country of Amazons who had provided themselves with a colony of small boys, and who had educated them as we educate women, the men would soon take the upper hand and whip the Amazons. In short, woman cannot be superior except as woman, for as soon as she tries to rival man she is only a monkey!

Adieu, little monkey. I love you almost as much as I love Biribi, who at present has a boundless reputation in St. Petersburg.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE'S "BLITHEDALE ROMANCE."* By C. SHERIDAN JONES

IT needs, perhaps, some little courage, when one is writing of a supreme genius like Nathaniel Hawthorne, to pass over what is usually regarded as the greatest exemplification of his art, at once so elusive, so distinctive, so peculiarly his own, and to offer the reader instead a work far less thumbed, though, as I venture to think, not less treasured by those who know its charm. "The Scarlet Letter" has been translated into almost every language; its readers are legion. "The Blithedale Romance," on the other hand, has never achieved the insult of popularity, and is known only to a few. Yet in that very fact lies the justification of my choice. For once let its quaint, compelling power, its freshness, its grip, above all, to use a bad because a vague word, its modernity, win the attention of a larger circle and soothe their jaded spirits, then, even as we all of us prefer a love tale to a sermon, so shall all of us come to think of "The Blithedale Romance" as Hawthorne's most enduring achievement.

I suppose there is in the lives of most people, worth counting, at least one little green patch of youth and romance, when we dreamed and had visions of the delectable mountains, and looked beyond the unlovely, sordid realities of life. Such a period is usually brief—"Brief as first love"—but it leaves on a man an impress that lasts his life through, and will never let him sink below a certain level. It is just that spring-time of the mind that Hawthorne caught and preserved for us in his great romance. Hawthorne was one of a little company of Socialists, or, to be meticulously correct, Communists, who, over half a century ago, repaired to Brook Farm, Rocksbury, U.S.A., to attempt something which has been vulgarised into absurdity since by the now misleading title of the simple life. The history of the nineteenth century is strewn with the broken hopes of these toy Utopias, by which, from Salt Lake City down to Letchworth, mankind has sought to gratify that innate sense of perfection which leads him to revolt against our drab, imperfect, and creaking civilisation. At Blithedale, as Hawthorne re-named Brook Farm, one feels that such an attempt had a golden chance. The Utopians had plenty of grit. They were mellow, but not soft; keen, but not fanatical, and some at least had a saving sense of humour, and smiled when one of the comrades in a fever of nature-worship declared that "we can never call ourselves really regenerated men till a February north-easter is as grateful to us as the softest breeze in June." They had to teach them how to get to work, and farm the land, stout Silas Foster, who mingled little in the conversation of the elect, "but when he did speak it was much to the purpose."

"Which man among you," quoth he, "is the best judge of swine?"

"Pigs! Good heavens! have we come out from among the swinish multitude for this?" Still, the land was good. The labourers were willing, and had too great a breadth of mind to indulge in the petty jealousies and bickerings that have wrecked many such an attempt. They got to work with a will, resolved that "as the basis of our institution we should offer up the earnest toil of our bodies as a prayer, no less than as an effort, for the advancement of our race."

Standing out from among the knot of dreamers of Blithedale was Zenobia, who is presented to the reader with consummate skill. She is the best portrait, I have always thought, that fiction affords of a type that many fictionists have attempted—that of "the high-spirited woman bruising herself against the limitations of her sex." This is how she appeared to Miles Coverdale, the narrator of the story, when he reached Blithedale:

"She was dressed as simply as possible, in an American print, but with a silken kerchief, between which and her gown there was one glimpse of a white shoulder. It struck me as a great piece of good fortune that there should be just that glimpse. Her hair, which was dark, glossy, and of singular abundance, was put up rather soberly and primly, without curls or other ornament, except a single flower. It was an exotic of rare beauty, and as fresh as if the hothouse gardener had just clipped it from the stem. That flower struck deep into my memory. I can both see and smell it at this moment. So brilliant, so rare, so costly, as it must have been, and yet enduring only for a day, it was more indicative of the pride and pomp which had a luxuriant growth in Zenobia's character than if a great diamond sparkled among her hair. . . ."

Zenobia is young, rich, aristocratic, with just that touch of enigmatic mystery as to her origin and position that gives piquancy to the figure.

That night, the first at Blithedale, another girl arrives to take her place in the life of the colony—a desolate, shrinking figure, she comes unannounced and unasked, accompanied by Hollingsworth the Philanthropist—to throw herself at the feet of Zenobia, and to beg shelter and a home; a poor, shivering, sad, depressed figure, Priscilla by name, "with whom it was hardly possible to help being angry in sheer despair of doing anything for her comfort." A perfect foil, in fact, to the brilliant, strong, clever, capable Zenobia, who shone in the kitchen as in the drawing-room.

But what of the man Hollingsworth, who accompanied Priscilla, and who tells his friends that an "old man brought her to my lodging, and told me to convey her here, where, so I thought, she had friends"?

"I never could tolerate a philanthropist before," says Zenobia, and Hollingsworth is the only sort of person one can forgive for answering to that description. He had that strange tenderness that goes sometimes with huge strength, "a tenderness few men could resist, and no women": a man of enormous, elemental force, filled with a furious, a blind, an all-consuming compassion for the weak, the desolate, the lonely and oppressed. Obsessed with their sufferings, he cannot rest or sleep till he has toiled, pleaded, begged, and thundered for them, and, just as the late Joseph Cowen, when asked why he did more for the Polish insurgents than for anybody else, answered, "Because they are the most forlorn," so Hollingsworth's mind is possessed of the great idea of helping convicts; of building a prison for them that all the world should recognise as the model institution for their treatment, by which alone they could be reclaimed.

Many and varied are the combats that the disputants wage at Blithedale, and wonderfully dramatic are the conflicts that these three temperaments strike out from each other, and from Miles Coverdale. I can only find space for one. It is when Hollingsworth lets himself go, with torrential eloquence, on the subject of woman, dismaying his advanced friends by a tremendously vigorous defence of the old-fashioned, conventional view. "Man is a wretch without woman; but woman is a monster—and, thank heaven, an almost impossible and imaginary monster—without man as her acknowledged principle! . . . Were there any possible prospect of woman's taking the social stand—poor, miserable, abortive creatures, who only dream of such things because they have missed woman's peculiar happiness. . . . were there a chance of their attaining the end which these petticoated monstrosities have in view, I would call my own sex to use its physical force, that unmistakable evidence of sovereignty, to scourge them back within their proper bounds."

* Everymans Library.

But women's rights and discussions thereon play little part in the story, which unravels a tangled scheme as it develops. For Zenobia and Priscilla, both of whom love Hollingsworth, both of whom elect to abandon Blithedale colony for the great new convict establishment that his genius is to rear in its place, are, it seems, half-sisters. The old man who sent Priscilla down to Blithedale was their father. He acted in a vain endeavour to equalise matters between these two children, one of whom had inherited the wealth, the independence of spirit, the brilliance that marked his youth, and the other the plaintive resignation of an enfeebled and disgraced old age. But the sisters are, of course, never equal, and Zenobia towers above Priscilla, and, for all the latter's simplicity and pathos, carries off our affection. In one respect only does she lose to Priscilla—the thing that she cares for most in the world—Hollingsworth's love. This Priscilla gains by her very weakness of spirit and body; a weakness that renders her the tool of an unscrupulous, spiritualistic charlatan, whose life has been inextricably mixed up with Zenobia's also. From that fate Hollingsworth rescues Priscilla finally, and takes her back to Blithedale—to renounce the splendid Zenobia for ever, to fling her from him, in fact, with all the brutality that fanaticism had bred in his soul, which could be iron as well as tender.

The final scene is driven home with immense force. Hollingsworth throws Zenobia off, and Priscilla, with heart smiting her, flings herself at the older woman's feet, and begs her love and forgiveness.

Zenobia dies by her own hand that night, but Priscilla lives on for a worse fate. Ten years later Miles Coverdale goes back to Blithedale, and meets her and her husband.

"'I have come, Hollingsworth,' said I, 'to view your grand edifice for the reformation of criminals. Is it finished yet?'"

"'No, nor yet begun,' answered he, without raising his eyes. 'A very small one answers all my purposes.'"

"Priscilla threw me an upbraiding glance. But I spoke again with a bitter and revengeful emotion, as if flinging a poisoned arrow at Hollingsworth's heart. 'Up to this moment,' I enquired, 'how many criminals have you reformed?'"

"'Not one!' said Hollingsworth, with his eyes still fixed on the ground. 'Ever since we parted I have been busy with a single murderer.'"

"Then the tears gushed into my eyes, and I forgave him, for I remembered the wild energy, the passionate shriek with which Zenobia had spoken these words, 'Tell him that he has murdered me!' 'Tell him that I'll haunt him!' and I knew what murderer he meant, and whose vindictive shadow dogged the side where Priscilla was not."

I always think this picture of the strong man, so eloquent, so resolute, so invincible, so indomitable in his purpose, broken, crushed, silent, and to be so for ever, is one of the most terrific warnings that literature has uttered to the soul of man.

ROME AND AN EXCURSION*

AMATEUR ecclesiology is an English mark. We meet people every day who count their cathedrals seen as, in another age and clime, they would have counted their scalps. And it is notorious that few Englishmen, when stranded in a foreign village, can resist the temptation of visiting the local church, however modern, ugly, or neglected. Consequently we possess an extensive and distinguished literature on ecclesiastical architecture and symbolism. Not that our ecclesiophile is, as a rule, in the least learned in these subjects, or endowed with any conspicuous measure of taste; he is willing to learn, he is always beginning to learn, and he seldom attains to anything but a highly edifying state of chaos.

Mr. Bumpus has written a book that is not absolutely for the beginner. He is a zealot of his subject, into which he plunges with commendable impatience, and he does not often pause to explain technicalities or to give his disciples breathing-space. Moreover, and this is his best quality as a cicerone, he has his strong, nay violent, sympathies and antipathies. An excellent quality, we have said, but disconcerting to the adepts of Baedeker. Still, his book is to be strongly recommended to all who want to know more intimately the principal and some other churches of Rome and certain South Italian churches. The excellent illustrations, for one thing, are thoroughly relevant to the text. Only—a little previous knowledge and a certain seriousness of aim are demanded of the reader; Mr. Bumpus is not always lucid, and we have found ourselves forced to read sentences as many as three times before we grasped his real meaning.

The section devoted to St. Peter's is probably the best, as well as the most important, of the book. After that we should rank those on San Lorenzo fuori le Mura, a church that is comparatively neglected by foreigners, and on the wonderful San Clemente. San Paolo fuori le Mura gives Mr. Bumpus fine scope for his more fiercely critical qualities. Of the architect Poletti, of the basilica as it stands to-day, he writes: "We have nothing to thank this architect for, except his retention of the apse and the eastern remains; and perhaps for keeping the general arrangement of five aisles." The last clause is a very distinctly saving one, for, as Mr. Bumpus, two pages later, very properly observes: "The effect of the forest of Corinthian columns, viewed from the north or south-east angles of the nave, is truly magnificent; indeed, I know hardly anything more impressive as a coup d'œil in architecture than the double rows of pillars down the immense nave of San Paolo fuori le Mura at Rome."

Mr. Bumpus is almost equally puzzled how to deliver his final judgment about St. Peter's; after deprecating the expression of private and personal impressions, he gives us the received opinion, in which he partakes, that the great church is full of the defects of its origin, but, once allowed to permeate the æsthetic consciousness, becomes for every serious critic the supreme achievement of human art. This refers only to the interior, though even here our author points with the reproving finger of love to blemish after blemish; externally the defect is undeniable. The façade having been properly pulverised, Mr. Bumpus continues, "which façade itself in its turn is overtopped by the shapeless masses of the Vatican, which looks like a union workhouse built on top of a railway station, and a gigantic printing office superimposed as an attic and an afterthought."

* "The Cathedrals and Churches of Rome and Southern Italy" By T. Francis Bumpus. 16s. net. (T. Werner Laurie.)

AN EXCEPTIONAL OPPORTUNITY TO COMMENCE TAKING "PUNCH"

FOR a short time new subscriptions will be accepted on the extremely advantageous terms of SIXTY-FIVE issues of "PUNCH" and the "Punch Almanack" (which ordinarily cost 19s. 6½d. postpaid) for 13s. 6d.

FOR this small payment you will receive for fifteen months all that is best in humorous journalism—the best jokes, the best cartoons, the best black-and-white illustrations, and the most polished and humorous literary work.

The special offer is for a first order only, and is made to induce you to place a commencing order for the regular delivery of the paper.

By taking advantage of the present occasion you will save nearly 50 per cent. on your outlay

USE THIS ORDER FORM TODAY

Order Form

The Secretary, "PUNCH" Office,
10 Bouverie Street, London, E.C.

DEAR SIR,—I accept your Special Offer to New Subscribers, and enclose remittance for 13s. 6d. I am not at present a Subscriber to "PUNCH," and have not been purchasing it regularly from any Newsagent.

Please send the 65 Issues of "PUNCH" and the "PUNCH" ALMANACK for 1914 to my address as under.

Name

Address

If specially desired, arrangements can be made to make the delivery by hand, at the same price, within the ordinary delivery limits of any Book-stall or Bookshop.

THE MANNEQUIN * * * BY V. BLASCO IBAÑEZ

NINE years had passed since Louis Santurce separated from his wife. Since that day he had only seen her by glimpses, a lovely vision veiled in silks and muslins, flashing past him in a fashionable carriage, or occasionally, as he looked down from the top gallery of the Theatre Royal, he had recognised her in a box far below, the centre of a crowd of men, all competing for the chance to whisper in her ear and advertise their intimacy to an admiring world.

These meetings—if one can call them meetings—had finally quenched the last sparks of his dead passion, and, like a convalescent fearing a relapse, he had persistently avoided her; yet now, in spite of everything, here he was going to meet her, to see her, to speak to her, in that grand Castellana palace whose insolent luxury bore public witness to his own dishonour.

Each jolt of the cab seemed to shake out memories of the past from every corner of his mind. That earlier life, which he had no desire to remember, obstinately unrolled itself before his closed eyes; their honeymoon, the honeymoon of a petty Government clerk married to a woman of beauty and breeding, the daughter of a family that had known better days; the bliss of their first year of poverty sweetened by love; after that the complaints of Henrietta as she began to rebel against her narrow lot; her dumb rage when every man she met told her she was beautiful, and she knew that she was badly dressed; quarrels breaking out between him and her on the smallest pretext; midnight recriminations in their bed-chamber; the growth of suspicions which gradually undermined the husband's faith in his wife; then his sudden and unexpected promotion in the office, and an equally sudden change at home, where, to his surprise, new luxuries made their appearance; at first these novelties were introduced somewhat shyly, as if in fear of scandal, but soon they were flaunted boldly, as if in open mockery of the blindness of her husband and the whole household. At last came the bitter day when Louis received the damning proof of his disgrace. He writhed with shame at the thought of his own weakness. He was no coward, so he assured himself, but he had either lacked will or loved her too well; and so, when, by odious spying, he had convinced himself of his dishonour, he could do no more than raise his clenched fist to strike that fair face of hers, the waxen face of a beautiful doll, and then—refrain from striking. It needed all his resolution to turn her out of the house, and the moment the door closed behind her he had wept like a deserted child.

Then came complete solitude, the deadness of isolation, broken only by newspaper paragraphs that made his wounds bleed afresh. His wife was making the tour of Europe in the style of a princess; she had been "launched" by a millionaire; she had found her true life, the life for which she was born. For a whole winter she was the talk of Paris; the papers were full of the new beauty from Spain; fashionable watering-places rang with her triumphs; men coveted the honour of ruining themselves for her; and various duels and romantic suicides wove a halo of legend round her name. After three years of continuous triumph, she came back to Madrid, her beauty only enhanced by the fresh charm of having seen the world. Her protector at this time was the richest merchant in Spain; in his magnificent palace she was the queen of a court where only men had the entrée, and where all men, ambassadors, financiers, and statesmen alike, contended for her smile as the highest decoration that could be conferred. So great was her power that Louis himself had reason to think he felt it in the offers which came to him of certain political posts that did not naturally fall to his department. Tormented, like other Government clerks, by the perpetual fear of losing his place, he was unable to refuse these offers, though he guessed well enough that they came from the hidden hand of Henrietta. Condemned to toil for bare bread, he had the shame of knowing in his secret soul that he owed his place, not to his merits, but to the beauty of his wife. All that he could find strength to do was to turn his back on her, if he chanced to meet her out walking, that her triumphant dishonour might not stare him in the face; yet, even as he fled, he was pursued by the look of surprise in her eyes—eyes that for a moment lost the bold assurance of the successful demi-mondaine.

One day he received an unexpected visit—from his wife's confessor, of all men in the world! This singular visitor proved to be a mild old priest, who came in timidly, and was evidently sly about his errand. It was he who now sat beside him in the cab. He was precisely the sort of confessor she would choose! So amiable, so considerate, so unassuming! The first time, when he let out who had sent him, Louis had angrily retorted, "Be damned to her insolence, and to yours, too, for coming here!" But, quite unperturbed, the worthy old man went on talking like a schoolboy anxious to say his lesson quick before he forgets it; and he discoursed piously to the indignant husband of Mary Magdalene, who had sinned, and of our Lord, who, sinner though she was, had pardoned her; and then, dropping the cleric and speaking in his ordinary tones, he told him of the change that had come over Henrietta. She had fallen ill, oh! dreadfully ill, of a most cruel disease that was eating her life away. It was cancer, and only by constant injections of morphia could she be saved from breaking down utterly and screaming in her paroxysms of agony. Her misery had turned her eyes to God. She repented for the past; she wished to see him. . . .

And on hearing this his coward heart leapt with joy, the weak man's joy at knowing himself avenged. Cancer! She was dying a living death; she, so proud of her beauty! Oh, what a sweet revenge! . . . No, he would not go to see her. It was no use for the priest to argue about that. . . . But he might come and see him when he liked, and give him the latest news about his wife's illness. That was a thing he had no objection to whatever. And his secret soul rejoiced in his cruelty.

After that the priest visited him almost every evening, smoked a cigarette or two and talked of Henrietta, and sometimes they went for a walk through the outskirts of Madrid just like a pair of old friends.

The disease made rapid progress. Henrietta knew that she was dying. She longed to see him and implore his pardon. She begged for him as a sick, spoilt child begs for a toy, until even the Other Man, her powerful protector, omnipotent to the world, yet docile to her, entreated the priest to bring Henrietta's husband to the house. And the worthy old confessor spoke with real enthusiasm of madame's touching conversion, even though he had to admit that she was still a slave to that accursed love of luxury, the perdition of so many souls.

Although kept a prisoner to her house by the disease, during her moments of respite, when the cruel pain did not keep her frantically tossing from side to side, she buried herself in fashion plates and catalogues from Paris, she wrote to her dressmakers, and seldom was there a week in which boxes did not arrive full of the latest novelties, dresses, hats, and jewellery, which she gloated over and played with for a day in her locked chamber, only to toss them like broken toys into a corner, or hide them away for ever in one of her innumerable wardrobes. The Other Man bore all these caprices, anything, everything, if only to make Henrietta smile.

Bit by bit these strange confidences brought Louis into close touch with his wife's existence. He followed, from a distance, the course of her disease, and there was no day that his mind was not full of the woman from whom he had separated himself for ever.

One evening the priest arrived in great anxiety. Madame was most surely at the point of death. She was crying out for her husband by name. It was nothing less than a crime to deny the last consolations to a dying woman, and he would not permit it, not if he had to drag Louis there by main force. And Louis, overmastered by the old man's will, let himself be dragged off and forced into a cab. He cursed himself for his weakness, yet he could not turn back. . . . A coward! always a coward!

The cab stopped in front of the Castellana House, one of the finest palaces in Madrid, and Louis followed close behind the priest's black cassock up the steps. How often had he flung a glance of hatred there as he passed by! Now he felt nothing, neither hatred nor pain; only a keen sense of curiosity, like the discoverer of a new country tasting by anticipation the marvels he expects to see.

Inside the house it was the same with him; nothing but curiosity and surprise. . . . Ah, wretch! How often in the dreams of his nerveless soul had he seen himself entering that house, like a stage husband, weapon in hand, to slay the faithless wife, and then, in a sort of wild beast fury, cut and slash the costly couches, the rich hangings, and the soft carpets. And now the softness that he felt under his feet, the beautiful colours that slid past his eyes, the flowers whose perfume greeted him from every corner, filled him with a sort of emasculate intoxication, and he felt an impulse to fling himself on those couches and take possession of them as if they were his, because they were his wife's. Now he comprehended the meaning of wealth, and the powerful grip it takes of its slaves.

Already they had reached the first floor, and so far there had been absolutely nothing to show that he was in the house of death. He saw servants, behind whose impassable masks he thought he detected an air of insolent curiosity. A waiting-maid gave him a bow and an enigmatical smile. Was it sympathy or only contempt for "the husband of madame"? Passing a room, he fancied he caught a glimpse of a well-dressed man hiding inside. No doubt that was the Other Man! Louis felt abashed before this new, grand world he had entered, and then his arm was taken by his guide, and he found himself gently pushed forward through a door. He was in madame's chamber, a darkened room, across which shone the broad ray of a single sunbeam, admitted through the crevice of a window shutter.

Right in the middle of the sunbeam's path stood a woman, erect, slender, rosy, in a lovely evening dress, her pearly shoulders rising out of a cloud of soft frills, her bosom and her hair ablaze with jewels.

Louis recoiled in horrified protest against the trap laid for him. Was that a dying woman? Had they brought him there to insult him?

"Louis . . . Louis . . ." cried a weak voice behind him, a tender, childish voice, which recalled from out of the past the sweetest moments of his life.

His eyes, growing accustomed to the half-light, discerned at the back of the room an object with steps up to it, monumental and imposing as a high altar. It was a bed, and in it lay a white figure, its curves dimly outlined under the coverings.

He looked again at the woman in the sunbeam, who stood, apparently awaiting him, slender and rigid, her eyes staring vaguely, as if through a mist of tears. It was but a mannequin, an artistic mannequin, modelled into a marvellous likeness of his wife. She had had it made so that she might be better able to judge of the new dresses which she was perpetually receiving from Paris. The lifeless doll was her puppet, to stand in her place in the private exhibitions of wealth and elegance that were the sole consolation of the rich woman's sufferings.

"Louis . . . Louis . . ." the little voice called again from the depths of the bed.

Sadly Louis went to her, to find himself caught in the embrace of arms which clasped him convulsively, and to feel an ardent mouth seeking for his mouth, imploring pardon, while his cheek received the hot caress of tears.

"Say you forgive me, Louis! Say so, and perhaps I sha'n't die!"

And the husband, whose instinct had been to repel her, ended by yielding himself to the embrace of those arms, and repeating unconsciously the pet names and phrases of their happy days. His eyes, growing more used to the darkness, gradually took in the details of his wife's face.

"Louis, my Louis," said she, smiling through her tears, "how do you think I'm looking? I'm not so pretty now as when we were happy together . . . before I'd quite gone out of my senses. Tell me, for God's sake, how do I look?"

Her husband gazed at her in dismay. Beautiful, beautiful always, with that infantile and simple charm, which made her so dangerous. Death was not there yet; only underneath the sweet perfume of that perfect body and that gorgeous bed some subtle, far-away effluvium seemed to insinuate itself, some taint of dead matter that told of internal decay and made itself felt in her very kisses.

Louis became conscious that there was someone behind him. A few feet away stood a man watching them with a hesitating look, as if drawn to the spot by an impulse too strong to be resisted, yet of which he must feel ashamed. Henrietta's husband recognised, as half Spain would have recognised, the austere face of a certain elderly gentleman, a statesman of sound, public principles, a great champion of moral order.

"Tell him to go away, Louis," cried the sick woman. "What's that man doing here? I only want you. I only want my husband. Forgive me . . . it was luxury, accursed luxury. I wanted money, lots of money . . . but for love, only you."

Henrietta wept as she showed her penitence, and he, the Other Man, wept too, helpless and humbled before her contempt.

Louis, who had so often thought of him with bursts of fury, and at first sight wanted to fly at his throat, now began to look at him with sympathy, and even respect. He loved her, too! And their common love, instead of making them enemies, brought the husband and the Other Man together in a strange bond.

"Tell him to go! Tell him to go!" repeated the sick woman with infantile obstinacy. And the husband looked at the great man apologetically, as if to

MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST OF NEW AND RECENT BOOKS

RUE AND ROSES. By ANGELA LANGER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A woman's remarkable analysis of her emotional life.

DAUBER. By JOHN MASEFIELD, Author of "The Everlasting Mercy." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

By A. FILON. Beautifully illustrated, 15s. net.

"Has enriched contemporary annals with a tender, grave, and profoundly human book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

SURVEY OF THE WOMAN PROBLEM. From the German of R. MAYREDER, by Hermann Scheffauer. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

"Pages packed with thought and thoroughness."—Cicely Hamilton in The Daily News.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA:

Son of Catharine the Great.

By K. WALISZEWSKI. 15s. net.

ARS UNA: SPECIES MILLE.

The History of Art throughout the Ages.

By leading European Experts. 600 Illustrations. 6s. net.

ART IN EGYPT. (Latest Volume.)

Vols. previously issued: FRANCE, GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND, N. ITALY. Ready shortly, SPAIN, FLANDERS.

The Loeb Classical Library.

Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and W. H. D. ROUSE. A Series of Greek and Latin Texts, with English Translations on the opposite page. 5s. net, cloth; 6s. net, leather.

5 NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

- | | |
|----------------------------------|--------------------------|
| (1) Apostolic Fathers II. | (2) Appian III. |
| (3) Julian I. | (4) Sophocles II. |
| (5) Quintus Smyrnaeus. | |

Please write for Prospectus giving full details of the Series and new vols. for 1913.

LATEST NOVELS, 6s.

GOSLINGS. J. D. BERESFORD.

THE AMBASSADRESS.

WILLIAM WRIOTHESLEY.

THE WEAKER VESSEL. E. F. BENSON.

THE LIFE MASK.

By the Author of "He Who Passed."

GROWING PAINS. IVY LOW.

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO?

(2nd Imp.) ELIZABETH ROBINS.

READY NEXT WEEK.

VIRGINIA. ELLEN GLASGOW.

ROMAIN ROLLAND'S GREAT WORK.

JOHN CHRISTOPHER. 6s. each Volume.

VOL. I., DAWN AND MORNING; VOL. II., STORM AND STRESS; VOL. III., JOHN CHRISTOPHER IN PARIS; VOL. IV., JOURNEY'S END.

"A book that has given to the world something definitely new in form, in spirit, and in ideal. . . . No one should miss the opportunity of reading it and keeping it to read again."—The Spectator.

NEXT WEEK.

URIAH THE HITTITE. 1s. net.

DOLFE WYLLARDE.

Heinemann's Shilling and Sevenpenny Novels are the best. Write for List.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

make excuse for his wife, who hardly knew what she was saying.

"Come, madame," said the voice of the priest from the end of the room. "Think of your soul and of God. Do not fall into the sin of pride."

The two men, the husband and the protector, ended by sitting down together at the bedside of the sick woman. The pain made her cry out; the anodyne was needed, and the two men anxiously hastened to procure her relief. Their hands met more than once while they were acting as Henrietta's nurses, and no instinctive repulsion drew them apart; instead, each helped the other with a brotherly readiness.

Louis found himself momentarily more in sympathy with this kindly man, so simple-mannered, in spite of his millions, who wept even more sincerely over his wife than he did himself. During the night, when the sick woman was resting under the influence of the morphia, the two men, overpoweringly influenced by their watch beside the sufferer, conversed in a low voice, without their words showing the least vestige of ancient rancour.

At daybreak Henrietta died, the words "Pardon! Pardon!" on her lips. But her last look was not given to her husband. She, the beautiful, brainless bird, took flight into eternity, her eyes caressing the mannequin of the eternal smile and the glassy stare, her dear idol standing upright there in the sunbeam's path and rearing its empty head, ablaze with brilliants, in the heavenly radiance of the dawn.

—Translated by R. B. Townshend.

LITERARY NOTES

A WARM welcome, I should say, awaits a volume of Disraeli's political writings which Mr. Murray is bringing out as a supplement to the authorised "Life," two volumes of which have been published. Disraeli in his earlier years plied a busy and withal pungent journalistic pen. Some of his more important articles appeared in the Times and the Morning Post, the authorship of which has hitherto remained a secret. These contributions will be included in the volume, together with the well-known "Runnymede Letters," the "Vindication of the English Constitution," and other matter of literary and historical interest. Possibly the volume may not show us Disraeli in any fresh light, but, inasmuch as it contains writings of his which have not come under the eye of the present generation, it can hardly be without biographic value.

If we are not conversant with every detail of the Panama Canal and its potential value long before it opens, it won't be the fault of the journalists who have been "writing it up" for a considerable time. Recently I noted the fact that the literature on the subject is growing fast. Two volumes have appeared during the past few weeks, and now I am notified of a third. The writer is Miss Winifred James, who is well known by her "Letters to My Son." Miss James has just returned from a long voyage to the West Indies and Panama, where, among many interesting sights, she saw the canal in the making. The volume, which bears the somewhat vague title of "The Mulberry Tree," is to be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

When Livingstone returned from Africa in 1864, in order chiefly to write his book, "The Zambesi and its Tributaries," he was invited by Mr. W. F. Webb, who had accompanied him on one of his journeys, to reside at Newstead Abbey. The invitation was accepted, and in that "splendid old mansion," with its memories of Byron, the explorer spent some of the happiest days of his life. His associations with the place are recalled in a book which one of Mr. Webb's daughters is publishing, under the title of "Livingstone and Newstead." One of the rooms in the Sussex tower of Newstead is called the "Livingstone Room."

In "The Old Road," Mr. Hilaire Belloc proved his power of investing topographical description with at once the charm of historical association and the human interest of its present-day aspect. His latest volume, which Messrs. Constable are publishing, is on similar lines. "The Stane Street," as it is appropriately called, traces the old road from London Bridge to Chichester in its progress through some of the most beautiful bits of country in England. The volume is to have illustrations in black and white by Mr. William Hyde.

The late Sir Hugh Macdonell had so long and varied a diplomatic career that I shall be surprised if the volume of reminiscences which his widow is bringing out does not prove both entertaining and instructive. Sir Hugh was British Minister to Brazil, Denmark, and Portugal, and he held secretaryships at Rome, Berlin, Madrid, Munich, and Buenos Ayres. Moreover, he came into contact with many famous men and women, and saw much of the life of the South American republics fifty years ago. Lady Macdonell's book will be entitled "Reminiscences of Diplomatic Life."

Messrs. Constable announce a volume of essays entitled "Sidelights," from the pen of Lady Blennerhassett, the widow of the well-known political writer. The contents consist of a series of historical vignettes and character studies, which are said to exhibit Lady Blennerhassett as at once a well-informed and capable descriptive writer. The same firm is publishing an account of the Mexican Revolution of 1910, from the pen of an eye-witness—Mr. Hugh B. C. Pollard.

To my mind the popularisation of the theological literature is one of the problems of the publishing world. I am glad, therefore, to note that Messrs. Macmillan are about to wrestle with it, and shall await with interest the result. The firm has in preparation a "Shilling Theological Library," which is intended to bring within the reach of everyone a number of works by well-known authors not readily accessible in their present form. A few books will be included that have already been reissued in shilling form, such as Dean Farrar's "Eternal Hope," but to these will be added other volumes by such writers of a past generation as Charles Kingsley ("Village Sermons," etc.), Dean Church, Bishop Westcott, Dr. Hort, and Phillips Brooks. These are all writers, or, rather, preachers, that count, and if their works do not appeal to the shilling public, certainly no others will.

Mr. Werner Laurie will have ready next month "The Correspondence of Goldwin Smith," selected and edited by his literary executor and secretary, Mr. Arnold Haultain, who has added a bibliography of Goldwin Smith's various writings. The correspondence includes letters from Lord Rosebery, Mr. Chamberlain, Gladstone, Bright, the late Lord Salisbury, and many other celebrities.

X. Y. Z.

The Best of the World's Books

SEND A POSTCARD
(mentioning "Everyman") for any of the following:—
200-PAGE CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, English and Foreign,
in all classes of Literature at GREAT
REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

SELECTED AND CLASSIFIED LIST (144 pp.) OF

THE BEST BOOKS

On all subjects, at the Lowest Cash Prices;
forming a complete Guide to the best English Literature.

A LIST OF SEASONABLE BOOKS ON

The Garden and The Countryside

MANY OF WHICH ARE OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
All the Newest and Most Important Books are included.

A New List of Six-Shilling NOVELS

By the Best Writers,
From 1/- each.

A List of Charming COLOUR BOOKS offered at less than half-price.

Catalogue of Newly-published Books.
Catalogue of Books in Beautiful Bindings, suitable for presentation.
Catalogues of Books in leading Foreign languages.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

FRANCIS THOMPSON

The COLLECTED WORKS of Francis Thompson will be published this month: the Poetry in two volumes, the prose in one. Demy 8vo, printed at the Arden Press, on rag paper, special buckram, bevelled boards, gilt, with portraits in photogravure, 6s. net each (sold separately). A handsome PROSPECTUS, printed in red and black, with specimen pages and reproductions of three fine Portraits of the Poet (two of them unpublished), will be sent post free on request.

N.B.—The first two volumes will include a large number of poems of the first importance, here for the first time printed or gathered together. The prose is almost entirely new to book-form.

THE POETRY OF ALICE MEYNELL

Mrs. Meynell's COLLECTED POEMS in one volume, with a Portrait by John S. Sargent, R.A., will be published on May 12th. This will contain, besides "Poems" (which have passed through ten editions) and "Later Poems" (now also out of print), an important section of new work. A few copies of the first impression are still unsubscribed. Buckram gilt, 5s. net.

BURNS & OATES, ORCHARD STREET, LONDON, W.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

TWO IMPORTANT ARTICLES IN THE CURRENT CATHOLIC REVIEW

ARE:
FAILURE OF RELIGION IN ENGLAND. THE EDITOR.
PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION. CARDINAL MERCIER.
SIXPENCE NET.

On Sale at all Railway Bookstalls and W. H. Smith & Son's Depots.

A NEW CONVERSATION BOOK FOR 1913. "TIME IS MONEY."

MOTORISTS! TOURISTS! Busy people in general, whose time is money, should not visit France or Italy without immediately procuring a copy of Augusta Ayliffe's Languages for Busy People.
3/6 net. "TIME IS MONEY." 3/6 net.

In French, English, Italian (side by side).
(N.B.—The Italian translation is by Professor Emma Davio, Rome.)
"A practical guide for foreigners without any ridiculous sentences."

—New York Herald, Paris.
"A little book calculated to prove very useful to the English traveller in France and Italy, and vice-versa to natives of these Latin countries in England."

—Daily Mail, Paris.
"Time Is Money" is exceptionally well adapted for the traveller, and for use as a conversational book for students of French, English, or Italian. A most useful section is the pages devoted to the translation of the menu of one of the popular Restaurants Duval in Paris.

Of all Booksellers in France, Italy, Eng'land, or direct by post from the Author and Publisher: Augusta Ayliffe, 53 rue d'Amsterdam, Paris; or Augusta Ayliffe, Dursley, Glos. England, for 3/6.

NOW READY

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF
THOMAS HOLMES' SUCCESSFUL WORK

LONDON'S UNDERWORLD

Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"It is good that rare men like Mr. Holmes exist, for there are not many of us who could spend a long lifetime amongst the human wrecks of the underworld and still retain any confidence or hope in human nature. This is a book that will make people think, and, in a way, it ought to make us hopeful."

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS'.

A LAY SERMON ON THE ART OF READING

AND HOW TO DISTINGUISH A GOOD NOVEL FROM A BAD ONE

(Concluded.)

C.—THE STUDY OF STYLE.

After the subject and the plot you will have to examine the qualities and defects of the style. I am quite aware that of all the elements of the literary art, style is by far the most subtle and the most elusive. Indeed, the more perfect the style, the more elusive it is likely to be. As in the case of those incomparable masters of the written word, Charles Lamb and Robert Louis Stevenson, the fascination of the style may be inseparably bound up with the personality of the writer.

(a) At the same time, it is always advisable, and even necessary, to take a systematic survey of the general characteristics of the style of any particular novel. That style may be clear or it may be obscure, it may be terse or it may be prosy and overlaid with detail, it may be rythmical or it may be unmusical, it may be vivid and metaphorical or it may be abstract. Its vocabulary may be simple, drawing mainly on the well of English undefiled, or its vocabulary may be erudite, drawing mainly on words of Latin and French origin.

(b) But after studying those general characteristics of style which are common to all literary work, we shall, above all, have to ask ourselves for each particular novel, whether the style is appropriate to the special subject or to the characters of the book. Some writers make all their characters speak in the same uniform or monotonous way. Mr. Bernard Shaw makes even his dull people burst out in brilliant epigram. Other writers, like Jane Austen, make even their rustics use "elegant" phraseology. But the really great artists—George Eliot, Balzac, Tolstoy—who have the sense of life and the sense of reality, will choose the accent, the vocabulary, the mannerisms, even the dialect best adapted to the individuality of each character; whether we take Mrs. Tulliver in the "Mill on the Floss," or Mme. Cibot in "Cousin Pons," or Countess Rostoff in "War and Peace," it is impossible to mistake the peculiarities of their language.

D.—THE STUDY OF THE CHARACTERS.

Last, not least, we have minutely to analyse the chief characters of the novel.

(a) The characters may be either unreal, lay figures, of which the author merely pulls the wires, mere mouthpieces expressing the opinions of the writer, as in many didactic novels written with a purpose. Or the characters will be true to life, veritable creations of art, each stamped with a complex individuality of its own.

(b) Again, characters may be interesting, arresting; they may have a strong and original personality, as almost every character of Tolstoy or Balzac or Thackeray. Or the characters may be commonplace and superficial, as many of the types of Jane Austen, and not a few of the female characters of Sir Walter Scott.

(c) Again, characters may be unchanging and stereotyped from beginning to end. They may learn nothing from the successes or failures of life. Or they may develop and grow; they may gradually be formed and transformed by experience. Thus we see "Cousin Pons" slowly disillusioned by the wickedness and selfishness of his mean and sordid surroundings. Thus we see Natasha, in "War and Peace," transformed by suffering into an entirely different woman from the impulsive and light-hearted girl at the beginning.

Thus we see even the wildly idealistic Don Quixote imperceptibly influenced by the practical common sense of Sancho Panza.

(d) And, finally, the characters may all go their own separate ways; they may move independently of each other. Or one character may continuously act and react on the other. The art of the novel writer largely consists in so bringing his characters together that their mutual relations and conflicts shall reveal their personality, and so to arrange his plot that circumstances and events will bring out those vices and virtues which the artist intends to stamp on our imagination.

II.

To sum up my argument, and to present the subject more vividly and more concretely to the reader, I would like to state in tabular form some of the most important points which have to come up for consideration in any systematic study of the novel:—

1.—Study of the Subject.

- (a) Is the subject trivial and commonplace, or is it vital and universal?
- (b) Is the subject of transient or is it of permanent importance?
- (c) Is the author sympathetic or unsympathetic to his subject?

2.—Study of the Plot or Story.

- (a) Is the interest concentrated on one plot, or is it distracted by a duality or multiplicity of plots?
- (b) Is the plot natural or artificial and far-fetched?
- (c) Is the plot skilfully or clumsily constructed?
- (d) Is the purpose aimless and purposeless, or is it so constructed as to reveal the characters of the novel?

3.—Style.

- (a) Is the style clear or obscure, simple or involved, vivid or abstract, terse or prolix?
- (b) Is the style or dialogue appropriate both to the subject and to the characters?

4.—Study of Character.

- (a) Are the characters mere lay figures and literary automata, or are the characters true to life?
- (b) Are the characters commonplace and uninteresting, or have they a marked personality?
- (c) Are the characters invariable all through the novel, or do they grow and develop with the unfolding of the plot?
- (d) Do the characters move independently the one of the other, or is there mutual action and reaction?

III.

We have briefly outlined some of the essential points which have to be analysed before we can even attempt to formulate a competent judgment on the literary value of a novel. The method which I have defined may sound, at first sight, mechanical and scholastic. It may seem a hopelessly inadequate means of getting at the inner meaning of a literary masterpiece. And it is true, no doubt, that even the best method is necessarily a very imperfect instrument, and that the value of the instrument must largely depend on the brain which uses it. I can only say that, having tried some such definite method for many years in the teaching of thousands of young men and women, I have invariably derived the most practical and the most excellent results. Again and again my pupils have admitted to me that it was this systematic analysis of literary masterpieces, on the lines described, which first trained their critical faculty, which first opened their eyes to the beauties and imperfections of literary masterpieces.

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers" scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

- | | |
|---|--|
| Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech"; ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech"; J. L. GRIFFITHS (U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking"; | A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S. (President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing"; ALBERT CREW (Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings"; GENERAL EDITOR, A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law) |
|---|--|

But "The Book of Public Speaking" is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World's Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

- | | | |
|---|---|---|
| Lord Rosebery Lord Beaconsfield H. H. Asquith A. J. Balfour W. E. Gladstone Sir Edward Clarke Andrew Lang D. Lloyd George Winston Churchill Mark Twain Spencer Leigh Hughes Sir Henry Irving | Joseph Chamberlain Max O'Rell R. Waldo Emerson Harold Cox Woodrow Wilson G. Bernard Shaw Charles Dickens John Bright Chauncey Depew Sir A. Conan Doyle Sir Edward Grey Earl Halsbury | Lord Fisher Abraham Lincoln Justin McCarthy Viscount Milner M. Poincaré Whitelaw Reid Theodore Roosevelt Philip Snowden Ian Maclaren Augustine Birrell Sir A. W. Pinero Etc., etc. |
|---|---|---|

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

FREE BOOKLET.

The Publishers have prepared an interesting Illustrated Booklet—which they will send free—describing the work and their offer to deliver the complete work as published for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

To the CANTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge and without any obligation on my part, full particulars of "The Book of Public Speaking."

Name.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address.....
.....

Swift Sure

Hints to those who like to look smartly dressed.

Dirt and signs of wear make any suit—however expensive—appear dowdy and old.

You start collecting these "signs" from the first day you use a suit. The process is gradual, so that you may not notice it—your friends do, though.

If you would have the maximum service from your suit, you should send it to Achille Serre, who specializes in the treatment of Men's Clothes and make old suits look new, and new suits keep new.

3/9 is our fixed charge.

Write for Illustrated Booklet and address of nearest Branch or Agent, who will collect and deliver free. Carriage paid one way on all orders sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

39

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY
AND

INEX-PENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR MEALS IN BED.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

PAGANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mrs. J. Stark, is surely claiming too much for Greece and leaving quite out of account some unpleasant realities in the picture of old-world pagan life. Her enthusiasm for her idealised Hellenic world betrays her into strange exaggerations, as, for instance, such a statement as that "the Greeks were as far above us intellectually as we are above the negroes."

"The most important function of the State," she tells us, "was to see that each citizen had an opportunity of developing his capacities to the utmost." She does not say "each man and woman," and she omits to remind us—perhaps she has herself not realised—that the citizens were a small class, whose leisure and opportunities for culture and enjoyment depended on the existence of a large slave population. In the great days of the Athenian State there were probably three slaves to every free citizen. There was a flourishing slave trade throughout the Hellenic East. All the fine talk of freedom had no application to these "hewers of wood and drawers of water," and the greatest of Greek philosophers argued that certain men were made by nature to be slaves, others to be free.

It is surely misleading to dwell on the undoubted excellences of the Greek and leave out of account the other elements in Greek pagan life that were factors in the destiny of the race. Your correspondent's letter is a protest against the assertion that the Greek was prone to sensuous enjoyment. But this is the plain fact. The privileged class of slave-owning citizens, with their ample leisure and keen sense of physical beauty, and no ideals such as tend to safeguard Christian peoples, accepted sensuality as a part of normal human life, despite the protests of some of their philosophers. Monogamy existed, it is true, but there was a wide licence even for the married citizen, and, while the wife was uneducated, the hetaira had often a smattering of literary culture as part of her equipment. Vice of a more odious kind, such as we do not even name, was rife among the men. It is attributed to some of those whose names were remembered in connection with heroic deeds, and this without any idea that it was a stain on their characters. As Lecky says in his "History of European Morals," there were practices among pagans that centuries of Christendom have made us regard as all but impossible horrors. We know from what remains of Greek comedy, and from the representations of comic actors on the vases, what brutal unveiled foulness was characteristic of this department of the theatre.

And we know from the story of the downfall of Greece how soon true patriotism, citizenship, and manliness departed from the Greek race; how the cities no longer sent out their citizens to war, but trusted their defence to slaves and mercenaries; how easily politicians were bribed, and how the name of the rhetor became a byword of reproach.

The Greek has been a contributor to the sum of European civilisation. No one denies this. But it was from Palestine and from Nazareth that the best and highest teaching came to us. It was not from the Greek that the world learned the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men. It was not from the Greek that we derived the idea of a freedom that is the birthright of every class and every individual. It was not from the Greek we learned our Christian code of honour to womanhood. War is still a blot on our civilisation, but even here the Christian ideal has changed the whole aspect of the conflict between nations. For the Greek victor the defeated side had no rights. Reckless and vengeful slaughters were the sequel of victory. Prisoners might be massacred or enslaved for life. Women were valuable booty. Under Christian influence even war has lost its worst horrors, and the Red Cross flag, flying in token of the duty of all to respect and succour the victims of the strife, whether friend or foe, is the symbol of one more of the triumphs of Christianity.—I am, sir, etc.,

London.

A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Bland, in his article, seems to find the cause of brain development wholly in the stress of life common to all biological species, to bee as to man.

Is that quite assured? Did we seek cause for the marked individual development in such valid instances as, say, those of Burns, Goethe, and Shakespeare, it would seem certain we should have to recognise a factor of an entirely opposite character, hedonic, in fact. Even in so unpromising an instance as the case of Carlyle there lies, in that singular episode of "Teufelsdröckh made immortal by a kiss" (in the "Two-good-and-Blumine business"), more than a suspicion of hedonic juice about that sudden bite at half-ripe fruit.

If "struggle," indeed, be a factor—and I do not presume to gainsay that—may it not be necessarily in an equation with "joy," strong interaction between pain and pleasure being an indispensable dual condition?

The bee matriarchy, with its incessant labour and lethal proclivities, has developed instinct to a marvellous perfection approximating human intelligence, but it has not developed a brain of cerebral or other distinction. This is the more notable since in its sexual economy it appears in all respects the opposite of mankind—in which the male has subjugated the female peculiarly and, perhaps, more completely than in any other species. In this present question, as well as in others current to-day, one thing most urgently needed is sane authentic statement of the first principles of sexual economy in the case of homo sapiens.—I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN C. NORWOOD.

Glasgow.

AUSTRALIA.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I encroach on your valuable space to point out two errors made by Mr. Hermann in his interesting article on Australia, published in your issue of April 18th?

In talking of the various State capitals, he says: "Fremantle is a derelict city, the stream of life having deflected to Perth, which is the real capital of Western Australia. . . ."

Apparently he is ignorant of the fact that, firstly, Perth has been the capital of Western Australia ever since the foundation of the colony, and, secondly, that Fremantle, so far from being "derelict," has a population of some 25,000 souls, and is one of the busiest ports in the Commonwealth.—I am, sir, etc.,

London.

MERVYN DAVIES.

HOW PHOTOGRAPHY CAN BE MADE TO PAY

By T. G. Rutherford.

THIS is the age of pictures, and photography is playing by far the biggest part in the production of those pictures. Slowly but surely the picture paper is growing. The sales of papers like the Daily Sketch and the Daily Mirror have grown to huge proportions. Staid, old-established journals like the Daily Telegraph now publish photographs where, a few years back, nothing but reading matter appeared. In Fleet Street there is talk of a new all-picture Sunday paper being launched. The big weeklies, like the Sphere, the Graphic, the Sketch, Country Life, the Taller, Bystander, and others, are crammed full of photographic pictures. The Illustrated London News gave away a facsimile of its first issue the other day. That issue consisted almost entirely of type matter, peppered over so sparingly with little wood-block pictures. The current issue of the Illustrated London News contains a few bare inches of type matter, and all the rest is made up of pictures—mostly photographs.

Only this week one of the most celebrated music-hall managers said that the present-day music-hall was being killed by the cinematograph pictures. Picture palaces are cropping up in every street, and are filled to overflowing.

But the supply falls a long way short of the demand. True, there are plenty of photographs to be had, but not nearly enough of the right kind. If you could see an Art Editor at work you would soon know why so many pictures are unsuitable. One after another they come, dull, uninteresting, hackneyed, until the Editorial eye lights upon a print that has obvious news interest. Instantly it is seized upon and rushed off to the block makers, and the lucky producer sees his picture in print, and, moreover, gets well paid for it.

Any man, or any woman, with a camera can make money provided they will only take the trouble to get the right sort of prints. There is only one way open to acquire this knowledge, and that is by training and working under the direction of men who know, by their daily work, what subjects are wanted and why they possess value.

The amateur photographer can only obtain this knowledge through the Press Photography Course of the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C. This course has been prepared by a man who really understands the work, and has made a notable success with his pictures. It is conducted by experts in photographic work who are in touch with the illustrated press and know intimately the ever-changing requirements. Students receive long personal letters on their work, criticisms of their prints, and assistance that cannot be obtained through any other channel. They are shown how to make their pictures profitable, what kind of subjects to take, how to take them, and why they should be taken.

The lessons are chock full of hints, instruction, and reasons why things should be done. Information of this sort cannot be published in book form for obvious reasons, and even if it were, the average amateur could not apply it unless he was constantly in touch with the instructor.

The P.C.C. has been established so long, and has been so successful with its students, that it does not care to enrol anyone who has no chance of making money by the course. It asks, therefore, that prospective students should send half a dozen of their average photographs to the College, so that an estimate can be formed of the capabilities of the would-be student.

These prints are criticised and returned directly, and an illustrated book, telling all about the course, is forwarded at the same time. The fees are low, but it must be distinctly understood that the college will not enrol any student unless the Directors consider that his work is up to the standard required.

WONDERFUL NEW MEDICINE SUPPLIED TO ROYALTY.

Quickly Renews Vigour and Vitality, and Restores Health and Strength.

Thousands of readers will be glad to learn of a wonderful new medical discovery which quickly renews vigour and vitality, overcomes the weakness of old age, and restores the full powers of superb manhood and glorious womanhood.

This new remedy (called Osogen) is composed of Sequard serum and the Glycero-phosphates so often prescribed by Sir William Broadbent, K.C.V.O., M.D., F.R.S., Physician to His late Majesty King Edward VII. It is supplied to Royalty, and thousands of medical men recognise its wonderful curative and vigour-giving power in cases of

| | |
|--------------------|-------------------------|
| Lost Vitality | Want of Self-Confidence |
| Premature Old Age | Lassitude |
| General Debility | Weak Memory |
| "Run Down" Feeling | Neurasthenia |
| Loss of Will Power | Anaemia |
| Kidney Disorders | |

Osogen is of marvellous value to the aged, or the prematurely aged and weak from overwork or illness. Those easily fatigued can undergo the most strenuous exertion with ease if a small quantity is taken before commencing work. When tired or worn out, a few drops quickly cause a return of energy and revival of spirits.

A correspondent from Gainsborough writes:

"Osogen is marvellous. After using only a little more than one bottle I already feel 10 years younger. My sleep is sound and dreamless, and I am stronger in every way."

DON'T STAY WEAK!

There is no need for any man or woman to stay weak. Osogen will give you strength and vigour, a flawless digestive system, rich blood, and a reserve fund of vitality sufficient to meet all demands.

By the laws of nature you should be strong, active, and healthy until you are eighty. If you are weak, nervous, and debilitated let Osogen give you a new nerve and vital power. Obtain a bottle or more by using the coupon below. Take a few drops daily and watch results.

Quickly you will feel its effect. A sensation of strength will take the place of that "tired feeling." Depression will vanish and self-confidence will be restored. You will again possess the health and powers that mark a manly man or fascinating woman.

SPECIAL DISTRIBUTION OF "OSOGEN."

Because hundreds of inquiries are still coming to hand, it has been decided to allot a further limited supply of Osogen for distribution. 5,000 bottles (2s. 9d. size) have been set aside, and any reader who has not yet tested Osogen is entitled to one of these bottles.

You can obtain one of these 2s. 9d. size bottles of Osogen by posting the coupon below with a 1s. 3d. P.O. to the Osogen Co.

The bottle is not a mere trial size, but a full seven days' treatment the price of which is 2s. 9d.

To avoid a break in the treatment foreign and colonial readers are advised to send 12s. 6d., when a full 11s. size, in addition to the 2s. 9d. size offered, will be sent.

To obtain the first 2s. 9d. size bottle of Osogen by return write your name and address on the coupon below, and post with 1s. 3d. P.O. to 40, The Osogen Laboratories, 88, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

"OSOGEN" SPECIAL COUPON.

To 40, THE OSOGEN LABORATORIES,
88, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

I have never used "Osogen." Please send me a full 2s. 9d. size bottle and descriptive literature. I enclose 1s. 3d.

Name.....

Address.....

N.B.—Only one bottle to each family at the 1s. 3d. price. Further supplies post free 2s. 9d. per bottle, or 5 times 2s. 9d. size, 11s.

EVERYMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Will you allow me to suggest a small correction for Mr. E. Hermann's able article on Australia? Artesian water subsists only under land which is not likely to become arable for many years, and, consequently, the person who "pins his faith" to artesian water bores is not the agriculturist, but the pastoralist or "squatter"; in the immediate future the former is more likely to be benefited by dry-farming, which depends on the conservation of rain-water in the soil, and by irrigation from the storage of river-water. It is questionable whether artesian water will ever have an effect on agriculture at all proportional to its importance to the pastoralist.

This said, I should like to congratulate your contributor on the penetration displayed in his judgments and the felicity of his phrasing. As regards the life and character of Sydney, he has contrived to say le mot juste in a way that has never before found expression. A man hailing from that city, who is an intimate friend of mine—one notices that this is a formula often used in the public Press to avoid an appearance of egotism—was so moved by Mr. Hermann's words that he cross-examined his fellow-lodgers in a certain house to see if their conception of himself in particular afforded corroborative evidence of the statements made in general by Mr. Hermann. The verdicts on the various counts were as follows:—"Relaxed and seductive grace"—exemplified; "hedonistic tendency" and "artistic instincts"—both strongly exemplified; "scant capacity for moral indignation"—exemplified; "fundamentally British, yet strangely un-British" but "more unlike any southern type than it is unlike the British"—these characteristics were allowed, as was also the "fierce independence," coupled with a tendency to "leaning" against walls, Governments, or even other people on occasion. The "subject" under investigation, privately and severally informed certain members of his jury that these latter traits, in his opinion, were not unknown in England, more noticeably among the female sex. However, as to the portents of disaster inherent, according to Mr. Hermann, in all these categories, he maintained that indulgence in alarm is pure waste of emotion. The Australian, though tolerant, has never given sign of weakness of will or moral fibre, and however languorous in attitude he may seem it is only "in loco," for in reality he is constantly doing or enduring with the best. He has as keen a sense of what matters as any one alive, and if that involves strenuousness, or grit, or the breaking of records in club-swinging, like Mr. T. Burrows, he will generally deliver the goods.—Yours, etc., E. R. GARNSEY.

Authors' Club.

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was much interested in the letters of my friend, Mr. Finch, and of Mr. Nicholson, which appeared in your last issue under the heading of "Enterprise in Business." Mr. Finch asks you for a clear presentation of the objections to the Socialist solution of the social question, stating that this would be useful to those who are interested in the subject. Now the matter appeals to me in an altogether different light. Those of us who have studied the question to any extent at all, and are following contemporary events throughout the world, whether we be Socialists or not, know full well that some form of collectivism is in the end inevitable. The tendency to association, as opposed to competition, is everywhere apparent, and thus it seems to me that, instead of seeking for the objections to Socialism, we might rather assist in its proper and most desirable development. We should thus be doing more useful service than in seeking to pick out the objections to what must at some future time come, whether we desire it or not, because evolution will have its course, despite what a few individuals might themselves desire; and mutual aid, in other words the ideal of Socialism, is the great factor in evolution, as eminent students have shown us.

The majority of anti-Socialists are, I believe, willing to admit that the ideal of Socialism is desirable of attainment, but hold that economically it is impracticable and unworkable. But I prefer to believe with Mr. Philip Snowden when he uttered the now memorable words, "What is morally right cannot be economically wrong." When more people see this the Socialist State will not be very far distant.—I am, sir, etc.,

GEORGE A. GREENWOOD.

Batley Carr, Batley.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As an ordinary working man, unversed in many of the arguments used by your contributors to this discussion, may I state some aspects of the case as they appeal to me? "Enterprise in Business" may mean much, but it surely means a continuation of the present capitalist system, which, by a simple test, has failed, in my opinion. The failure is illustrated by the wreckage and waste of human life which is so evident in the midst of civilisation to-day, especially in Christian countries. "Enterprise in Business" means business with a big B. The big B in business, all through the history of commercial development in civilised countries, has usually meant the profits for the few, the strong triumphant over the weak, the oppression of the poor by the rich, and the negation of all efforts towards international brotherhood. Socialism alone, to my perhaps limited outlook, appears the only system whereby it is claimed that security to every man for the means of livelihood is assured in a civilised community.

It would be better for all society, as now constituted, to come to an end if its weaker members are to continue to linger out the wretched existence to which so many millions are condemned.

The capitalist system, with its "Enterprise in Business," appears to be oblivious of the fate of these millions, and its upholders display a like apathy in regard to their condition, except in so far as their actions jeopardise the profits of "enterprise."

"Enterprise in Business" means more wretchedness for these submerged members of society. Socialism offers the only hope of solving the problem presented by this vast mass of suffering humanity. Your contributor, Margaret Hamilton, shows to what a depth "Enterprise in Business" can descend. I presume the "sweaters" she mentions in this week's article would be, and are, called enterprising captains of industry when they have "made their pile" and are received in some sections of Christian (?) society. Is a system that allows such atrocities to be perpetrated in its name worthy of further defence?—I am, sir, etc.,

Shirley, near Birmingham.

A. STOKES.

THE USE OF BOOKS TO WORKING MEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I take the liberty of writing a few words in connection with Mr. J. R. Clynes's article, "The Use of Books to Working Men"? On seeing this title I expected to find a sympathetic and reasonable study of this branch of the poor man's life; on the contrary,

Between 10% and 12%
per annum.

AN IDEAL INVESTMENT FOR MAN OR WOMAN.

AN EXAMPLE:

A man aged 65 can purchase a Canada Life Annuity, yielding £113 10s. 1d. for £1,000, and he can rest perfectly secure in the knowledge that, however many years he may live, this income will be paid in full, year by year, as the appointed day comes round.

A woman aged 65 can obtain for the same sum an annual income of £100 10s. 0d., under precisely similar conditions. If she attains the age of 79, she will have received in actual hard cash no less a sum than £1,407.

The vast funds of the Canada Life Assurance are under the direct supervision of the Canadian Government. The safety of the Canada Life Annuity is further secured on the whole of the Company's assets, amounting to £10,000,000.

Any sum from £100 upwards may be invested.

Send for Special Annuity Booklet, stating your age, to

Canada Life Assurance Company

CANADA LIFE BUILDING,

15, King St., Cheapside, London, E.C.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW
Edited by AUSTIN HARRISON
MAY, 1913

| | |
|---|-------------------|
| Ten Sonnets | G. Bernard Shaw |
| Oscrudled (A Dramatic Study) | Henri Fabre |
| The Pond | Walter Raleigh |
| Boccaccio | John Westroppe |
| The Red Grave | Norman Douglas |
| Blind Guides | H. M. Tomlinson |
| The Grocer's Boy | Una Birch |
| The Flag of Ramillies | William Stebbing |
| Mr. Newton-Robinson's Poems | Ajax |
| Synthetic Man | Herbert Cescinsky |
| The Gentle Art of Faking Furniture (II) | Herbert Cescinsky |
| The Month | S. O. |
| Play of the Month: "The Yellow Jacket" | S. O. |
| Books of the Month | |

LONDON,
17-21, TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN
MONTHLY 1/- NET
ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: 12/6 POST FREE

FOSTER

GARTER

FOR GENTLEMEN.

A KNIGHT OF GARTERS.

Fits the leg perfectly; all metal parts being protected, it cannot injure the skin.

COMFORTABLE, because it lies quite flat.

RELIABLE, because it is made of the best material.

To be obtained from all principal dealers, or we will send sample pair post free on receipt of 1/-

THE FOSTER MANFG. CO., LTD.,
90, Foster Road, Parkesdon, Essex.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEFKCHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Proxoe, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

Every owner, or prospective owner of a gramophone, should read

HINTS ABOUT THE GRAMOPHONE

Considered as a Musical Instrument.

Cr. 8vo. 68 pp. PRICE 1/6 POST FREE.

ROWELL and SONS, 62-68, Rosebery Avenue, London, E.C. (Mention this paper.)

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

ROSENBLUM'S ANGLO-FRENCH JOURNAL, 1d. monthly, or 1/4d. post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. Subscription 1/6 per annum. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French." £1 ls. prize offered in April issue for best essay on languages.

"MEMORY WITHOUT MNEMONICS" teaches a new method of evoking subconscious forces for the deepening of mental powers and secret of mental work without feeling tired. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Ilarrogate.

PRIVATE SOCIAL TOURS (gentlemen and gentlewomen). May 23rd.—Austria, including Vienna, Budapest, The Carpathians, Danube, etc. Later.—Holland, Tyrol, Grand Russian Tour, Swiss Holiday, Spain, etc., etc.—Miss BISHOP, "Haslemere," 363, Wimbledon Park Road, S.W.

THE MANUSCRIPT CLUB provides for the criticism of MSS. It has proved its value to many past and present members. An article by one of its late members appeared in "Everyman" in a recent issue. It is not a commercial undertaking, the subscription being a nominal one. There are, at present, vacancies in the membership, and those interested in what Lord Morley has called "the noble and difficult art of writing" are invited to join. Prospectus and particulars will be gladly forwarded on application to G. J. PEACH, 6, Maze Road, Kew, Surrey.

TO PLAY-WRITERS.—Manuscript Plays wanted for publication in book form. No fees. Send MS. to Publisher, 34, Malden Lane, Strand, W.C.

A MILLIONAIRE you may never be, but you can be what is BETTER THAN BEING A MILLIONAIRE if you will. What matters most to everyman is not what he has, but what he is. See "GLAD TIDINGS!" (A guide to the true life.) By Radnor H. Hodgson. CONTENTS.—"To You"; "What is Man?"; "The Divine in Man"; "The Carnal Man"; "Selfishness and Altruism"; "Individuality"; "Self-Culture"; "Truth and Wisdom"; "The Great Illusion"; "The Great Purpose"; "Social Reform"; "Now and After." Price 1/- net, HEADLEY BROS. By post, 1/1s, from RADNOR H. HODGSON, SOUTH VIEW, BILDON, YORKS.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper

I found an exposition which, for inconsistency, for prejudice, and utter blindness of judgment, would be hard to exceed.

Does Mr. Clynes really think that for the working man, when "really tired of work, to sit and secure the delights of a 'Path to Rome,'" would solace that man for his hours of sweated slavery, his blood-pittance of, perhaps, 12s. a week on which to keep a wife and dozen little ones? If this is the remedy for treating the great question of "the eternal poor," then by all means let us encourage the distribution of free libraries in England's worst districts, where the working man may obtain Shakespeare or Balzac to while away his leisure hours.

"To elevate, educate," by all means; but the intellectual powers lie low when the body is half-clad and half-starved. Feed and clothe the body; then the natural improving and elevating of the mind will follow.

I notice that Mr. Clynes points out the one danger of his proposal, in that labour unrest would be increased; but this, according to him, we must not allow. The animal must keep to his servile state, though he become a perfect Cicero of knowledge.

I would recommend Mr. Clynes to read the opposing article on the following page, "The Sweated Worker"—read of women stitching buttonholes at 6d. a gross, and making suits and coats for 2d. or 4d. each.

That the possibility of, and even desire for, culture amongst the working classes is great I do not deny. I have seen a labourer reading "Pickwick Papers" in a tramcar with as much zest as might Mr. J. R. Clynes himself; but let the social betterment of the poor come first, and the helping hand held out to "feed, clothe, and love."—I am, sir, etc.,

D. M. T.

Finsbury Park.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is amazing that Mr. Clynes should commence an article which expounds such a valuable thesis with a suggestion that shows him to ignore one of the first principles of education, viz., that if any subject is to be studied to real and lasting benefit, then the student must have a real affection for that subject. Mr. Clynes would like to see Parliament pass a law compelling all working men to read "Shakespeare, Shaw, Balzac, and Morris."

Now, leaving aside the fact that this would be a mental and physical impossibility to the majority of working men, is it not a truism that coercion is the quickest road to hatred? I can imagine nothing more likely to cause working men to hate the very name of these writers than the practical enforcement of Mr. Clynes's suggestion.

Nevertheless, it is highly desirable that the nation's Senate should bear their part in encouraging the working man's studies. Much has been done by University extension lectures, by work similar to that of Morley College, etc., but now it would certainly be to everybody's advantage if Parliament would follow up the lead thus given.

May I suggest that, instead of passing a coercive law, Parliament would fulfil Mr. Clynes's demands in a much better way by appointing a Literary Commission to organise a system of permanent public literary disputations. Let them be established in every town, with subdivisions if necessary. Let every inducement be given to any man who desires to improve himself, e.g., in the way of prizes for essays or speeches, the publication of any creditable productions of the men themselves, etc. And let those who manage the institution remember that all knowledge and upraising and expansion of mind does not necessarily come from book-learning. Many a working man could learn a far deeper lesson from Watts's picture of the "Court of Death" than from all the plays of Shakespeare.

It will be seen that what I recommend is a kind of authorised popular Polytechnic, or a National Forum. No doubt the details of such a scheme would be multitudinous, and the work required to inaugurate it tremendous. Nevertheless, I am convinced that the principle of this idea is the only one by means of which Parliament can hope to give any real encouragement to the working man's studies.—I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN B. HOWARD.

PHILLIMORE ON CROMWELL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—My scanty education at an elementary school left me with somewhat distorted ideas of Cromwell, which facile priests and fanatical partisans had taken pains to inculcate. In maturer years I became acquainted with the "divine simplicity" of Carlyle, and since have been further influenced by the "commissioned glamour" of such writers as S. R. Gardiner, Frederic Harrison, John Morley, and Lord Rosebery. I am now wondering what must be the state of mind of a learned professor who cannot write a brief article on The Æneid for EVERYMAN without dragging in the Great Englishman to bespatter him with such epithets as "self-seeking despot," "bully," and "morally leprous with hypocrisy." And he talks of "a certain snobbism" too!—I am, sir, etc.,

April 28, 1913.

COMMONWEALTH.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

"My songs are not of great things, nor of sorrowful things either;

But only of what my life brings, and it brings to me of neither."

WITH this great thought Mr. John Spencer Muirhead opens the "proem" to THE QUIET SPIRIT (Simpkin, Marshall and Co., 2s. 6d.). The verses in this volume are not characterised by grace of expression or clarity of thought. Mr. Muirhead's metaphors are sadly mixed, and his pictures are obviously out of perspective. We are introduced to what may be "futurist" poetry, but which carries no conviction to anyone used to the phraseology of the present. The poet is offering himself a choice of a vantage ground from which to observe the Spring! He debates if he shall make "a nest within a reedy brake," or, failing this delectable situation, offers himself a quaint alternative,

"Or I shall see with quiet eye,
The dappled paddock loping by."

We had always supposed in our ignorance that "paddock" was a term applied to green fields or pastures. How Mr. Muirhead could have seen a paddock "lope," we do not know," and perhaps it would not be kind to ask him to explain.

It is rarely one finds the high level reached in Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' latest volume, STUDIES IN LOVE AND IN TERROR (Methuen, 6s.), sustained through a number of short stories. The most powerful, and at the same time the most dramatic, is "The Price of Admiralty." The story is laid in a small town on the sea-coast of France, where the French fleet of submarines is stationed for manœuvres. The character of Jacques de Wissant, the Mayor of the town, is wonderfully depicted. A man of sharply defined limita-

Learn to SKETCH in 2 hours

The A.B.C. Method of Drawing provides a short cut to drawing skill by enabling you to apply to drawing the pictorial ability you gained in learning to write. You can learn it in your own home, as it is taught by correspondence lessons and letters. When you are proficient, London's leading Studio, The Association of Designers, will provide you with well-paid commissions. Write to-day for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of prominent Artists. A.B.C. School of Drawing, 46, Chancery Lane, London.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and General MSS. and Plays, 8d. per 1,000 words. Paper and carbon-copy included.—C. Girton, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE LONGER YOU PAY RENT THE MORE MONEY YOU WASTE. Apply to-day for "Every Man his own Landlord," which will be sent post free to applicants mentioning this paper. Address—Managers, 246, Bishopsgate, E.C.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settle Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTLE INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND.—ANOTHER CUBAN EXPERT. "I was Official Stenographer in the House of Representatives during the Autonomic regime, and when the Republic was inaugurated refused an appointment as stenographer to the Senate. My 15 years' experience, and knowledge of several Spanish systems, have convinced me that Sloan-Duployan is by far the best system for Spanish and English."—From Mr. Emilio Arnau, The Henry Clay & Book Co., Ltd., Havana, Cuba. SLOAN-DUPOLOYAN is used in fourteen languages, is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Interesting illustrated handbook free. Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLIX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

SMALL COUNTRY VILLA, near Felixstowe, to let (furnished) during August. Beautiful district. Large garden, well laid out. Station 5 minutes. Address—Schoolmaster, The Laurels, Nacton, Ipswich.

You can test our NEW POSTAL LESSONS in RUSSIAN,
FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, LATIN or GREEK
for the modest sum of ONE SHILLING.
Write: Director, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gellatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed clinato-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.
Money refunded if not satisfactory.
A. R. QUADRUPLIX Ltd., 88, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready. Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost. Gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

Shaving with a
"CLEMAK" is
Simple as 'A.B.C.'

No "learning how"—you feel at home with the "Clemak" at once. Never a cut, never a scratch—just a close, quick, smooth shave and skin-comfort afterwards. Acquire the "Clemak" habit—and add a new pleasure to your life.

The British-made "Clemak" is simplicity itself. There are no screws, bars or plates to bother about and nothing to remove when cleaning. The "Clemak" is self-adjusting, and, with the patent "Clemak" strop, self-stropping.

The blades are made of the best quality Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by electric process. They retain a fine shaving edge, and can be stropped over and over again. The razor itself lasts a lifetime.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5

Made as well and shaves as well as any guinea razor. Remember, it's a "Clemak" you want.

Obtainable from all Cutlery, Ironmongers, Stores, &c., or post free from the Clemak Razor Co., 17, Billiter St., London, E.C. [Works, Sheffield.]

FREE A copy of Amusing and Instructive Booklet, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

Send Coupon To-day
Or a postcard will do, on mentioning this journal.

Clemak Razor and Seven
Blades ... 5/-
Combination Outfit,
Stropping Machine, Hide Strop, with Clemak and Twelve
Blades ... 10/6

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.
To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
17, Billiter St., London, E.C.

Send me gratis and post free a copy of "His First Shave" which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

NAME.....
ADDRESS.....

tions, narrow affections, and overweening ambition, the pivot of his character is pride, a pride which enables him to sustain the self-control almost inhuman in its inflexibility. His wife, Claire, has never cared for him; his coldness repels her so that she shuts away the emotional side of her nature, and at the best an armed truce exists between them. She falls in love with Commander Dupré, of the submarine "Neptune," who responds with ardour. They realise that danger exists in their continued friendship, and decide to separate for ever. On the last day of his stay at the town, she consents to go for a trip in the submarine that he commands. It is against the regulations of the service, and secrecy has to be observed. She tells her husband that she is spending the day with her sister Madeline. The adventure culminates in a tragedy, the submarine goes down, every hand on board is killed. Jacques learns the truth from Madeline, and having lost all hope, snatches at the one thing left to him—his pride. He insists that Madeline shall go to Italy.

"You must carry out your plan, my poor Madeline. You must go away to-night. . . . You must do this. . . for Claire's sake, and for the sake of Claire's children. You have but sufficient self-control to endure suspense calmly, secretly, . . . and perhaps"—he waited a moment—"the truth will never be known, or only known to a very few people—people who, as you say, will understand."

He gives it out publicly that Claire has accompanied her. And then, having arranged to cover up any possible scandal on his wife's name, hurries off to the Admiral in command of the Fleet, and insists that the bodies of the victims shall be recovered from the vessel secretly and by night. The Admiral consents. Claire's honour is saved, the children freed for ever from the slightest whisper against their mother's fame. Poor Claire is buried in the coffin with Dupré. It is given out publicly that she died of scarlet fever in Italy, attended by her devoted sister Madeline, and the Mayor of Falaise returns to the narrow course of his official way! The author has the power of making the reader visualise the scenes that she depicts. The tenseness of her dramatic situations makes one catch the breath, and wait for the solution of the matter with quickened pulse and a real sense and excitement and perturbation. The book is one of the most vivid and dramatic that has been published for a long time.

"I am a watcher of life." With this remarkable announcement the latest book of Mr. Harry Tighe is opened. A WATCHER OF LIFE (Ouseley, 6s.) is a pretentious and at the same time a very silly book, written in the form that was popular some twenty years ago, based upon a far-fetched and frankly ridiculous plot and crowded with irrelevant incidents and impossible people. The bold bad baronet, Sir Patrick, falls hopelessly in love with one Rita Haulterman. This lady is apparently unable to use plain English, so she scatters French phrases up and down the book at all and every opportunity. The wife of Sir Patrick suffers from a morbid imagination and a diseased body. These deficiencies are counterbalanced by an ample fortune, which provides the bold bad baronet with the means to escape from her society and to enjoy the beauties of Europe. For some reason, totally inexplicable to the reader, Rosamund pretends to be dead; her husband accepts the intimation with placid indifference, and without unduly concerning himself with the formalities of death certificates or anything else. He does not question the statement of her death, but forthwith marries Rita, and the unfortunate Rosamund wakes from a cataleptic trance to find her position is usurped. Far from resenting the stranger's intrusion, she apologises humbly, even abjectly, for her continued existence, and, realising that she somewhat embarrasses her rival, considerably commits suicide, being in the second instance really dead. The style is slipshod, the sentiments mawkish. Mr. Tighe has not fulfilled the promise of better things suggested by "The Model in Green."

THE BURNING QUESTION (Putnam's, 6s.) discusses the rival claims of a woman's duty as wife and mother with the gratification of her artistic instinct. Miss Grace Litchfield feels compelled to thrust her heroine from a comfortable home with a dear little child and a loving and indulgent husband into the stress of competition with poorer and less favourably circumstanced violinists. She runs away, determined to make a name as a fiddler. Her husband not unnaturally pursues her, and to escape him she assumes the identity of a woman who is drowned, leaving her unfortunate husband to suppose that she has committed suicide. After two or three years he marries a healthy, normal girl, who is the one believable character in the book. An hour after his marriage, Olive, the wife, reappears, and intimates that she has come to stay. The world has declined to listen to her fiddling, and she has come back full of concern for her own health, and determined to make things generally speaking unpleasant. In real life, if it is possible to conceive of this nightmare being translated into fact, the husband must inevitably have insisted on her immediate departure, realising that though he had to part from the woman he had just married, there was no reason why he should live with his wife. Miss Litchfield proceeds on the lines of transpontine melodrama. Olive, the wife, remains in his house, which, we are quite sure, she mismanages, and pretends to look after the child. And at the end of three years they are living on terms of the greatest affection and intimacy.

Meanwhile Joyce marries a curate, who is dragged into the story at the last moment.

Mr. Herbert Malleon has written an entertaining volume of tales of gipsy life, NAPOLEON BOSWELL (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) Boney, the young Romany hero, is well drawn, and altogether a refreshing study. We are given an amusing insight into the somewhat precarious method by which he and his relations gain their livelihood, and the extraordinary cleverness with which they invariably manage to circumvent the machinations of their arch enemy, the "man in blue," not to mention the gamekeeper. The character of Napoleon, the elder, is very well portrayed, and in the first tale, "The Luck of the Whip," we are given an instance of the curiously superstitious thread which seems to run through the Romany race. We could wish that the author had been a little more painstaking in his rendering of the accent of the gipsies. It strikes us that the real Romany is rather less Cockney in his speech than Mr. Malleon leads us to believe, but apart from this the book reads convincingly, and brings before our eyes a vivid picture of the adventures of the road. The accounts of the horse fairs are very good reading, and Boney's frantic ride on a vicious, kicking horse to fetch his father from the fair is an exciting moment. We must confess we held our breath as we followed that young, lithe, brown figure tearing down the road in a cloud of dust, mounted on a huge brown beast, which hammered the road in a fury. Was it possible those little hands could hold him in? Would he be found a huddled, lifeless heap by the wayside, or would he prove the master. "The Raiment of Captivity" is well worth

THE SECRET OF THE SUCCESS OF THE LATE J. PIERPONT MORGAN.

Early in his business career the late Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan—the world's greatest financier—realised that the great secret of success in business life lay in the power to concentrate. He learned how to concentrate the powers of his mind so as to grasp calmly and quietly the essentials of any proposition presented to him. Then he demonstrated to the world the power of the concentration of capital in the unifying of scattered industrial enterprises.

EVERY BUSINESS MAN

should know how to concentrate so as to get the best out of himself, and thus make success easier of attainment. A simple way to do this is to apply the principles and methods of the Concentro Course—Scientific Concentration. Business men in every part of the civilised world are reaping success by the aid of this famous system. Editors of famous journals recommend it. Learn what it will do for you by sending to-day for Free Descriptive Booklet to the

CONCENTRO CO.,

46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, W. — A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Large house. Access to gardens. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

ARE YOUR NERVES HEALTHY? — If not, let me explain an inexpensive, drugless treatment. Banishes depression, sleeplessness, irritability, brain-fag, lassitude. Renews youthfulness.—Write "Specialist," c/o EVERYMAN, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

PLAYS WANTED! — We are being constantly asked, by Managers and Producers, for good Plays and Sketches of every description. Let us submit YOURS. Honourable dealing and lowest fees. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, Strand, W.C.

WIENER LITERARY AGENCY.

MSS.—64, Strand, London (next to Tivoli), 1st, 2nd and 3rd floors. Special facilities for placing literary and dramatic works, drawings, etc. Advice on and revision of MSS. undertaken. Particulars post free. 'Phone 369 Central. Wires and cables, "Out-general, London."

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

CLOSING OFFER COUPON.

To the Educational Book Co., Ltd., 17, New Bridge St., London, E.C.

Sirs,—Please send me per return full particulars showing how I can secure the 18-Volume Edition of Dickens' Works on first payment of 5/- with Two Colour Proofs of Dickens illustrations signed by Harry Furniss FREE.

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

You can make sure of securing a set of the Charles Dickens Library and a pair of autographed Colour Proofs if you enclose your first subscription of 5/- now, E.M.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

The name of the chain on your cycle should be if you want the most efficient chain service.

ONE QUALITY—ONE PRICE—5/6 (Fitting extra).

Write for our free Cycle Chain Booklet (contains Chain Tips).

HANS RENOLD LTD. (Dept. 14), MANCHESTER.

reading, and the hero's love story is daintily told. Gertie is a charming study of a gipsy girl, and Ophelia, the ugly duckling, is well depicted. The reader who is a lover of his Borrow will probably find the book has many shortcomings, but if he is willing to overlook these, he will, we believe, thoroughly enjoy this volume of tales of the Brotherhood of the Road.

It is always irritating to find a book the scene of which is laid in the present day giving a chapter headed "Twenty-five Years After" devoted to the supposed results of the manner in which various political and religious subjects have been treated in the opening. When the last chapter treats of the fortunes of the hero and heroine alone in later life it is annoying enough, but life is too short to worry over what has never happened and never will. Such a book is A BUILDER OF SHIPS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), by Charles M. Sheldon. The book treats of an American shipbuilder and his son. They are building warships for their Government, and are "converted" in the middle of the undertaking. They feel that war is wrong, and that all implements of war should be destroyed. They have a contract to fulfil, however, and how they get out of the difficulty the reader must discover. The vivid part of the book is the account of a terrible fire in a block of tenement dwellings and a factory, the owner of which is Brandon Cushing, the shipbuilder. There are hundreds of deaths, and Brandon is held responsible, because he had supplied no fire escapes, although the legal notice had been served upon him. There is a really dramatic trial, in which Brandon comes out in a surprising light. The earlier chapters are decidedly better written than the latter, as the story somewhat fizzles out after the first few episodes. Hermosa, the heroine, is quite unreal; in fact, Mr. Sheldon is not very successful in his characterisation of any of the women. Mr. Sheldon is careless in his grammar, and occasionally makes somewhat stringent calls on our imagination. For instance, such a sentence as "he went back to his desk and confronted himself" is startling, to say the least of it. Again, we are told about a negro porter who gives some harrowing evidence with an "ashen face."

Mr. Ridgwell Cullum has the faculty of gripping his readers with the sense of the weird in nature. His latest book, THE BROODING WILD (Chapman and Hall, 2s. net), is the story of two trappers in the wilds of Canada, and the extraordinary influence which is exercised over them by the White Squaw. The account of their long journey in search of the legendary Queen of the Moosefoot Indians is told with a wonderful vividness. We feel the snap of the sparkling, frosty air, with the sun shining on the vast expanse of snow. We can hear the whispering of the runners as the sledge is swiftly drawn by the panting dogs, and a sense of the weird creeps over us as we read. We feel afraid to breathe or speak aloud—all is still with a silence which can be felt, but which may at any instant be broken by something terrible. We try to shake off the feeling, but even the dogs seem aware there is something—something which is full of danger, but which they cannot face. Undoubtedly the author knows how to impress his readers with the fear of the wild. The story ends tragically and quite unexpectedly, and the mystery is well sustained right throughout. The characters of Nick and Ralph are well drawn, and the manner in which they are victimised by the half-breed, Victor, is carefully thought out. When we say that Mr. Cullum's descriptives make us long to throw down the book and set forth with a train of huskies into the limitless, snowbound "beyond," there is nothing more to add.

AN INN UPON THE ROAD, by Miss Janet Dodge (Sidgwick and Jackson, Ltd., 6s.), may be described as an episode in the life of a young girl, Natalie Herbert, the daughter of a selfish, "persistently young," mother, Marianna, who spends all her energies in keeping her daughter out of all the enjoyments and sensible occupations, for which she longs. The author explains that love is not always the ultimate aim of life, but is very often only an inn upon the road of adventure, at which the wayfarer stays for a while and then passes on, without obtaining the fruition of love. Natalie is a careful study of a girl who is always groping after the solution of herself. She is as puzzled over her own ambitions and temperament as ever her own mother could be, who never attempts to understand and sympathise with her, but engages her energies simply in attracting to herself all the young men whom Natalie brings home. The description of the interview with her daughter, when she breaks the news of her third marriage, is cleverly handled. Marianna is a very understandable and yet repellent character. Conrad, Natalie's lover, is well drawn, though one could wish he was a little less phlegmatic. The book is a notable success, and should run into many editions. For ourselves, we can say with sincerity we are glad to have read it.

Punch has come to be regarded almost as a national institution. Representative of the type of humour that appeals to the Englishman, the matter of the price has alone prevented many readers from becoming regular subscribers. The proprietors, realising this, have decided to offer special terms to new subscribers, and have arranged to supply the paper at a greatly reduced figure. Sixty-five issues of Punch and the Punch Almanack can be obtained for the subscription of 13s. 6d. The reduction in the cost is considerable, and the figure named is extraordinarily small.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

NOTABLE BOOKS.

A BOOK FOR EVERY LOVER OF SWINBURNE

SWINBURNE

AN ESTIMATE

By JOHN DRINKWATER

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

MORNING POST: "From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

BIRMINGHAM POST: "Mr. Drinkwater's study of his character is one of the most illuminating pieces of modern criticism. His book is, indeed, marked with such an insight into the mind and art of a great poet as only a poet-critic is able to arrive at. Nothing fairer, truer, more interesting and enlightening has been written about Swinburne."

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

ATHENÆUM: "Mr. Wicksted proves himself an admirable guide. He gives a good summary account of Aristotle's teaching and its varied fortunes till it conquered the schools in the middle of the thirteenth century, and received its final form, so far as the mediaeval world was concerned, at the hands of Albert and St. Thomas. We can recommend it as a disinterested treatment of the scholastic philosophy of Aquinas."

SALISBURY PLAIN

AND ITS STONES, CATHEDRAL CITY, VILLAGES & FOLK

By ELLA NOYES

Illustrated by Dara Noyes.

Square medium 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

OUTLOOK: "Mrs. Noyes writes with ease, and always entertainingly upon the Plain and its villages, on Salisbury and the country folk. Her book is an interesting compilation of things seen and historic incidents noted."

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A.

Large crown 8vo, 5s. net each volume.

A Series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English literature and thought.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY.

By Prof. JAMES SETH, M.A.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY.

By Prof. W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A.

ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY.

By ERNEST RHYS, M.A.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL.

By Prof. GEORGE SAINTSBURY, LL.D., University of Edinburgh.

PROSPECTUSES FREE ON APPLICATION.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

OETZMANN & CO LTD.

Nr. TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD, W.

Telegrams—"OETZMANN, LONDON." Telephone—MAYFAIR 101.
Stations—Met. Railway, EUSTON SQUARE; Tube, WARREN STREET.

£5 Prepaid Orders Carriage Paid England or Wales. Delivery by Motor 50 miles' radius.

SPECIAL OFFER OF A

LARGE STOCK OF CARPETS

purchased for cash from

Messrs. E. HUGHES & SONS,

Town Carpet Mills,

KIDDERMINSTER,

ALSO

MANUFACTURERS' STOCKS OF BEDROOM SUITES, SIDEBOARDS, DRAWING-ROOM FURNITURE, CABINETS, BEDSTEADS, HALL &
DINING-ROOM FURNITURE

AT ONE-THIRD LESS THAN USUAL COST.

6 only Solid Oak Sideboards,

Jacobean style, fitted with cupboards and drawers, and moulded panels, 4ft. 6in. wide, 3ft. 7in. high. Usual price, £6 18 6.

OFFERED FOR £4 18 6 EACH.

5 only Solid Oak Bureaux,

Jacobean style with moulded panel and drawer fronts, automatic slides to support writing flap, interior fitted with small drawers for stationery, 2ft. 5in. wide, 3ft. 3in. high. Usual price, £5 10.

TO BE SOLD AT £3 12 6 EACH.

NOTABLE NOVELS

THE LOST MAMELUKE.

By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

An absorbing story of Egypt in the closing years of the Mameluke ascendancy.

DAISY DARLEY;

or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily Herald.—"I can confidently recommend it to anyone who can appreciate an original and delicate piece of work."

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS, 6s.

Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc.

Times.—"There is breathless excitement and fun in the tale. The chapter telling how Tamburlaine carries his half-dead master all the way from Dublin to Ardhoroe without a rest is full of a tremendous galloping movement that is over-mastering."

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

The Seal Pen

You should make its acquaintance. It will prove a boon companion. You can carry it upside down or flat in your pocket—it will not leak. It does not "sweat." It will not soil your fingers.

When you bring it into use it writes right away, for the nib is in the ink when the pen is sealed. It proves its worth in the pocket and in the hand. Every pen guaranteed to afford two years' satisfaction.

The Seal Pen fills without taking apart. It is made in 3 sizes:—Long Seal, Middle Seal, Short Seal. In each size there are 12 nibs to choose from. The nib is strong—made of genuine 14-carat gold, tipped with hardest iridium.

Your Stationer
Sells the Seal

W. H. Smith & Son, Manufacturing Stationers, Kean Street, Kingsway, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 30. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MAY 9, 1913

One Penny.

W.H. CAFFEY
From a Photograph
by
G. BERNARD SHAW.

MRS. SIDNEY WEBB, NATA 1858.

For Character Sketch, see page 105.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of Mrs. Sidney Webb... .. | 97 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 98 |
| The General Strike in Belgium—By Emile Vandervelde, M.P. | 99 |
| The Lloyd George Crusade. III. The Taxation of Land—By P. W. Wilson | 100 |
| The Road that Leads to Nowhere—By Llewellyn Macartney | 101 |
| Everyman's French Page. The Philosophy of Uncle Benjamin—By Claude Tillier | 102 |
| Announcement of a New Series of Competitions | 102 |
| Liselotte: A German Princess at the Court of Louis XIV. Part I.—By the Editor | 103 |
| Mrs. Sidney Webb—By C. M. Lloyd | 105 |
| The Real Napoleon. Part II.—By Charles Sarolea... .. | 106 |
| Considerations Touching our Future State—By Maurice Maeterlinck | 107 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," by George Meredith | 108 |
| Sex and the Drama. A Reply—By D. E. Oliver | 110 |
| In Memoriam: George Meredith. Poem—By Horace Shipp | 111 |
| The Spider. Short Story—By André Theuriet | 112 |
| The Muse in Exile—By Gilbert Thomas | 113 |
| Literary Notes | 114 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? | 116 |
| Enterprise in Business | 117 |
| Pacifism and Imperialism | 119 |
| The Abolition of the Working Classes | 121 |
| The Use of Books to Working Men | 122 |
| The Dappled Paddock | 122 |
| Phillimore on Cromwell | 122 |
| Books of the Week | 124 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ONCE again the imperturbable good temper of the police turned what might easily have been a repetition of that "bloody Sunday" of 1887, which fructified the Social Democratic movement with the blood of its martyrs, into a rough-and-ready but relatively harmless scrimmage, ending in a general "trek" homewards. As usual, the cause of the disturbance was an irresponsible and unauthorised inciter of the mob; and once more the curious impotence of the authorised leader over against the self-constituted demagogue was made apparent. It remains, however, that a large section of the British public is smarting under what looks like the beginning of a somewhat un-British policy of police suppression. The recent police raid upon the Suffragist headquarters and the confiscation or prohibition of publications will doubtless be welcomed by many whom the militant policy has filled with apprehension; but the thoughtful observer, whatever be his attitude on the question of Women's Suffrage, will see the shadow of a grave menace in these suppressive and prohibitive measures. Free speech and a free Press has not only been the glory of Britain; they have also been her surest safeguards against rebellion and anarchy. Bereft of the escape valve of free utterance, the rebellious elements must ferment and breed the poison of that fierce and furtive revolt which makes the Continental rebel the enemy of society where, given the safety valve of expression, he would have been but a healthy irritant. Unless we completely misread the lessons of history, this suppressive policy will breed a crop of riots and rebellions such as we have been spared this long while past.

China has naturally loomed big in the public eye during the past few weeks. Among the many interesting contributions made to our understanding of a complicated and pregnant situation, none has struck us as more clear-sighted than that made by Lord William Gascoyne-Cecil in the columns of the daily Press. He rightly points out that, while China's request for the prayers of Christendom was more immediately actuated by patriotic ambitions, notably the desire for recognition as a nation, it is ultimately part and parcel of an as yet inarticulate but very real moral and spiritual aspiration, finding expression in the anti-opium agitation and similar movements. He also reminds us that the present revolution is moulded, not upon English, but American ideals. Owing to a short-sighted missionary policy which did not include the higher education of the young Chinaman, it is the Americanised Chinaman who counts in China to-day. And the China of to-day, be it remembered, is on the verge of one of those great storms which are so apt to follow on the heels of what promised to be an age of gold. On the very Sunday set apart for these Christian prayers, Constitutionalism was made a mere farce by the signing of the sextuple—or rather, as it is now, the quintuple—loan agreement. And again it has been the United States who, in refusing to have anything to do with this agreement, have opened a door of mutual friendship and advantage to the yeasting young Republic—"the only door," says President Wilson characteristically, "by which we care to enter." Britain has lost a great opportunity of moulding the young mind of a people on whom very much of the future depends. She will be wise in using the present attitude of wistful aspirations which characterises thousands of thoughtful young Chinamen to retrieve what she has missed.

The French League of the Young Republic has discovered the convincing value of the sweating exhibition, and at the present moment the Sweaters' Museum is the latest thing in Paris. There the gay and well-to-do buyers of sweated goods can see what their purchases spell in terms of human tears and blood. The exhibition is run very much on the lines of the English one for which the Principal of Aberdeen University was so largely responsible. A dramatic touch is supplied by a little curtained recess at the far end of the room, into which you are bidden to enter. It contains a mirror bearing the legend, "Who is to blame?"

There has died at a New York nursing home for poor negroes, at the age of close upon a hundred, Harriet Tubman Davies, the Moses of the Negroes—one of the most picturesque figures in the Civil War. A child of thirteen, she called a brutal slave overseer to account (hence her title of the Moses of the Negro), and was promptly knocked down by him, and that so violently as to inflict a cerebral injury, from the effects of which she did not fully recover for many years. Her extraordinary cunning and enormous physical strength made her the central figure in many thrilling exploits, which make good reading. Many great men of the period, including Emerson, John Brown, Horace Mann, Garrison, and others, held her in high and friendly esteem.

The latest development of the cinematographic art is Kinoplastikon, now on view at the Scala Theatre, London. It is a process by which living stereoscopic pictures are shown without a screen. The illusion of watching living actors performing as on a real stage needs only the aid of a perfected system of gramophones to make it complete. Even at the present stage Kinoplastikon is yet in its earliest infancy. The fact that the actors make their entrances and exits by the wings adds a startling touch of actuality to this screenless kinema.

THE GENERAL STRIKE IN BELGIUM

By EMILE VANDERVELDE, M.P. (Leader of the Belgian Socialist Party.)

THE Belgian General Strike is over. It has been what the proletariat wished it to be, formidable and pacific. From the first day 300,000 men had stopped work. They very soon became 400,000, and for nearly two weeks this enormous mass remained immobile, impassive, without any violence being committed, without "order" being disturbed for one single moment.

As for the results which have been achieved, in order to appreciate their value we must go back to the beginning of the crisis and recall its main stages.

According to the Belgian Constitution, all men of twenty-five years of age are electors, but—as in Saxony—the rich, or rather the well-to-do, have two or three votes, whereas the poor have only one vote. It is in order to secure the abolition of the plural vote that for twenty years Socialists have used every means of propaganda and persuasion. At the last General Election (June, 1912) they hoped to have done with the Clerical majority, and to realise electoral reform through the understanding of the Opposition parties. That hope was not realised, owing to the treason, from class instinct, of a certain number of three-vote electors, who had been in the habit of voting for the Liberals.

From the month of July, and during the nine months which followed, the whole effort of the Labour party was devoted to strike preparations. A fund for purposes of propaganda was established by the co-operatives, the workers' syndicates, and the various political groups; manifestos and propagandist tracts were issued fortnightly and scattered broadcast all over the country, and the big syndicates decided to devote a considerable part of their funds to the maintenance of the strike. The bourgeois supporters of Universal Suffrage were asked to undertake to aid the strikers financially, or to receive their children into their homes. Above all, the working classes were called upon to limit their expenditure, and the result of their self-denial was organised into a reserve fund, with a view to accumulating sufficient to keep 300,000 to 400,000 strikers afloat for several weeks.

This self-denial, particularly in the two great industrial provinces of Liège and Hainault, assumed such proportions as speedily to have a most depressing influence upon the retail trade. The preparation for the strike alone caused the takings of the small traders to fall by thirty, forty, and even fifty per cent. in many cases. Commercial travellers gave vent to bitter complainings, and the Excise Department registered an appreciable loss in the income from beer duties. On the other hand, when, on February 12th, 1913, after the House had refused to consider our motion to revise the Constitution, the strike was fixed for April 14th, the mere fact of this decision produced a profound disturbance in the course of industrial business. Many heads of commercial houses were afraid of accepting orders which they were not sure of being able to execute, or saw competitors of other countries being preferred to them. In the port of Antwerp, especially, there was a general complaint that many ships, alarmed by the prospect of a strike, had turned their course away towards Hamburg or Rotterdam.

Briefly, the crisis, called forth at a given moment, became so acute that the most urgent efforts were made on the bourgeois side to arrive at a compromise.

It was well known that for some time already the majority of the members of the Government had grudgingly pledged themselves, thanks to the influence of the King, to effect a revision of the electoral system somewhere in the near future; that the delay merely meant that they were trying to gain time until they had doubled the cape of the elections of 1914, and that nothing would have pleased them better meanwhile than to consider this problem of electoral reform, if they had not been afraid lest in so doing they should alienate the reactionary elements of the extreme Right.

With a view to inducing them to say in public what they were saying already in the lobby, Liberal Deputies and merchants' and manufacturers' associations intervened, but without success. The mayors of the nine county towns interposed in their turn between the Chief of the Government and the leaders of the Labour party, asking of the latter to abandon the strike and of the former to address themselves to the problem of Constitutional revision, and for one moment it seemed that their efforts would be crowned with success, for on February 29th, M. de Broqueville, the head of the Cabinet, authorised the mayors to communicate to the Labour party "the impression that if the declaration of the strike be rescinded the Government would not refuse to make a step in the direction of conciliation and appeasement."

When they heard these declarations, the Socialist leaders were convinced that the action of the Government in authorising the mayors to bring them a message such as this meant that, bent on saving its face, it had resolved to satisfy their demands. It is certain, moreover, that this was also the conviction of the mayors and, in all probability, the intention of M. de Broqueville.

But the mayors, and perhaps the head of the Cabinet also, had reckoned without the extreme elements of the Clerical-Conservative party. Hardly had the thirty or forty Deputies hostile to all electoral reform who sat on the Government benches got wind of what had passed, than a storm of protest arose against those Ministers who were suspected of having wanted to make terms with the Socialists. They were urged to let the matter drop, and, in order to preserve the unity of his party, the Chief of the Cabinet was constrained to sacrifice his conciliatory intention to the ill-will of his political associates.

When, on March 13th, the Liberal leader, M. Hymans, asked the Government what it was going to do, M. de Broqueville replied with a few vague phrases, implying the possibility of a revision of the Constitution after the elections of 1914, and the prospect of the appointment of a Commission concerning itself exclusively with the problem of municipal and county elections.

The mayors obviously had been cheated. The Chief of the Cabinet had not broken his promises, because he had made no formal promises. But he had left room for hope. He had given them the right to hope. And what is more, he had been warned by the mayor of Brussels, M. Max, that it would be a vain and even a perilous thing to attempt to limit the consideration of the question to the local electorate. "In the course of a discussion with M. Emile Vandervelde," M. Max wrote to M. de Broqueville as late as March 8th, "I consulted him about this proposal. He replied without any hesitation that he considered such a course would be disastrous; that it would prove a bitter disillusionment to the Labour party and be the signal of a fresh uprising."

In saying this, I have proved only too reliable a prophet. The declaration of the Government aroused a wave of indignation in Labour circles. In vain the majority of Labour leaders tried to preach patience. They bid their followers observe how, in spite of the burking of plain issues on the part of the Government, the cause of electoral revision had made immense progress during the past nine months, that public opinion was already conquered, that electoral reform was now only a question of time, and that, under these conditions, it was no longer necessary to have recourse to that counsel of despair, a general strike. Nothing, however, came of their persuasions. By an overwhelming majority, the Congress of March 23rd fixed the beginning of the strike for April 14th, and on the day appointed the great cessation from work began, with admirable concord and with an impressive calmness of temper.

Two days afterwards the Houses of Parliament, which had given themselves a month's holiday, resumed their deliberations. Under the influence of the strike, the order of the day was suspended. A debate ensued, in the course of which the Chief of the Cabinet, heckled by Socialist Deputies, protested his unaltered sentiments of conciliation, renewed his promise to appoint a Commission to deal with the problem of the local electorate, and added, to the general surprise, that if this Commission, in which all parties would be represented, would come to complete agreement upon a definite proposal, such a proposal could, in the course of events, be extended to the legislative electorate also.

We lost no time in emphasising the significance of this sensational pronouncement, and, on the morrow, a Liberal Deputy, M. Masson, moved that the House should take note of this declaration of the Government, pointing out that, after all, it implied the consideration of the whole of the problem of electoral reform. Three days after, on April 22nd, the House voted unanimously for M. Masson's motion, as slightly amended by the Right Wing, and the Strike Committee proposed a return to work.

Without wishing to exaggerate the importance of this Parliamentary result, it is certain that the cause of Revision is now well in train. The only remaining question is whether it will take place immediately before or immediately after the elections of 1914.

What is, however, of infinitely greater importance, in my view, is that the struggle in which we have been engaged has demonstrated that a general strike for the end of obtaining a definite reform can be absolutely peaceful and orderly, and attain satisfactory results, without in any way going beyond the limits of the law, when it is carefully prepared and when it is carried on by a disciplined proletariat which knows what it wants and wants it with determination.

From this point of view, we hope that the experience which we have just passed through in Belgium will not be lost on the other sections of the International Labour and Socialist party.

THE LLOYD GEORGE CRUSADE

III.—THE TAXATION OF LAND

By P. W. WILSON.

IN this third article I am to define the part played by taxation of land in the social programme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This year's Revenue Bill is a signal for the renewal of this controversy, dealing as it will with the valuation of farms. So-called single-taxers, like Mr. Wedgwood and Mr. Outhwaite, have from the first complained that the Budget made a mistake in including the cost of hedges, ditches, and other unexhausted improvements in the site value of agricultural land, and the Revenue Bill is to furnish, where necessary, a new valuation, from which such items will be eliminated. The critics tell us that, if you subtract from the value of a farm the present worth of buildings, fences, and drainage, you may arrive at a minus quantity; but this prospect does not daunt the land-taxers, who argue that, in a well-ordered country, there will always be a reserve of unfavourable land, of no capital value which will furnish an automatic outlet for marginal labour. Whatever weight we attach to this contention, the fact remains that Mr. Lloyd George proposes this year to create a standard of net site valuation which at a future date will enable him or any other Chancellor of the Exchequer to levy a national tax at a uniform figure for town and country. The land-taxers claim that id. in the £ would yield about 20 millions—a figure admittedly speculative—and they dream of so achieving a free breakfast table, an enriched system of education, and national main roads. But what they really want is not revenue as such, so much as a liberated market in land—the breaking up of large estates—and the better use of land for small holdings, garden suburbs, and allotments. The Budget, with its tentative duty on undeveloped land near towns, has already brought a good deal of land under the hammer. The beauty of the land tax is that it cuts at a stroke through the Gordian knot of legal agreements which fix the whole burden of rating on the unfortunate occupier; but I submit none the less that Mr. Lloyd George to-day contemplates a somewhat different approach to the problem which we are considering. The immediate task is rating reform rather than a land tax.

Policy has to be considered in electoral terms, and, humanly speaking, Liberalism, deprived under Home Rule of the Irish, depends on holding the towns and gaining in the counties. Take, then, the case of a man who farms a hundred acres of, say, £50 an acre capital value, or £30 net. A penny in the £ on that farm means £12 10s. a year. You may tell the man that his landlord will pay, and that the money, so collected Imperially, will be distributed subsequently in relief of rates. But the case is not an easy one to drive home against the prejudices and the suspicions of the countryside, especially in those rural constituencies where land is held by the small man on freehold. Rating, however, is a different matter. Everybody agrees that reform is here long overdue. And, as I shall speedily show, the reform naturally presents itself not as a new tax, but as a relief from old ones.

The first fundamental fact is that, having secured a national valuation, we can now sweep away local assessments. Much the most serious abuse in local government, especially in rural areas, has been the fact that property has been assessed by the guardians, a body supposed to be elected for an entirely different purpose, and composed oftentimes of men whose status is such that they cannot hold the balance even as between the lord in his castle and the grocer in his little village shop. Valuation by a central authority like the Treasury will have the immediate effect of raising the assessments of large country houses and the adjoining amenities. One more function will fall from the Guardians, who will thus be one step nearer an unregretted extinction.

Some people imagine that Budget valuation means site valuation only. This is an error, and my above point amounts only to this—that Budget Valuation means uniform valuation, as between area and area, and as between rich and poor. As a matter of fact, there is not one Budget valuation, but several. The Budget gives you not only site value, but total value—using the term quite popularly—which would include buildings. Thus, under the Budget assessments, a local authority could, if it wished, continue to levy rates as at present on houses as well as sites—on machinery in factories—on signal-boxes on railways. And Mr. Lloyd George has clearly indicated that his plan will be one of local option. He will not say to Liverpool or Glasgow or Middlesex, You shall relieve improvements of rates. He will only say, You may if you like. The effect of this will be a new and vital issue in local politics—something tangible, which the ratepayers will have to decide for themselves. It is not quite so simple as some land-taxers imagine. To say that no rates are to be paid on the fabric of Chatsworth or Arundel Castle is not to assist the poor! Again, to charge rates only on the prairie assessment of railways would be to put some millions a year into the pockets of the companies. It may be right to do this, but the immediate effect would be to raise the capital value of railways by, say, 60 millions—I do not pretend to have worked out the exact figure—which, on nationalisation, would have to be added to the purchase price paid by the State.

Such rating reform as I have outlined would be accompanied by a general simplification, which would include Exchequer grants, now amounting to about 10 millions. It is here, of course, that we touch the economic aspect of Lord Haldane's Education Campaign. That must be a partnership between the Treasury and local authorities. Education is supposed to stand a little apart from the Lloyd George Crusade. Some regard it as a rival, but, if the patience of EVERYMAN is not exhausted, I will in a concluding article describe the bearing of one scheme, so far as it is defined, on the other. It is a subject not free from serious difficulty.

THE ROAD THAT LEADS TO NOWHERE

By LLEWEN MACARTNEY.

“—These things and I; in sound I speak—
Their sound is but their stir, they speak by silences.”
—FRANCIS THOMPSON.

SOME way behind Childerton village—beyond where the last group of cottages straggle apart from the others on the Winchester road—unmolested and unfrequented, there it lies, the Road that Leads to Nowhere.

The hard-headed, practical Hampshire villagers never come down it, for their business takes them in other directions, and they have no time for dreaming. Village yokels and farmers' boys stray across it sometimes in their search for plovers' eggs. I encountered one of them once. He had discovered a nest with three eggs close by a tuft of furze, and was regarding it with unseeing eyes. “'Ta'an't nobbut a haap of stoans and muck,” he said dispassionately, and went his way, his hands full of eggs.

Generally the Road that Leads to Nowhere is left to idlers such as you and me to wander down at our own sweet will, and yet at times one meets strange folk there.

Strangers who come from the jar and whirr of great London find it attractive by reason of its indefiniteness, for it wanders gently up from the main road, across the chalky, furze-dotted common land, and spreads itself only to lose itself over the rolling downs, behind which you may see the sun rise every morning, for the Road runs eastward, and is for that reason most lovely in the light of the early morning, and only less lovely in the evening, when the long shadows lie upon it.

Are we right in calling it the Road that Leads to Nowhere? I wonder. For in the morning the Road runs on till it seems to join the pathway made by the sun's first rays, which lead to the very heart of the sun himself. In the evening the sun has gone and the path has faded, and then it is that the silence of the Road begins to speak to those who care to listen. The silence has a message for many people, but some are too deaf to hear, and some are too tired. Not long since a worker from the great city to whom the Road had made a strong appeal answered that appeal, and came to stay in the village for rest and change. He hurried from the cottage where he was staying towards the Road, in order to spend the sunset hour there, but long before the daylight had faded he was back at the cottage again. “I have waited for this evening walk for the last six months,” he said, “and now the time has come I cannot bear it. The silence is too great!”

The next morning he went at sunrise, and all was different, for the great silence of the Road is broken then by the call of the birds. Larks spring by hundreds from the ground and fill the air with their songs; finches and yellow-hammers chirrup to each other from broken patches of hawthorn bush; and those to whom the plover's cry is not melancholy can watch him as he wheels and circles overhead, showing now the bright and now the dark side of his plumage. Indeed, there is life enough on the Road for those who care to look for it. And the silence of the evening hour as well? What of it? Just this, that since different localities tend to produce different trains of thought, so the silence of the Road has a special message for those who are prepared to hear it.

Listen! It is the evening hour, and you have drifted down the Road that Leads to Nowhere. Hark! The church clock has ceased striking, the village is at rest, the great silence is falling round you. Hush! Do nothing to disturb it. Let your eyes wander down the dim, familiar track, and your thoughts, it may be, will wander down another track, misty, undefined, and fascinating; you know it—the Road that Leads to Nowhere in the mind. Follow it out undisturbed; let the vague, delicious sensations of the brain float around you unchecked—the silence is speaking to you.

Could we but fathom the depths of the silence that falls upon us outwardly and inwardly we should find maybe our dim consciousness would turn to sure reality, the Nowhere would change into the Everywhere, and as the pathway of Gold would lead us to the Sun, so the Great Everywhere would bring us to God.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

BY CLAUDE TILLIER

La Philosophie de mon Oncle Benjamin

J'AI quarante ans; j'ai déjà passé par quatre professions; j'ai été maître d'études, soldat, maître d'école, et me voilà journaliste. J'ai été sur la terre et sur l'océan, sous la tente et au coin de lâtre, entre les barreaux d'une prison et au milieu des espaces libres de ce monde; j'ai obéi et j'ai commandé; j'ai eu des moments d'opulence et des années de misère. On m'a aimé et on m'a haï; on m'a applaudi et on m'a tourné en dérision. J'ai été fils et père, amant et époux; j'ai passé par la saison des fleurs et par celle des fruits, comme disent les poètes. Je n'ai trouvé dans aucun de ces états que j'eusse beaucoup à me féliciter d'être enfermé dans la peau d'un homme, plutôt que dans celle d'un loup ou d'un renard, plutôt que dans la coquille d'une huître, dans l'écorce d'un arbre, ou dans la pellicule d'une pomme de terre. Peut-être si j'étais rentier, rentier à cinquante mille francs surtout, je penserais différemment.

En attendant, mon opinion est que l'homme est une machine qui a été faite exprès pour la douleur; il n'a que cinq sens pour percevoir le plaisir, et la souffrance lui arrive par toute la surface de son corps; en quelque endroit qu'on le pique, il saigne; en quelque endroit qu'on le brûle, il vient une vésicule. Les poumons, le foie, les entrailles ne peuvent lui donner aucune jouissance; cependant le poumon s'enflamme et le fait tousser; le foie s'obstrue et lui donne la fièvre; les entrailles se tordent et font la colique. Vous n'avez pas un nerf, un muscle, un tendon sous la peau qui ne puisse vous faire crier de douleur.

Votre organisation se détraque à chaque instant comme une mauvaise pendule. Vous allez au bal, une entorse vous saisit au pied, et il faut vous rapporter chez vous, sur un matelas; aujourd'hui, vous êtes un grand écrivain, un grand philosophe, un grand poète; un fil de votre cerveau se casse, on aura beau vous saigner, vous mettre de la glace sur la tête, demain vous ne serez qu'un pauvre fou.

La douleur se tient derrière tous vos plaisirs; vous êtes à l'ombre de votre jardin, et vous vous écriez, "Oh, la belle rose!" et la rose vous pique; "Oh, le beau fruit!" il y a une guêpe dedans, et le fruit vous mord.

Vous dites, "Dieu nous a fait pour le servir et l'aimer." Cela n'est pas vrai; il vous a fait pour souffrir. L'homme qui ne souffre pas est une machine mal faite, une créature manquée, un estropié moral, un avorton de la nature.

La mort n'est pas seulement la fin de la vie, elle en est le remède.

On n'est nulle part aussi bien que dans un cercueil. Si vous m'en croyez, au lieu d'un paletot neuf, allez-vous commander un cercueil. C'est le seul habit qui ne gêne pas.

The Philosophy of Uncle Benjamin

"I AM forty years of age, and have already passed through four professions; I have been tutor in a college, a soldier, a schoolmaster, and now I am a journalist. I have been on land and sea, I have lived under a tent, by the fireside corner, behind the bars of a prison, and in the free, open spaces of the world; I have obeyed and I have commanded; I have had moments of opulence and years of misery. Some have loved me, and some have hated me; they have applauded me, and also held me up to derision. I have been a son and a father, a lover and a husband; and, as the poets say, I have passed through the season of flowers and through the season of fruit. Under none of these conditions have I been able to congratulate myself that I have been enclosed in the skin of a man rather than in that of a wolf, or a fox, or in the shell of an oyster, in the bark of a tree or in the pellicle of a potato. Perhaps if I had been a landed proprietor, especially a proprietor with an income of £2,000, I might think differently.

"As things are, my opinion is that man is a machine, made expressly to suffer pain; he has only been given five senses to perceive pleasure, but he can feel pain over the whole surface of his body. Prick him, and he bleeds; burn his skin, and a blister appears. His lungs, liver and intestines give him no pleasure; on the contrary, his lungs get inflamed, and cause him to cough; his liver becomes obstructed, and gives him fever; a twist of the intestines, and colic supervenes. You have not a nerve, a muscle, or a tendon that cannot make you cry out with pain.

"Your organism gets out of order every moment, like a badly made clock. You go to a dance, and you twist your ankle, and have to go home to bed; you may be a celebrated writer or poet or philosopher, but, if an artery bursts in your brain, they may bleed you and put ice on your head, but to-morrow you will be nothing but a poor fool. Pain stands behind all your pleasures.

"You are perhaps in the shade of your garden, and you say, 'Oh, what a lovely rose!'—and the rose pricks you. 'Oh, what beautiful fruit!'—there is a wasp in it, and the fruit bites you.

"Some may say that God has made us in order to serve Him and love Him. That is not true. You have been made in order to suffer; and the man who does not suffer is a badly made machine, a failure, a moral disfiguration, an abortion of nature.

"Death is not only the end of life, but its remedy. Nowhere can one be so comfortable as in one's coffin. Believe me when I say that, instead of getting a new coat, order a coffin. It will be much more comfortable."

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

It is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

1. The Civil Servant.
2. The Anglican Clergyman.
3. The Foreign Missionary.
4. The Male Teacher.
5. The Compositor.
6. The Miner.

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace,
Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

LISELOTTE: A GERMAN PRINCESS AT THE COURT OF LOUIS XIV.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

I.

ABOUT the end of the seventeenth century there lived at the Courts of Versailles and St. Cloud a German Princess, the second wife of the only brother of Louis XIV., who had made herself the butt of universal ridicule. Strikingly ugly, tactless in manner, coarse in speech, cynical and sarcastic, she was despised and derided by the courtiers, she was ill-used by her husband, she was out of favour with Louis, she was hated by the King'smorganatic wife, Mme. de Maintenon, the uncrowned Queen of France. In the busy throng which filled the galleries of the huge palace, she lived, in the recess of her private apartments, an existence of almost complete solitude, and eventually she was reduced to the company of her dogs, which she preferred to the society of a Court which she abhorred. Her chief occupation in life for thirty years was to write interminable letters to her relatives and friends in Germany, and in those letters she would not, like her contemporary, Mme. de Sevigné, pour out the fulness of an affectionate heart; she only sought an outlet for the malignant passions that oppressed her. Little did the courtiers suspect that the ungainly, massive, unpopular Princess was to be the ancestress of half the Imperial and Royal houses of Europe, and that she would appear to posterity as one of the most remarkable women of her age. Still less did they suspect that their own reputations would be at the mercy of a woman whom they reviled, and that she was drawing the features of their moral characters in indelible lines for all times to come.

I.

The voluminous correspondence of Elizabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans, better known to French historians as "Madame," and known to German historians under the endearing nickname of "Liselotte," form with the "Memoires" of Saint Simon the most important historical document for the last thirty years of the reign of Louis XIV. From a purely literary point of view, the Memoirs of Saint Simon are, no doubt, vastly superior, and it would be absurd to compare the finished, incisive pen-portraits of the greatest memoir writer of all ages with the slovenly, formless outpourings of Liselotte. But from a purely historical point of view, the Correspondence of "Madame" has even greater value than the "Memoires," for these only received their final form fifty years after the events they narrated, and the historian writes mainly from hearsay, and indirect report. On the contrary, the letters of Liselotte were written day after day under the direct impression of the events she described. She possessed, moreover, unique opportunities of knowing the chief personages of the times, and she was a far better observer, as well as a more intelligent one, than the narrow-minded Duke. And, finally, being a German of the Germans, and thus observing the Court of Versailles, as it were, from the outside, her judgment was more detached, as well as more penetrating.

Whilst there exist considerable differences and disagreements between the "Memoires" and the "Correspondence," at the same time there also exists a striking parallelism between them. Both writings owe their origin to the same circumstances, namely, to the fact that Saint Simon and Liselotte were both seeking, in their productions, an occupation for their enforced leisure and an outlet for their passions, their grievances and disappointments. Both had to hide their writings from their contemporaries. Both writers are bent on depicting the darker side of Court life. Both look on the chief characters and events of their generation from the same angle.

(And both the "Memoires" and the "Correspondence" have been buried for several generations in the secret archives of France and Germany. It is only in our own day that M. de Boislisle has been able to give us a complete edition of Saint Simon. As for the three or four hundred letters which make up the "Correspondence" of "Madame," they are still partly unpublished. No doubt, publication after publication have appeared at different times. The Literary Society of Stuttgart has published no less than seven volumes. The great historian Ranke has edited a whole volume as an appendix to his French History. But a considerable fraction of the letters are still hidden in various German private and public libraries, and we are still waiting for the enterprising editor who will give us the complete and standard edition. The extraordinary success which has recently attended the publication by the "Langewiesche Buchhandlung" of a most interesting selection from the "Correspondence"—no less than twenty-five thousand copies have been sold—testifies to the growing public interest in one of the most remarkable characters and one of the most valuable historical documents of modern times.)

III.

The young German girl, who arrived in 1672 at the Court of Versailles, at nineteen years of age, as the bride of "Monsieur" Duke of Orleans, and only brother of Louis XIV., belonged to one of the poorest but one of the most illustrious dynasties of the Empire. Her father, Charles Louis, Elector Palatine, had recovered his principality on the Peace of Westphalia in 1648. Her grandfather, the head of the Protestant Union during the Thirty Years' War, and the ephemeral and ill-fated King of Bohemia, was a descendant of William of Orange, and the husband of Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of King James I. of England. It is not generally known that, through this marriage, Mary Stuart has become the ancestress in direct line of practically every European dynasty,—of the German and Austrian Emperors, of the Kings of England, of France, Spain, Belgium, and Bulgaria. An uncle of Liselotte, Prince Rupert, had distinguished himself in the English service. Another uncle married the notorious Anna of Gonzague, the "Princess Palatine." Her Aunt Sophia was the mother of King George I. of England.

The rich valleys and vine-clad hills of the Rhine Palatinate had been left at the end of the Thirty Years' War in a frightful state of devastation. The population had reverted to barbarism and cannibalism. The political anarchy and the moral confusion were as great as the material ruin. All laws and traditions were in abeyance, and were over-ruled by the tyranny and personal caprice of petty princes. We shall find Liselotte passing merciless judgment on the manners and morals of the Court of Versailles, but the morals of the paternal Court of Heidelberg were not much better. Her father, being unable to agree with the wife whom he married in 1650, dissolved the marriage on his own authority in 1658, and, having the supreme control of the Church as well as of the State, he forced his subjects to recognise his bigamous union with Louise von Degenfeldt. The Church Courts accepted the strange situation, even as Luther had sanctioned the bigamous marriage of Philip of Hesse. Poor Louise proved a most compliant and long-suffering wife, and she bore her lord fourteen children. For many years the two wives lived together in Heidelberg, and the little Court was the theatre of endless domestic quarrels.

It was fortunate for Liselotte that at the early age of seven she was removed from those strange family surroundings and was entrusted to the affectionate care of her Aunt Sophia of Hanover. One of her first letters, written when she was seven years of age, informs us that in 1659 she visited her grandmother, Elizabeth Stuart, who lived as an exile in Holland. The ex-Queen of Bohemia presented her grand-daughter with a little dog, with a dancing-master, and a language-master. She also made her a promise of a singing-master.

The four years spent at the Court of Hanover were the four happiest years of Liselotte's life. Until the end of her days she will revert to that blissful period, and she will retain a passionate affection, not only for her Aunt Sophia, but for all those who took part in her early education.

In 1663, her father, Charles Louis, finally succeeded in getting rid of his first wife, and in securing her removal to Cassel. Liselotte could now safely return to the paternal home, where she grew up with a numerous progeny of illegitimate step-brothers and step-sisters. It is characteristic of her good nature that she always maintained the most cordial relations with all her father's second family. Indeed, she grew to love her step-brothers better than her lawful brother, the future Elector Palatine.

IV.

Life at the Court of Heidelberg was a queer mixture of dullness and pomposity, of pride and poverty, of freedom and tyranny. Charles Louis was a martinet, and a pedant, thrifty and stingy, indulgent to himself, implacably severe to his children and to his subjects. Being a good manager, he soon succeeded in restoring the prosperity of his country; but his political position remained difficult and precarious between the German Emperor, who was his nominal sovereign, and the King of France, who possessed the controlling power in the German Federation. Every means was deemed legitimate by Louis XIV. to increase his influence. He did with the German Courts what he had done so successfully at the Court of Charles II. He used in turn the intrigues of his diplomacy, the power of money, and the fascination of beauty. Pensions were lavished on impoverished princes. French mistresses and French dancing-masters were freely sent and exploited for political purposes.

It was the need of strengthening his political position as well as the desire to get his daughter out of the way that determined the Elector to seek a matrimonial alliance with the French Court, on the sudden death, in 1671, of Henrietta of England, wife of the Duke of Orleans.

Little did the Elector Palatine foresee that the marriage of his daughter would prove to his country, not a source of strength, but a cause of disaster, that Louis XIV. would use the claims of Liselotte as a pretext for invading her father's country, that the Palatinate would be pillaged once more by hordes of soldiers, that the Palace of Heidelberg would be burned to the ground, and that all those horrors would be perpetrated on the pretence of asserting the rights of the Duchess of Orleans. He might have been put on his guard by the very eagerness with which the German marriage was welcomed by Louis XIV. The proud King would not have been so keen to accept the proposal if he had not already harboured political designs of his own. Not only was he then bent on extending his influence in Germany, not only was he coveting, like his predecessor Francis I., the crown and sceptre of the Holy German Empire, but he was determined to use Liselotte as a pawn in the game of politics, and eventually to establish a claim to the succession of the Palatinate.

But those consequences of the German marriage were still distant and remote, hidden in the womb of Destiny. In the meantime, to all outward appearances, Elizabeth Charlotte was making a brilliant match. The marriage contract was arranged on terms the most favourable to the Elector Palatine. What was a most important matter for an avaricious Prince like the Elector, encumbered with a numerous progeny, a dowry, was not insisted on, and even the nominal sum which had been promised was only paid after many years' delay. And not only did Liselotte enter France without a dowry, she did not even receive a trousseau. It was a matter of deep humiliation to the proud young Princess that her father sent her to Saint Germain with a most inadequately supplied wardrobe. The sole condition which Louis XIV. insisted on was a change of religion, and that was more easily obtained from the Palatine Prince than an adequate provision of money. A Duchess of Orleans must needs be a Catholic. Charles Louis, although one of the leaders of the Protestant party, thought, with Henry IV., that Paris and the Palais Royal and the Palace of Saint Cloud were well worth a Mass. To save appearances, and to make matters easier for her father, poor Liselotte had to act her part in an ignoble comedy. Nothing was said in the marriage contract about a change of religion, and she was supposed to be converted of her own free will. It was arranged that on her arrival in France a letter was to be dictated to her, in which she was to announce to the Elector her voluntary conversion. Her father was to send in reply a letter expressing his righteous indignation at his daughter's apostasy from the true Protestant faith. . . .

After all, we need not wonder at Liselotte's strange conversion. It was only an application of the old Lutheran principle adopted from the very beginning of the Reformation:—"Cujus regio, illius religio." Religious allegiance followed political allegiance, and spiritual interests were subordinated to reasons of State.

V.

The husband to whom the simple German girl was married had a most detestable reputation. Public rumour accused him of having poisoned his first wife, Henrietta of England, whose sudden death has been immortalised in the "Oraison funebre" of Bossuet. "Madame se meurt! Madame est morte!" And although that accusation has been disproved, the evil repute of "Monsieur" was otherwise amply deserved. All spirit and manliness had been crushed out of him by Cardinal Mazarin. The younger brothers of the French Kings had often given trouble in previous generations. In recent times Gaston of Orleans had been one of the leaders of the Civil War. Mazarin, therefore, had been above all careful to make "Monsieur" a harmless fool and a compliant tool of his elder brother. He had only succeeded too well.

"Phillipe, Duke of Orleans," says Saint Simon, "was a little round man, who seemed mounted on stilts, so high were his heels. Always decked out like a woman, covered with rings, bracelets, with jewels everywhere, and a long wig brought forward and powdered, with ribbons wherever they could be placed, highly perfumed and in all things scrupulously clean, he was accused of putting on a very little rouge. The nose was very long, his eyes and mouth fine, the face full, but long."

"Madame" herself points out the striking contrast between the Duke of Orleans and Louis XIV., entirely to the disadvantage of her husband. "One would never have taken the King and 'Monsieur' for two brothers. The King was tall, whilst My Lord was short. He had purely effeminate inclinations, was fond of dress, was careful of his complexion, loved every kind of female occupation and ceremony. The King was quite the opposite. He did not care for dress. He had only manly tastes. He was fond of shooting, and liked to talk about war. 'Monsieur' behaved well on the battlefield, but he did not care to talk about military matters. 'Monsieur' loved to have ladies as play-mates, and delighted in their company. The King preferred to see ladies more privately, and not in all honour like 'Monsieur.'"

(To be continued.)

MRS. SIDNEY WEBB * * * BY C. M. LLOYD

"THE world," says Emerson, "belongs to the energetic man. His will gives him new eyes. He sees expedients and means where we saw none." No living person better proves the truth of that dictum than Mrs. Sidney Webb. The quality of supreme energy is in all her activities; it is the keynote of her character. It comes out whether she is at play or at work—striding furiously over Alpine passes or plotting in her study the details of some social reform. Nay, it comes out, one may almost say, when she is at rest, for she wakes every morning between four and five o'clock, and, while ordinary mortals are lapped in unconsciousness, this superhuman woman has her brain at work upon some lecture campaign, the outline of a pamphlet, or the founding of a weekly review.

But there are two other things to be said about Mrs. Webb's energy. The first is that, for the practical purposes to which it is devoted, it is literally doubled by her marriage. For twenty years she has done all her work, written her books, organised her campaigns, side by side with a husband who is as active and tireless as herself. To such a combination, twin wills ever acquiring "new eyes," ever "seeing expedients and means," an astute political opponent has with some justice given the title of "the most dangerous pair of Socialists in England." The second thing is that Mrs. Webb has in a remarkable degree the power of communicating her energy to others. She is not only constantly at work herself; she impels all around her to work. Her mere presence at a committee banishes slackness; even at dinner with her one is stimulated to eat faster! As to that, indeed, rapid eating is a lesson soon learned by her friends, for she herself is pitilessly abstinent, and regards a meal as, so to speak, a regrettable necessity. Many an unwary one has been hurried off reluctant from the cheerful board to what he thinks an untimely renewal of violent mental activity.

Her disciples, those whom she inspires to work and scheme with her, are won and held by no feminine arts of cajolery (for in truth her temperament and her intellect are far more a man's than a woman's); it is some subtle yet intensely rational influence in her that compels not simply admiration but imitation. It is partly perhaps that her own belief in her work is infectious. This belief is boundless, as also is her pleasure in it (she will sometimes laugh at it gleefully like a child, in sheer joy of the thing), and undoubtedly many who see and hear her are stirred by her dazzling, optimistic faith.

* * * *

If this natural energy is the driving force in the woman, it is her other quality of thoroughness which gives the finish and the solid value to her work, which inspires those who help in it, and those who look on at it alike, with so great a sense of confidence. You may not agree with her aims, you may not admire her achievements, but you cannot deny that all is well done, accurate, thorough. She does not build her social theories on vague generalisations. The contributions of the Webbs to sociology—The History of Trade Unionism, Industrial Democracy, English Poor Law Policy, English Local Government—and the rest—are all monuments of patient research. The Poor Law Commission, of which Mrs. Webb was a member, based its momentous report on such exhaustive investigations as no Royal Commission had ever made before, investigations pushed into every nook and cranny of the kingdom.

How far this passion for thoroughness is inborn in any individual, and how far a product of training, is a matter for speculation. Mrs. Webb, at least, is one whose early circumstances and upbringing fortified her against all vague or slovenly modes of thought. The daughter and close companion of Richard Potter, a great capitalist entrepreneur of his day, at one time chairman of the Great Western Railway, and afterwards president of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, she found herself in constant touch with captains of industry, business organisers, high financiers—men who built their industry and their finance on hard facts and the accurate and detailed knowledge of facts. As the friend and favourite pupil of Herbert Spencer, she served an apprenticeship to philosophy under a master who, whatever his faults, certainly did not construct his systems on an absence of data. But, even so, Beatrice Potter was not content merely to read and listen, and it was the determination to have some first-hand knowledge which led her, more than twenty years ago (in the days when such things were less fashionable than now), to go down to live and work as a seamstress in the sweating dens of East London.

An ingenious journalist, in describing a public meeting addressed by her a year or two ago, asserted that Mrs. Webb's secret lay in her commanding nose, the nose of a Cæsar. Others have compared her to Napoleon in her ruthless energy, her capacity for command, and even her disdain of the pleasures of the table. But whatever characteristics she may possess in common with those masters of the world, she is certainly unlike them in her attitude towards herself. She is utterly devoid of egotism. Even her enemies admit that she is supremely disinterested. Neither she nor her husband ever sought power for its own sake, still less for the sake of any material gain. They could say, indeed, as Napoleon said, looking back on his life, "I had the taste for foundation, not the taste for property." But they could not finish the sentence, as Napoleon did, by saying, "My property consisted in glory and celebrity"; they would have to say, "My property consisted in devotion to the public service." It is this selflessness, joined with a clear and peculiarly un sentimental mind, that makes Mrs. Webb seem a little cold, almost a little inhuman. She has a Japanese readiness to spend her whole self dispassionately (and to demand a like sacrifice from others) for her ideal of the Common Good.

* * * *

There are Social Reformers who love to picture the world as a May-day of merriment, with "cakes and ale" for all, with no policemen and not too much government. They quarrel with Mrs. Webb because she exalts Efficiency and forgets Freedom. But she would answer that she does not forget freedom; only that, without such an organisation of society as will make for a far higher efficiency, both collective and individual, you will not have real freedom, but a dishevelled anarchy. Her aim is to make of the State a great and finely-adjusted engine for achieving the purposes of civilisation, of humanity, or, if you will, of God.

THE index to the first volume of EVERYMAN is now ready, and will be sent post free to any reader on application, accompanied by 4d. in stamps. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 8d.; also Vol. I. of EVERYMAN, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d., carriage paid 4s. Those desirous of obtaining the above should write AT ONCE to the EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C., as numerous applications have already been received.

THE REAL NAPOLEON ❦❦ BY CHARLES SAROLEA

PART II.

It is especially in his relations to his mother, his brothers and sisters that Napoleon's character reveals itself. A great deal of irrelevant nonsense has been written about his "Corsican clannishness." It would be more correct to say that he had a Frenchman's sense of what is due to the family. In this respect his letters of 1795 and 1796 are most interesting reading. When he is appointed to the command of Paris, and when his financial difficulties are at an end, his first thought is for those who are near and dear to him. The following extracts from his correspondence, which I take from Mr. Levy's volume, are just the kind of notes which one would expect from an exemplary French bourgeois.

He writes, on October 18th, 1795: "A certain citizen, Billon, who, I am told, is known to you, wishes to marry Paulette; that citizen is without means. I have written to mamma that she must not think of it. I shall make fuller inquiries to-day."

On November 1st: "Lucien is War Commissioner of the army of the Rhine. Louis is staying with me. I think he is writing to you.

"Farewell, my dear friend. Give my love to your wife and Désirée."

On November 9th: "The family are in need of nothing. I have sent them money, bank-notes, etc."

On November 17th: "It is just possible that I may get the family to come. Give me a more detailed account of your doings and of those of your wife and Eugénie. The only hardship I feel is that you are far from here and I am deprived of your company."

December 31st: "You ought to have no uneasiness whatever about the family. They are abundantly provided with everything. Jérôme arrived yesterday with a general (Augereau). I am going to enrol him in a college, where he will be well looked after."

He was a model son, although he never was a favourite with his mother, although she often took his brothers' side, although she never believed in him as the humblest of his soldiers did believe in his star, although even at the Imperial Court she went on saving money against the catastrophe which she was always anticipating. On his father's death—he died prematurely, like Napoleon himself, from the hereditary disease, cancer of the stomach—he was the providence of his relatives. As a young man of nineteen he supported his younger brother Lucien on his meagre lieutenant's pay, and he imposed upon himself the hardest privations.

He not only looked after the material interests of his sisters, trying to establish them in life, but almost before he attained his majority he had assumed full responsibility as head of the family. He showed infinite patience to the vagaries of his sisters, to the absurd demands of his brothers; and he used to say that he had more trouble in ruling his relations than in ruling his Empire. His sisters claimed all the privileges of members of the Imperial family, without accepting any duties or restraints. Pauline behaved like a courtesan, and she shocked even immoral Italy with the scandal of her extravagant amours. His brothers claimed the thrones of Europe as their due inheritance, and at the same time they pretended to govern without any regard to the policy of the Empire.

It may be objected that although Napoleon may have been exemplary in the narrow circle of the family, it is not proved thereby that he was bound by the rules of ordinary human morality. After all, even monsters like Fouché, Napoleon's Minister of Police, who, as a Terrorist, sent thousands to the guillotine, are often found to practise the domestic virtues. The simple answer to this objection is that Napoleon's obedience to moral rule was not confined to the narrow circle of the home, but that in every other sphere he revealed the commonplace, human characteristics. He was equally admirable as a student at college, as a friend, and as a citizen.

To confine ourselves only to two of the elemental virtues, he was supremely generous and magnanimous, and he was unflinchingly honest. He never forgot a benefit conferred, and in his last will, written on the rock of St. Helena, he remembered acts of kindness received in his early years. He again and again forgot and forgave injuries, and he possessed none of the Corsican's traditional vindictiveness. It was this very generosity which probably proved ultimately fatal to him, which was the cause of his imprisonment and induced him to surrender to the English. Being magnanimous himself, he assumed magnanimity in his enemies. But perhaps the most startling quality in young Bonaparte is his almost superhuman honesty. In Italy, when everybody was grabbing round him, he alone kept his hands clean. His financial integrity during the Italian campaign in 1796 and 1797 is truly heroic. He was in supreme command of the Army. He had been given absolute political and diplomatic power. Hundreds of millions of francs passed through his hands. In Paris, Barras and Fouché were amassing huge fortunes. In Italy every general was guilty of extortion and speculation with the connivance of authority. Napoleon alone would not demean himself, and would not accept any "commissions" or perquisites. He remained rigidly honest, and returned to Paris a poor man. His schemes nearly failed for want of money at the crisis of his career, at a time when every political support had to be bought. Bonaparte may have thought that, after all, honesty was the best policy. He may have remembered that part of the strength of Robespierre was his incorruptibility. But this does not in the slightest degree detract from the credit which is due to his magnificent integrity.

The reader may well ask how it is that this interpretation of Napoleon's personality is so generally ignored, and why even his admirers so entirely overlook the "bourgeois" side of his character. The simple explanation is that there are two Napoleons, and there is little in common between them. There is the young general and First Magistrate of the Republic, and there is the Emperor. There is the hero who achieved greatness, and there is the ruler who was corrupted by greatness. The character of Bonaparte was very soon destroyed and transformed by the necessities of statecraft, and still more by the use and abuse of despotism, by the poisonous atmosphere of servility and flattery. But surely the true character of the man is his original character. Surely when we want to describe the constitution of an individual we do not take it after it has been ruined by disease; we take it in its strength and power. Similarly, if we want to know the real Napoleon, we must study him in his radiant youth, in the epic years of Italy and Egypt, as he appeared to a dazzled world, the conqueror of Italy, the champion of the Revolution, the restorer of order and liberty. The true Napoleon is the slim, nervous, haggard soldier of 1796, the young man who saved France, not the obese and self-indulgent despot who oppressed Europe.

CONSIDERATIONS TOUCHING OUR FUTURE STATE. BY MAURICE MAETERLINCK

From his volume, "La Morte" (Fasquelle). By permission of the Author

THE SURVIVAL OF CONSCIOUSNESS.

HOW is the fact to be explained that upon this consciousness which is to live on after us the eternity which precedes our birth has left no trace? Had we no consciousness in that eternity, or did we lose it when our life on earth began; and was that catastrophe which causes all the terror death has for us brought about at the moment of our birth? We cannot refuse to admit that that eternity claims the same rights over us as the eternity which follows our decease. We are children of the first as of the second, and of necessity we participate in both. If you maintain that you will exist to all eternity you must admit that you have existed from all eternity; it is impossible to conceive the one without being forced to conceive the other. If nothing has an end, nothing has a beginning, seeing that this beginning would be the end of something. Now, although I have existed from all eternity, I have no consciousness of my previous existence, while I must bear with me through the boundless space of ages without end the infinitesimal consciousness acquired during the moment of time which elapses between my birth and my death. My real ego, which is henceforth to be eternal, would then only date from my short sojourn on this earth. And the whole of the previous eternity, which has exactly the same value as the eternity to come, since they are identical, would be of no account, and be cast into the void! Whence comes the peculiar privilege granted to a few insignificant days on a planet of no importance?

OUR POSITION AS REGARDS THESE ETERNITIES.

In their number and magnitude mysteries are as boundless as the Universe. If man should one day draw near those mysteries which seem to him now the greatest and most inaccessible, as, for instance, the origin and purpose of life, behind them, like everlasting mountains, he would at once see others rising as great and as insurmountable; and so on indefinitely. As regards the knowledge needful for the holding of the key to the Universe, he would always find himself at the same point of central ignorance. mind infinitely vaster and more penetrating than we do. Everything that its miraculously increased power discovered would meet with barriers no less impassable than the present ones. All is boundless in that which has no bounds. We shall be for ever prisoners of eternity.

Let us make a final survey of the ground we have covered. We have put aside both the religious solutions of the question and the theory of total annihilation. Annihilation is impossible from the material point of view; religious solutions occupy a doorless and windowless stronghold impenetrable to human reason.

Next there is the hypothesis of the survival of the ego, freed from the body, yet preserving full and perfect consciousness of its own identity. We have seen that this hypothesis, if we keep within its narrowest limits, has only a slight element of probability and a doubtful amount of desirability, although the fact that it discards the body, source of all our ills, makes the state of existence which it conceives seem less to be feared than our present one. On the other hand, the moment we attempt to extend or enlarge it, so that it may seem less barbarous or less primitive, we get back to the hypothesis of universal consciousness or of modified consciousness, which, together with that of continued existence without any form of consciousness, precludes all further supposition, and exhausts the possible forecasts of the imagination.

Continued existence without any form of consciousness would be the same thing for us as annihilation pure and simple, and therefore would be no more to be feared than the latter, that is to say, than a dreamless sleep which would know no awakening. The hypothesis is undeniably more acceptable than that of annihilation, but it prematurely and very daringly disposes of the questions of universal consciousness and modified consciousness.

The question is to know how we are going to regard eternity. Is it an unchanging and unchangeable eternity, perfect and at its zenith from everlasting, and is it a purposeless Universe which our reason is to conceive when the utmost bound of thought has been reached? Do we believe that at our death the illusion of movement and progress which we behold from the remote depths of this life of ours will suddenly fade away? If so, it becomes inevitable that the moment we breathe our last we shall be absorbed into what, for lack of a better expression, we call the universal consciousness.

Or, on the other hand, do we think that death will show us that the illusion is not that of the senses but of the reason, and that in an undeniably living world, in spite of our prenatal eternity, we have not undergone every kind of experience; that is to say, that movement and evolution still continue, and will never and nowhere cease? In that case we must perforce admit the hypothesis of modified or progressive consciousness. Both these views are fundamentally and equally unintelligible, but yet tenable, and, although irreconcilable, they agree in this one point—that endless pain and hopeless misery are equally and everlastingly excluded from each.

The hypothesis of modified consciousness does not entail the loss of the small amount of consciousness almost negligible, it absorbs it, sinks it, and solves it in eternity. It is naturally impossible to support this hypothesis with satisfactory proofs; but it is not easy to demolish it like the preceding ones. If it is allowable to speak of the probably true, when the only truth we know is that we cannot see the truth, this is the most probably true of the provisional hypotheses, and gives magnificent openings for the most plausible, varied and seductive dreams. Will this ego of ours, or soul, or mind, or whatever name we give to the thing which is to survive us and yet to remain ourself, regain on leaving our body the innumerable lives it must have lived since the aeons which had no beginning? Will it go on growing and assimilating all it will come into touch with in eternity during the aeons which will have no end? Will it linger for some time about our earth, leading in regions invisible to our eyes a more and more noble and happy life, as theosophists and spiritualists maintain? Or will it go on to other planetary systems, emigrate to other worlds of which our senses do not even suspect the existence?

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

"THE ORDEAL OF RICHARD FEVEREL," BY GEORGE MEREDITH

THIS masterpiece of Meredith's is pre-eminently an epic of youth. The freshness, the audacity, the unconquerable courage of life's springtime bloom in the pages of "Richard Feverel." The hero has all the frankness and a touch of the healthy egotism of the British youth. He captures one from the start with his love of adventure, sudden outbursts of high spirit; above all, his capacity for friendship. Meredith shares with Dickens the rare capacity for reading a boy's secret wishes, understanding the desires and ambitions of his heart. It has been said that the Richard of later years fulfilled none of the promise of his schooldays, and that, like David Copperfield, the man shows no trace of the boy. Something of this we feel when, after Richard's marriage with Lucy, in defiance of his father's commands, he falls back on a policy of procrastination utterly at variance with the headstrong fervour characteristic of his boyish escapades, and of the unembarrassed candour with which he confesses to them.

It will be remembered that Richard was the victim of a system. His father, Sir Austin, believed in reducing everything to the level of a formula. He wished his boy early to learn life's lessons, and to read into them the finality of a proposition of Euclid. He leaves out the accident of emotion, however, and his schemes for the apotheosis of his son are upset by Dick's meeting with the daughter of a farmer, and, of Meredith's many brilliant women, the one that stands out as the most convincing and appealing is Lucy Feverel, as fresh and fragrant a creature as ever was created.

With a sublime acceptance of his genius, Meredith flings down a challenge in the title of the chapter dedicated to the lovers' first encounter. He calls this "Ferdinand and Miranda," and never since the love scenes in "The Tempest" has anything more exquisite been written. The flush of ecstasy touches the words with rose, and as we read we hear the lark singing in the blue of the middle heaven, and the reeds by the water side quiver in the breeze.

"The youth looked on her with a glowing eye. It was the First Woman to him.

"And she—mankind was all Caliban to her, saying
"So to each other said their changing eyes in the moment they stood together; he pale, and she blushing.

"She was, indeed, sweetly fair, and would have been held fair among rival damsels. On a magic shore, and to a youth educated by a system, strung like an arrow drawn to the head, he, it might be guessed, could fly fast and far with her. . . . The wide summer hat, nodding over her forehead to her brows, seemed to flow with the flowing heavy curls, and those fire-threaded, mellow curls, only half curls, waves of hair call them, rippling at the ends, went like a sunny, red-veined torrent down her back almost to her waist: a glorious vision to the youth, who embraced it as a flower of beauty and read not a feature. . . . Forward and back love's electric messenger rushed from heart to heart, knocking at each till it surged tumultuously against the bars of its prison, crying out for its mate. They stood trembling in unison, a lovely couple unto these fair heavens of the morning."

From this exquisite duet it is but a step to the declaration of their passion. There follows a clandestine marriage. Sir Austin is impossible and implacable. Richard feels that now, if ever, he should justify his father's system—the system that prepared him to judge things by their internal worth rather than their face value. And Lucy, for all she is a farmer's daughter, possesses a radiant spirit, an exquisite serenity of soul, in keeping with her fragrant beauty.

And on the marriage ensues the tragedy. Two young things launched in a great adventure, the husband feels his responsibility to his wife pull against his duty to his father. Sir Austin, with his diabolical system that seeks to reduce human nature to the level of a science, will only pardon his son on conditions. And the terms he makes is that Richard must consent to pass through a period of probation before he can earn forgiveness. He is to leave his young wife, part from the woman he loves with the strongest fibres of his nature, until such time as it shall please the "scientific humanist" to permit their reunion.

At first Richard flatly refuses the command. Lucy, under the counsel of Cousin Adrian, "the wise youth" who fulfils the function of an epigrammatic Greek chorus throughout the story, weakens his resolve. The exquisite art of Meredith is nowhere better shown than in the confidences between the young girl and the man of the world. She falls an easy prey to his suggestion, forms a passionate determination to justify Richard's choice in Sir Austin's eyes, and uses all her influence to send her husband from her.

And this brings us to the second act. Richard consents to go, and sets the seal of weakness on his character. The chapters dealing with his subsequent life in London are as fresh and as true as if they were written yesterday. Richard's opinions of men and things, the women he encounters, the experiences he meets, are told with a brilliancy of style that sets the novel on a pinnacle of artistic achievement.

Lack of space prevents our touching, save in the briefest fashion, on the daring episode between Richard and the woman whom Mrs. Berry—most imitable of landladies—calls "Belladonna." The name describes her; she is one of those feline creatures that are born to prey upon the vanity of ~~sore for his wife, sick in spirit with disappointment and disillusion, surrenders to the woman's charms.~~

The culmination of the scene that leads up to Richard's downfall is rendered with a force that sweeps everything before it.

"As he looked down on her ~~beauty~~ not divine sorrow but a devouring jealousy sprang like fire in his breast, and set him rocking with horrid pain. He went closer to her pale, beseeching face. Her eyes drew him down. . . .

"Lost, Richard! Lost for ever! Give me up!"

"He cried: 'I never will!' and strained her in his arms, and kissed her passionately on the lips. . . .

"Not a word of love between them!"

"Was ever hero in this fashion won?"

The Belladonna was acting under the directions of a nobleman, by name Mountfalcon, and one of her friends.

My lord, meeting Lucy in the Isle of Wight, loses his head over her beauty, and later, to do him credit, feels for her a real emotion and respect. Finding

(Continued on page 110.)

KENSINGTON COLLEGE.

DIRECTOR'S TWENTY-SIXTH EASTER REPORT.

Five applications for the services of each qualified Student.

RAPIDLY GROWING DEMAND FOR LADY SECRETARIES.

Commercial Careers for 'Varsity and Public School Men.

We have been favoured by a copy of this interesting document, from which we learn that the past year has been by far the most prosperous in the history of the College. The unique distinctions of the Gold Medal and the Diploma of Honour for Secretarial and Commercial Training, awarded by the Jury of the Festival of Empire, 1911, to Kensington College, have now been duplicated by the Manchester Winter Exhibition, 1912-13.

During the first two months of term, an overwhelming number of applications was received for the services of Kensington College Graduates. Owing to the supply being unequal to the demand, it was only possible to partially satisfy it. Applications were for Resident Private Secretaries, some from Peeresses, one from an eminent Professor, other inquiries were from Clubs, Hospitals, well-known Journalists and Authors, and several from important City Companies.

In order to cope with the demand, it has been necessary to advertise again in the public Press, inviting applications from ex-Students of the College desirous of improving their position, but, from their point of view, it is doubtless satisfactory to be able to state that practically no response has been received; in fact, there is every reason to believe that not a single Graduate of Kensington College is unemployed, and further, that they have no wish to change their present satisfactory appointments.

During recent years several Students have been sent from College to positions in England and abroad, some even as far away as Japan, where Kensington College Students have started an English Ladies' Club.

The question of Commercial Careers for 'Varsity and Public School men is now engaging public attention. The College has during Term been successful in securing for a 'Varsity man an introduction to an important position at a commencing salary of £150, leading up to an Assistant Directorship at a salary of £500 and upwards.

Kensington College is described by Sir Samuel Evans as "a progressive Institution." We may venture to go further and style it an educational force that is probably doing more for the progress of English Commerce to-day than we can anticipate from armaments. Practical training for the practical duties of life is the keynote of all work at this powerful institution. So great is the demand for the services of its graduates that during the last twenty-six years—in fact, ever since it was established—every qualified student has had a choice of at least half a dozen dignified and remunerative appointments from which to select a congenial career; a striking testimony to the efficiency of the College training. The result of a recent investigation by the College Accountant shows that the applications from employers for the services of the College Graduates exceeded the number of candidates available in the proportion of one hundred to fifteen. In other words, fifteen students had a choice of no fewer than one hundred appointments between them.

A College with such a record commands the most serious consideration of everyone, and a knowledge of the secret of its success is a valuable asset to all who are interested in the future of England's sons and daughters. The utterances of eminent men assist us to probe that secret. The Earl of Lytton, when the full facts about the College were before him, found expression for his surprise in the phrase, "Have every hope all ye who enter here," an antithetical variation of Dante's famous inscription. Lord Lytton's words have been adopted as the motto of the College. A Knight of the Legion of Honour and an ex-President of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris, when opening Winter Term recently, said, "As an Institution for the training of our future business men and women Kensington College stands first and foremost." Comment upon such pronouncements is superfluous; facts about the Institution which inspired them are more interesting and of greater value.

Kensington College was established twenty-six years ago, and during the last few years it has been located a short distance west of Paddington Station, at the corner of Gloucester Terrace and Bishop's Road, one of the most fashionable and healthy parts of the Metropolis. These premises, opened by Her Grace Katharine Duchess of Westminster, stand in their own grounds, every window faces trees or commands a view of beautiful gardens—an ideal situation for study. Modern languages hold a leading place among the subjects taught. Gratifying successes at the Examinations of the London Chamber of Commerce, the Royal Society of Arts, and other public bodies, testify to the thoroughness of the training in all departments of the curriculum.

The College watches over students' careers after they have left the Institution, assisting them to new appointments when necessary.

The Director is ever ready to give his advice on the subject of a suitable career for boy or girl personally or by post.

A card addressed to Miss E. V. Munford, Secretary, Kensington College, 34, Gloucester Gardens, London, W., will bring by return of post an Easter Report, an Illustrated Prospectus containing full particulars of the Guaranteed Appointment System, and an Illustrated Souvenir of the 21st anniversary, similar to those graciously accepted by Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, and Her Royal Highness Princess Louise Duchess of Argyll.

Students are now being enrolled for next term in order of receipt of their application.

Candidates desirous of Training under the only Gold Medal system extant, for a variety of appointments from which to select a congenial career, should write at once for Illustrated Prospectus and Souvenir, post free.

Mr. J. V. MUNFORD, F.R.C.I., M.R.S.A., Director,

Tel. No.: Pad. 4348.

34, Gloucester Gardens (Corner of Bishop's Road), Hyde Park, W.

Richard has left his wife, he designs to capture her for himself, and instructs the Belladonna to make Richard her own. But the latter makes the mistake of caring for Dick too much to ruin him; she refuses to establish permanent relations between them, and discreetly disappears. Richard, half mad with misery and remorse, is free to return to his wife and child; for by this time Sir Austin has been ameliorated by the advent of a thoroughly human and undoubtedly scientific grandson.

And then comes the final step in the tragedy. Belladonna tells Richard the part Lord Mountfalcon played, and Richard vows he shall pay for it. He will fight a duel and wipe out the insult by an appeal to arms.

On the eve of his departure to meet Mountfalcon on the Continent, he comes home—home to the wife he has forsaken, the child he has never seen. And the meeting between the man and woman is one of the most wonderful scenes ever written.

"Lucy, do you know why I came to you to-night?"

"She moved her lips, repeating his words.

"Lucy, have you guessed why I did not come before? . . . I did not come because I was not worthy of my wife! Do you understand?"

"Darling!" she faltered plaintively, . . . "what have I done to make you angry with me?"

"O beloved!" cried he, the tears bursting out of his eyes.

"O beloved!" was all he could say, kissing her hands passionately. . . .

"But you love me? Richard! my husband! you love me?"

He answers the appeal in broken words and tremulous caresses, and then, driven on by the whips of remorse and self-scorn, torn by the conflicting emotions of love and revenge, he tells her he must leave her and the child; and the faithful Berry, who has followed Lucy with devotion ever since her marriage, discovers the poor young mother sitting on the floor, senseless, her child in her lap.

The conclusion of the book cuts to the very quick of the soul. It is exquisitely painful to read, and arouses a passion of regret that in itself is a tribute to the genius of the man who could conceive it. Richard avenges his honour, fights his duel, is dangerously wounded, and is brought back to England raving in delirium. For a time the reader fears Richard will pass from his ordeal to death. But a worse fate remains for him; and the climax comes with a force of a personal loss upon the reader.

It is Lucy who dies. And the description of her end whips smarting tears to the eyes and brings a surge of pity and regret to the heart.

"Her last hold of reason was a thought for Richard. . . . Had she seen her husband a day or two before—but no, there was a new system to interdict that, or had she not so violently controlled her nature as she did, I believe she might have been saved. . . . Her cries at one time were dreadfully loud. She screamed that she was 'drowning in fire,' and that her husband would not come to save her. We deadened the sound as much as we could, but it was impossible to prevent Richard from hearing. . . . Whenever she called, he answered. You could not hear them without weeping."

"Have you noticed the expression in the eyes of blind men? That is just how Richard looks, as he lies there silent in his bed, striving to image her on his brain."

We feel, as we close the book, that for Richard life's ordeal has but just commenced.

SEX AND THE DRAMA

A REPLY

By D. E. OLIVER

THE appeal to history upon this subject in a recent issue of EVERYMAN by Arthur Owen Orrett—evoked in some measure by my book concerning "The English Stage," which he honours me by quoting—proves, albeit most wittily, little beyond the simple fact that dramatists from Æschylus to Galsworthy have, more or less in accordance with the conventions of their day, written about the eternal theme of vice and virtue in sexual relationships. Most folks agree that ethical standards change with changing time. The ideals of to-day may become the realities of to-morrow. The moral code of fifty years hence will, in all probability, differ considerably from that of 1913. Compare, for example, the recommendations set forth in the Majority Report of the recent Divorce Commission with those outlined in the Minority Report.

"Is there any future for the sexless drama?" writes Mr. Orrett. Obviously not. Some relationship between the sexes, individual or collective, actual or implied, must of necessity be a factor of greater or less importance in every play. However, to do Mr. Orrett justice, he makes his position clear enough when he asks if there is "no room for plays of which the mainspring is ambition, or political upheaval, or financial crisis, or social wrong and economic helplessness?" To this I reply, "Aye! room enough and to spare."

Shaw, Galsworthy, and Barker may fairly be considered the pioneers, as far as this country is concerned, of a new dramatic movement, and they certainly deal, upon the whole, with real problems, both social and economic, in as sincere, searching, and sympathetic a manner as stage convention and a ridiculous censorship allow. It is beside the question for Mr. Orrett to twit me with the fact that in "The Eldest Son" Galsworthy departs from the standard subject of "The Silver Box," "Strife," and "Justice," because these very sex problems—or shall we say with him "sex-obsessions"?—are so closely interwoven with the texture of modern society, and can be unravelled only so far as we are prepared to change existing conditions, or, in other words, to attack the root of our social evils.

When I wrote that the Victorian dramatists were content with eternally ringing the changes upon the theme of wife, husband, and the other fellow, the usual gamut of sex-dramas, or the copybook sentiment of the "teacup and saucer" school, I was not so much concerned as to the virility or utility of sex-drama so called, but rather more keenly intent upon proving the utter unreality of it all.

"The great dramatist," says Shaw, "has something better to do than amuse either himself or his audience. He has to interpret life." It is common knowledge that Shakespeare promulgated the same truth when he wrote his famous vade mecum for players. Now, to hold the mirror up to nature, or to concern themselves with the verities or realities of life, was the last thing that entered the minds of our mid-Victorian makers of "sausage-drama" (I congratulate Mr. Orrett—verily a good and happy phrase), or even that of the latter Victorians, whose aim was primarily to be "theatrical." Rarely, save by accident, were they at all natural. They studied stage exigencies rather than attempted delineations of real life.

In considering, therefore, the question so ably raised by Mr. Orrett, it is important to remember that no objection on the part of any earnest social reformer is offered to plays dealing with licit or illicit sexual relationship, always provided the problem is tackled in sincerity and truth.

Musical comedy, in common with the Restoration drama, treats the matter of irregular sexual relations as a huge joke. Pinero dramatises sex questions seriously enough at times, but rarely, as Mr. Orrett truly remarks, goes to the kernel. Shaw, on the other hand, under the cover of brilliant dialogue and penetrating witticism, probes deep down to the seat of disorders, showing men and women to be, more often than otherwise, the victims of a vicious environment which is the natural sequel of society as at present constituted.

I am not sure that I quite agree with Mr. Orrett in regarding "Candida" as a better play than "Widowers' Houses"; but, even so, the main point which the dramatist wishes to urge is the iniquity of our denial to woman of that political equality with man which more than any other cause keeps her in economic bondage to him, and compels her in very sooth to make marriage a trade.

What, then, is the cause of that sexual looseness which keeps the divorce and coroners' courts busy, and incidentally provides the usual stock-in-trade of the average "commercial" playwright, who, doubtless with Mr. Orrett, regards the sex-motive as normal in drama?

Is it not that modern capitalism breeds everywhere a class of rich drones leading aimless lives of luxury and pleasure, and who frequently seek refuge from a nauseating ennui in the stimulus of illicit or abnormal sexual connections? To support these idlers in a life of vacuous and vicious indulgence millions of men, women, and children are condemned to labour long hours for miserable pay under conditions which, in spite of much beneficent ameliorative legislation, contribute day by day to the black harvest of destitution, disease, crime, prostitution, and premature death which year by year our social system entails.

Have we a dramatist who dares tell the truth? That is the question. There are some playwrights undoubtedly prepared to do this, but two great obstacles block the way to any real advance in sincere, searching but sympathetic exploitation of social and economic difficulties as themes for the dramatist. One arises from the common acceptance of the theatre as in the main a source of mere amusement, and therefore primarily a commercial speculation; the other and, alas! more formidable barrier, which every sincere dramatist detests, is that effete and ridiculous censorship which the dull, listless apathy of a sheep-like British public alone tolerates and endures.

IN MEMORIAM: GEORGE MEREDITH

Died May 18, 1909

PROPHET of love's ideal in human kind,
 Dauntless unraveller of the twisted skein,
 You wove your web of happiness and pain
 And hope's frail thread to which we erst were blind.
 A soul undaunted, beaten by the wind,
 Ever you strove the loftier heights to gain;
 But now we name you with the illustrious slain,
 Yielding, with heads bowed down and hearts resigned,
 To this the Universal Conqueror's claim;
 Not in the pain of unattained desire,
 But in the wonder of the task complete,
 Because you taught our spirits to aspire,
 We lay this trophy humbly at your feet—
 The deathless glory of an honoured name.

HORACE SHIPP.

I advise you for that Indigestion—Flatulence—
 Acidity—to take a daily dose of

BRAGGS CHARCOAL

Do not tamper with your delicate digestive organs by seeking relief in drugs and palliatives. I know the action of drugs—know it from years of experience—and I say emphatically that you must remove the cause of indigestion before you can expect permanent relief.

Bragg's Charcoal absorbs the impurities set up in the process of digestion—effete gases and waste matter—and passes them out of the system. It has no direct action on any organ of the body. Unlike drugs, it is never assimilated—cannot harm you—and you will not find it necessary to increase the dose.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Powder, 2/- and 4/- per bottle; Biscuits, 1/-, 2/-, and 4/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box; Lozenges, 1/1½ per box.

To
J. L. BRAGG, Ltd.,
 14, Wigmore St.,
 London, W.

Please send me Samples of Bragg's Charcoal. I enclose 3d. postage.

Send this Coupon

for Samples of five different forms in which Bragg's Charcoal may be pleasantly administered.

Name

Address

EVERYMAN, May 9

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
 GIFT.

A DAINY
 AND
 LUXURY.

FOR READING.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, almost dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

THE SPIDER * * *

BY ANDRÉ THEURIET

DID you ever notice in autumn, when the trellises are festooned with ripe grapes and the leaves on the bushes are turning red, large, delicate spiderwebs, whose design is both perfectly geometrical and also artistic, frail, transparent traceries like the finest of lace, strung with dewdrops like the tiniest of pearls and lasting barely for a day? These elaborate, diaphanous embroideries, to which the peasants near me give the beautiful name of arantèles, are the work of an industrious spider which has a plump, round body adorned with a pale gold cross and bears the scientific name of épeire diadème. This spider has a perfect passion for work, and her manners are so original as perpetually to pique my curiosity. I say "her" manners, because it is the female of this species of arachnida that plays the most interesting part; she alone is the spinner, and works from dawn to dark to earn her living by the sword. The male is merely a thin, slender insect, who spends his brief existence in wandering about on the edges of the webs, timidly making proffer of his services as a husband, and often risking his skin in this perilous profession. When he makes his awkward advances on the web spun by the lady of the house he cautiously shakes one of her threads as an announcement of his presence and then retires precipitately if he perceives that the spinster is too much absorbed in her industry to be in the mood for gallantries. When, by chance, the lady is willing and the ardent swain finds that his hour has come, she condescends to receive him, and they become a happy pair on the spot. Their love-making is short and there is no lingering over it. The moment it is accomplished, the lady, who looks on every minute as precious, considers her lover a thing of no value and brutally turns him out. But, on the other hand, if he has arrived at the wrong moment, and persists with a foolish obstinacy, woe betide him! In the twinkling of an eye she seizes him bodily and winds a network of her threads around him, and the would-be lover is devoured on the spot by the scornful and ruthless amazon.

Two years ago I came early to the Riviera, and I was living in a villa halfway up the hill between La Turbia and Rocabruna. It was the middle of October, and a great year for the diadem spiders. Their webs stretched along every road between the branches of the roses and the spiked leaves of the aloes, and I spent many a long hour watching the habits of the laborious web-spinners.

One morning I set out on foot to breakfast in Mentone, and, on my way, near the forks of the road from Monte Carlo to Rocabruna, I halted to look at an epeira busy at her work of spinning. The spider had already set up the polygonal circumference of her tracery and stretched the threads radiating to it from the centre. Now, with intense earnestness, head down and abdomen up, she was spinning the concentric circles of her network, and I was admiring the swift deftness with which she pulled out her thread, stretched it with one of her feet, and glued it firmly to each successive radius. At this moment I heard a step behind me, and a voice said, "A brave spider, monsieur, and not in the least afraid of work."

I turned round, and saw before me a man neither young nor old, tall and thin, with blue eyes having a somewhat sleepy expression in them. Long, grizzled whiskers adorned his face, which certainly might be called distinguished, but seemed faded, not to say wasted. An ulster, half-unbuttoned, disclosed that he was in evening dress, and had probably been up all night. He had the address of a gentleman, but the haggard features, the faded complexion, and a certain febrile nervousness about him betrayed an internal wastage, due to the corrosive effect of some inveterate and uncontrollable passion.

"Yes," repeated my unknown friend, lightly raising his hat, "a valiant little animal, this spider! She never is fool enough to throw the handle after the hatchet. . . . Only fancy, monsieur, that last night, starting for Monte Carlo. . . ."

He must have noticed my glance at his coat and his white tie, for he interrupted himself with the ghost of a pale smile.

"You are surprised to see me in evening dress at this hour of the morning? I have been spending the night below there, first at the 'big place' and then at the club. . . . And, to be frank with you, I'd have done better to go home!"

I was right; my unknown friend cherished in his bosom the most besetting of passions, the love of gaming. He had the nervous loquacity of the gambler, and the usual mania for holding forth to the first-comer on his good or bad luck.

"The whole night," he repeated, "I had the luck dead against me. Not one of my numbers came up. Now, yesterday evening, as I was starting, I passed by here and saw this very spider sitting in the middle of her perfect web. I don't know what possessed me, but with one wave of my stick I stupidly destroyed the frail tracery spread out there in the sunset light. . . . It brought me no luck, for, as I told you, I found my luck was clean out! . . . A regular Waterloo, what!"

He broke off to watch the insect busy over her task. "Admirable little creature!" cried he. "There she is, courageously repairing my misdeed of yesterday; she does not lose heart; she gives me a lesson. . . . I was intending to go home first and refresh myself; but I should have to endure the questionings and lamentations of my family, and that would turn the luck against me afresh. I have some louis still in my pocket, and, besides, I can always borrow from Charles, the hotel-keeper, at the Café de Paris. Would you oblige me?"

He took a pencil and card from his pocket and scribbled a few words on it; then he turned to me:

"You see that rose-coloured villa nestling among the lemon orchards? . . . That's my house. If you would kindly go up there and give the card to my servant, and say that it is from Count Paprocki. . . . That will set my wife at ease, and I can go back to roulette with a clear conscience. Au revoir, monsieur, and many thanks. . . . Ah, excuse me."

He had twisted a piece of paper into a cone, and, before I could make out what he was up to, he had deftly caught the spider in the middle of her net, popped her into it, and very carefully stowed her away in his pocket.

"That will be my mascot," said he.

He put his heels together, bowed, twirled round and started back to Monte Carlo.

All that remained for me to do was to acquit myself of the commission so oddly entrusted to me. I went up the lemon avenue and rang at the rose-coloured villa. As I handed Count Paprocki's card to the footman, I saw the curtain of a ground-floor window drawn partly aside; I had a glimpse of the pale, anxious face of a young woman; then the curtain was drawn again, and I set out once more for Mentone.

Two days later, at Monte Carlo, as I was walking in the garden in front of the Casino, I found myself again in the presence of Count Paprocki. He was coming down the Casino steps with a triumphant air. He knew me and, coming up, offered his hand.

"Thank you once more, monsieur! You see before you a man who can win all the money he wants. I was right not to lose heart, and the spider brought me luck. I have just played the maximum on zero, and zero came up twice running. These two days the luck has never left me. . . . So, in memory of this brave spider, I have had a pin made just like her."

He pointed to a pin in his scarf, the head of which was an épeire diadème, and then, with a bow, he went his way, triumphantly swinging his stick.

Twice or thrice afterwards I saw him from a distance in the gaming-rooms; then I was suddenly called away to Paris, and left La Turbia before the end of the season.

The next October saw me there again, and one morning, walking along the road to Rocabrana, I recognised the rose-coloured villa with its lemon-shaded alleys. The shutters were up and the garden seemed deserted; but what caught my eye was a new white cross of marble at the entrance to the avenue, with no inscription visible save two initials and a date.

I saw a man breaking stones beside the road, and asked him what the monument was for.

"That," answered he, "is the tomb of a count who lived in the villa there on your right. A fine fellow, monsieur, who had but one fault, he was too fond of play. And he was a little off his head. Just fancy! He couldn't see a spider when he was going to play without putting it into his pocket. He said the creatures helped him to win. All the same, he was completely ruined. One morning, on his way home, he sat down just there and coolly blew out his brains. He left his wife and children nothing but eyes to weep with. Poor lady, she had that cross put up to him, nevertheless, before they went away."

I went up to the cross. The newly cut surface of the marble sparkled in the sun, and across one of its angles on épeire diadème was weaving her web with calm deliberation. Backwards and forwards she travelled in perfect confidence. You would have sworn she knew that now she had nothing to fear from the dead gambler below, with his mad fancy for collecting spiders in the guise of mascots.—
Translated by R. B. Townshend.

THE MUSE IN EXILE*

THOSE who have stood with Mr. William Watson beside "Wordsworth's Grave," listening to the Rotha as it whispers its shy secrets to the hills, will lay down his new volume of poems with surprise and disappointment. Hitherto, Mr. Watson has brought us peace; now he brings us a sword, and he has even steeped its blade in acid. Once he led us beside still waters; now he comes, armed to the teeth, thrusting his weapons of satire and scorn, right and left, into the ranks of his readers, and routing out unfortunate critics and politicians from their citadels of assumed authority. In a word, Mr. Watson is labouring under a delusion; and, if we except a few love songs and nature poems, which breathe the familiar austerity of charm, the whole of the present volume, including the introductory essay, which has been delivered as a lecture to American audiences, lies, in unrelieved gloom, beneath its shadow.

* "The Muse in Exile." By William Watson. 3s. 6d. net. (London: Herbert Jenkins, Ltd.)

The misconception which oppresses—and, indeed, one might almost say paralyses—Mr. Watson's mind is the idea that England is on the decline through her absolute apathy towards poetry, and this, he maintains, is due to the wilful betrayal of the reviewers, who, with mutinous hands, have torn into shreds the old standards of literary criticism.

"Verse—a light handful—verse again I bring;
Verse that perhaps had glowed with lustier hues
Amid more fostering air: for it was born
In the penurious sunshine of an Age
That does not stone her prophets, but, alas,
Turns, to their next of kin, the singers, oft
An ear of stone: in bare, bleak truth an Age
That banishes the poets, as he of old,
The great child of the soul of Socrates,
Out of his visionary commonwealth
Banished them; for she drives them coldly forth
From where alone they yearn to live—her heart;
Scourges them with the scourge of apathy,
From out her bosom's rich metropolis.
To a distant, dreary province of her thoughts,
A region grey and pale."

That is the main burden both of the verse and the prose contained in this volume; and it must be admitted that it makes cheerless reading. The more one cries for the star, the more discontented is one likely to become with the earth; and we choose to think that it is the very intensity with which Mr. Watson yearns for an England where, from end to end of the land, poetry shall be duly honoured by all classes that causes him to exaggerate the present comparative indifference with which it is regarded. That it is regarded with comparative indifference no competent judge would deny; but those who have their fingers well on the pulse of the literary world can testify that the emphasis lies on the "comparative." Society has been remoulding itself to such a radical extent during the last twenty-five years that it would probably be impossible for any man of letters to loom so largely in the public eye to-day as did some of the giants of the Victorian age in their day—even had we any such giants. But it is certainly a fact that we have, at the present time, a select band of true, if not outstanding, poets, whose work never lacks quite a reasonable measure of appreciation. Mr. Watson himself has always had a loyal audience; and the names of other poets readily occur to the mind whose volumes are awaited by a considerable public with eager interest; while those who keep a weather-eye upon the literary horizon report fairer conditions ahead.

No! Things are not so bad, after all! Clouds may gather across Parnassus, as across Helvellyn; but the spirit of poetry is eternal and inextinguishable as the sun. We close this volume with the feeling that it is Mr. Watson's own muse that is in exile; and, with the gracious memory of his former work fragrant and fresh in the mind, we hope that a full flood-tide of inspiration will very quickly surge in and rescue it from the unfertile shores where it would seem for the moment to lie captive.

GILBERT THOMAS.

THE LIFE OF THE BEE

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

Translated by ALFRED SUTRO. Illustrated in Colour by E. J. DETMOLD
Special Edition on Arnold Paper. (Second Edition.)
DEMY 4to, JAPANESE VELLUM, DESIGNED COVER, 21/- NET.

M. MAETERLINCK writes: "All Detmold's plates which represent bees are real, incontestable CHEFS D'ŒUVRES, and as fine as a Rembrandt. The interiors of the hives seem works of genius."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"The feature of this sumptuous reprint is its beauty of form, and a series of lovely colour reproductions."

HOURS OF GLADNESS

EIGHT NATURE ESSAYS. By M. MAETERLINCK.

With a NEW ESSAY on "Our City Gardens."

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

With 20 full page Plates in Colour, Designed Cover and Title
Page by EDWARD J. DETMOLD.

Special Edition on Arnold Paper.

DEMY 4to, 21/- NET.

STANDARD.—"An extremely beautiful edition, and the illustrations in colour leave nothing to be desired."

ATHENÆUM.—"The technical perfection with which these drawings have been reproduced is remarkable."

THE POCKET EDITION OF MAETERLINCK'S WORKS

Fcap. 8vo. Designed Cover, Cloth, 2/6 net; leather, 3/6 net per vol.

Translated by ALFRED SUTRO.

THE BURIED TEMPLE (6th Thousand).

THE LIFE OF THE BEE (49th Thousand).

THE TREASURE OF THE HUMBLE (25th Thousand).

WISDOM AND DESTINY (23rd Thousand).

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

THE DOUBLE GARDEN (10th Thousand).

LIFE AND FLOWERS (9th Thousand).

AND FOUR VOLUMES OF PLAYS.

London: GEORGE ALLEN & CO., Ltd., 44 & 45, RATHBONE PLACE

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

To be completed in Twelve volumes.

EACH VOLUME CONTAINS 640 PAGES
AND MORE THAN 500,000 WORDS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most—the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge."

Cloth, 1s. net. Leather, 2s. net.

Please send for 8-page Prospectus.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
137, Aldine House, Bedford St., London, W.C.

LITERARY NOTES

WHAT, I wonder, is going to be the future of the Blue Review? This is a new literary monthly, the first number of which appeared on May 1st. Considering that not a few magazines (some of them old-established and ably conducted) have ceased publication during the past few years, one may be forgiven for being sceptical about new ventures of this sort. But I make an exception in the case of the Blue Review, which marks a new development in the management of English literary magazines. It will be conducted on co-operative principles. The idea is not exactly original, for certain French magazines are successfully worked on these lines. Indeed, it is this fact which has emboldened a band of young English writers to try the experiment.

* * * * *

The contributors to the Blue Review have bound themselves to write regularly for the magazine, without payment, for a period of nine months, at the end of which time a profit-sharing scheme comes into operation. Under this scheme all the profits, after the deduction of working expenses, will be divided among the contributors. Of course, it does not necessarily follow that what has succeeded in France will succeed here, but, on the whole, I am inclined to be optimistic, more especially as the Blue Review has made an excellent start.

* * * * *

My recent paragraph on Dr. Russel Wallace's literary performance at the age of ninety has brought me a letter calling attention to an equally remarkable case. I refer to Mr. A. B. Todd, the doyen of Scottish journalists. Mr. Todd, who is now in his ninety-second year, was a nonagenarian when he corrected the proofs of his "Covenanting Pilgrimages" (Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier), a book which exhibits more of the Covenanting spirit than any other work with which I am acquainted. I am glad to learn that Mr. Todd, despite his ninety-two years, is still doing a considerable amount of literary and journalistic work.

* * * * *

A paragraph is going the rounds to the effect that Mr. A. J. Balfour's irregular attendance at the House of Commons is due to the fact that he is busy writing a book on political economy. It may be so, but I suspect the real reason is that the ex-Premier is grappling with the subject-matter of his Gifford Lectures, which are to be delivered at no distant date. In this matter Mr. Balfour is following in the footsteps of his political adversary, Lord Haldane, who, ten years ago, delivered a brilliant course of Gifford lectures, which were afterwards published under the title of "The Pathway to Reality."

* * * * *

One of the best selling books at present is "Later Reminiscences," by the widow of the late Principal Story, of Glasgow University. Dr. Story was for more than a generation a leader in the Established Church of Scotland, and at all times a redoubtable ecclesiastic. As a royal chaplain he was a yearly visitor at Balmoral in Queen Victoria's time, and, as minister for nearly thirty years of the beautiful parish of Roseneath, on the Clyde, he was an intimate friend of the Argyll family. A long list of distinguished people, beginning with Mrs. Oliphant, visited the Roseneath manse, and it is no exaggeration to say that Dr. and Mrs. Story, for a considerable period, met a great many people who were well worth knowing. Mrs. Story had, therefore, plenty of excellent material for a book of the anecdotal order, and she has made good use of it. The work is being widely quoted, and I am not surprised.

* * * * *

Mr. Murray is publishing immediately a half-crown edition of a little book, the demand for which has never ceased since its publication some fifteen years ago. This is "The Five Windows of the Soul," being a popular account of the human senses by the late Mr. E. H. Aitken, who had many friends both in India and in this country. It is a book of marked originality, and stimulating in the highest degree. Among those who, like myself, had the privilege of knowing Mr. Aitken, he was regarded as a man of virile intellect and winsome personality—a man whose excessive modesty and distrust of his own abilities kept him from playing a notable part as a thinker and as a writer. He was cultured in the best sense of the word, his knowledge being wide, exact, and always available, while his style exhibited a literary finish which was surprising in one who wrote comparatively little.

* * * * *

The centenary of the birth of Robert Murray M'Cheyne, the famous Scottish preacher, occurs on May 21st. M'Cheyne was only thirty when he died, but he lived long enough to exert an evangelical influence that is felt to this day. His biography, written by Dr. Andrew Bonar, was published along with a selection of his sermons and addresses in 1844 under the title of "Memoir and Remains of Robert Murray M'Cheyne." Nearly 170,000 copies of this work have been sold, while large editions of the Life (without the Sermons) have also been called for. A centenary edition of the Life has just been published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, while a centenary edition of the "Memoir and Remains" will be issued by the same firm in a few days. For the latter, Principal Whyte, of New College, Edinburgh, has written a commendatory note.

* * * * *

"The Tragedy of Education" is the title of a little volume which Messrs. Constable are publishing shortly. The author, Mr. Edmond Holmes, a well-known educationist, starts with the assumption that much of the present-day system of education must inevitably be consigned to the melting-pot. He not only discusses the defects of existing educational methods, but the means by which, in his opinion, they may be remedied. The book also outlines the work done by Madame Montessori, whose system is attracting so much attention at the present time. Mr. Holmes' work ought to prove helpful in guiding the movement for reform towards a wise issue.

* * * * *

Motley recounted brilliantly the history of the rise of the Dutch Republic. Now we are to have a work tracing the growth of the factors that led to its final fall a century later. The book is entitled "The Fall of the Dutch Republic," the author is Mr. H. W. van Loon, and the publishers are Messrs. Constable.

* * * * *

Messrs. Jack announce "The Battlefields of Scotland." The northern kingdom is rich in battlefields, and I am surprised the subject has not attracted some brilliant pen ere now. The author is Mr. T. C. F. Brothie, who professes to deal in picturesque fashion with those scenes which witnessed the long and bitter struggle for national and religious freedom. Mr. Brothie illustrates his volume with a series of drawings, the result of a tour of the Scottish battlefields.

X. Y. Z.

The Best of the World's Books

SEND A POSTCARD
(mentioning "Everyman") for any of the following.—
200-PAGE CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, English and Foreign,
in all classes of Literature at GREAT
REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

SELECTED AND CLASSIFIED LIST (144 pp.) OF

THE BEST BOOKS

On all subjects, at the Lowest Cash Prices;
forming a complete Guide to the best English Literature.

A LIST OF SEASONABLE BOOKS ON

The Garden and The Countryside

MANY OF WHICH ARE OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
All the Newest and Most Important Books are included.

A New List of Six-Shilling NOVELS

By the Best Writers,

From 1/- each.

A List of Charming COLOUR BOOKS offered at less than half-price,

Catalogue of Newly-published Books.
Catalogue of Books in Beautiful Bindings, suitable for presentation.
Catalogues of Books in leading Foreign languages.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

Every owner, or prospective owner of a gramophone, should read

HINTS ABOUT THE GRAMOPHONE

Considered as a Musical Instrument.

Cr. 8vo, 68 pp.
ROWELL and SONS, PRICE 1/6 POST FREE.
62-68, Rosebery Avenue, London, E.C. (Mention this paper.)

You can test our NEW POSTAL LESSONS in

RUSSIAN,

FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, LATIN or GREEK
for the modest sum of ONE SHILLING.

Write: Director, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

To You the Sphinx puts the eternal riddle—

"What does it all mean?"

and your well-being, or ill-being, depends on your answer. You will find the true answer in "GLAD TIDINGS!"—a new book

By RADNOR H. HODGSON.

CONTENTS.—"To You"; "What is Man?"; "The Divine in Man"; "The Carnal Man"; "Selfishness and Altruism"; "Individuality"; "Self-Culture"; "Truth and Wisdom"; "The Great Illusion"; "The Great Purpose"; "Social Reform"; "Now and After."

A book with a message of great hope to all men and women.

Price 1/- net. By post, 1/1½, from RADNOR H. HODGSON, HEADLEY BROS. SOUTH VIEW, BALDON, YORKS.

FREE on receipt of postcard, fully illustrated art catalogue of

Riley's Billiard Tables

For the Home. Cash or Easy Payments.
Send for it to-day. Prices from £37 6. The popular size, 6 ft. 4 in., costs only £55/0. Seven days' free trial.

E. J. RILEY, Ltd., Ondine Works, ACCRINGTON.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s., net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

The Ideal Pen for Busy Men

is unquestionably the "Red Dwarf." For lengthy professional work or hasty note-making it is ever ready to write smoothly, rapidly, and without spoiling.

THE PILLAR OF PERFECTION

Small enough to fit the pocket, yet possessing a large reservoir. It is recommended by all who use it.

3/9

Mr. J. PIERPONT MORGAN, the great financier, says: "I have recommended your 'Red Dwarf' Stylo. throughout the United States."

Red Dwarf

STYLOGRAPH

J. Kearney & Co., 47, Dale St., Liverpool.

New suits kept new—old suits made new—by Achille Serre.

That is our claim—testimonials and recommendations from everywhere prove that it is justified.

Have you sent us a suit yet? If not, do so at once, and you'll be delighted with the result. Our process of dry-cleaning and tailor-pressing removes all dirt and "bagginess" and takes but Four Days.

3/9 is our fixed charge—the best clothes value you can get.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?
To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“This scientific and sociological clairvoyance is a kind of parlour game for literary persons which is more amusing than profitable.” So says Mr. Sidney Low in his article, “Is Our Civilisation Dying?” in the Fortnightly Review for April, in reference to a recent book by one Dr. Hubbard on the lines of Mr. Hubert Bland's article, “Is the Human Brain Degenerating?” Mr. Low's comment is equally applicable to the latter: it is “a parlour game for literary persons.”

The “rules” of the game are these:—

1. Two clever parents produce clever offspring.
2. One stupid parent spoils all.
3. You are required to answer the following questions:—

(a) John Shakespeare having been something of a fool, what sort of person was his son William?

(b) William's children having proved to be nobodies, what sort of person was Ann Hathaway, (1) if William was the clever fellow he is reputed to have been, (2) if he was the ignoramus the Baconians say he was?

4. The answers must be more or less in accordance with rules 1 and 2, but the wittiest answer wins. If the party cannot agree on the winner, the matter is referred to Mr. Bland, whose decision is final.

I submit the following answers:—

- (a) A bigger.
(b) (1) An idiot.
(2) A fit wife for such a noodle.

Some of your readers may like to join in the fun. The game is also profitable—if it sends you to your biographical books of reference. By the time you have looked up the parentage of any half-dozen of the world's greatest literary men, you will have come to the humble, un-Bland-like conclusion that genius, that wonderful flower, bloweth, if not where it listeth, yet in most unexpected places; that it is not altogether “the result of certain external conditions,” but is due, in part at least, to “some inward impulsion, some mysterious life-force, coming we know not whence, going we know not whither.”

Mr. Bland was obviously holding a brief. Let us hear the advocate on the other side—say Mr. Sidney Low.—I am, sir, etc., EDWIN SYKES.
Huddersfield.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is astounding to realise the blind optimism of your correspondents on the above subject.

If I may assume that Mr. Bland is referring to mental brain-power—a purely abstract thing—not to physical brain or brawn, that is found in the human skull, as a teacher, I am amazed that, at a time when we are officially told that England is going behind every other nation in Europe on the question of education, it could be said brain power is developing.

Every thoughtful teacher in England knows that brain power, which is the result of natural intelligence, is lying idle through a false conception of education. It is brawn, not brain power, that is exercised. We can't have our cake and eat it. The reason for the loss of brain power in England is a simple matter of logic. “It is no trifle that is at stake,” said Epictetus, at a time like the present, when the young bloods among the Pagans were lying idle, and they had no higher conception of life than "bread and games." "The thing is, are you in your senses or are you not?" History has answered the question.

Work and genius are indissolubly connected. Edison, on being asked to what he attributed his genius, replied: "It was two per cent. genius and ninety-eight per cent. hard work." Every mental effort has its development in brain power. If the effort, strenuous and continuous, be not made, Nature does not build up the power to think or to reason. One of the first psychological axioms we learnt at college in the past was, "Never do anything for children that they can do for themselves. Show them the way, then leave them to climb it alone." The modern child does not know practically the meaning of the word "task."

The Germans, we read, are the "brainiest people in Europe." If they are, they undoubtedly make their own brains. The methods of training in elementary schools in Germany to-day are, in vital matters, exactly those which we followed in the past instinctively, in training according to Nature's laws which she has written on the human heart. If we follow the promptings of Nature in secular education, that is, the secular work, that equips mankind with trained mental gifts, we find that the moral laws are a natural corollary of true education.—I am, sir, etc.,
Stoke Newington, N. A SECULAR TEACHER.

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Although I had not the good fortune to read the article in EVERYMAN on "Socialism and Business Enterprise," there are one or two points in connection with Mr. W. A. Finch's letter of recent date which seem to call for some further explanation.

Mr. Finch is evidently very much concerned about those people who are wavering, as it were, on the brink of Socialism, and who must be saved at any cost from taking a plunge into the depths of the doctrines of revolution.

Now, as I am sure that all of us who have already taken the plunge will be filled with alarm on reading Mr. Finch's letter, with its suggestions of hidden perils, he will be performing a great service by pointing out some of those dangers in order that they may be already and irretrievably damned, that haply he may save others from a like awful fate.

In order to avoid any chance of misunderstanding, perhaps it is best to state at once and plainly in reality. First, they desire that every man, woman, and child shall be properly housed, clothed, and fed. Has Mr. Finch any quarrel to pick with that? Then they say that the benefits of education and culture should be open to everyone, and not, as at present, the monopoly of those "who toil not, neither do they spin." Moreover, these same Socialists look with horror on the long roll of crime, prostitution, child labour, and other evils which they believe to be the inevitable result of a (misnamed) society, where every man's hand is against his neighbour's. To them the sacrifice of human beings, body and soul, on the altar of progress is revolting, and contrary to all the teachings of all the world's greatest philosophers and moralists, including that Christ in whom men profess to believe, but to whom they render only lip-service. In short, the Socialists are struggling towards a great

THE MAN WHO IS CURING THE NATION'S EYESIGHT.

FAMOUS LONDON SPECIALIST'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

PARTICULARS NOW AVAILABLE TO THE PUBLIC.

A well-known London specialist has made a remarkable discovery, which already is making a sensation wherever the result of its use is known.

It is nothing less than the discovery of a wonderfully simple yet scientific method for restoring tired, old eyes to their once youthful, clear-seeing power.

Everybody who for the first time is told about the new discovery is eagerly asking, "Will it do my sight good?"

The answer in practically every case is, "Yes."

As Mr. Levison, the discoverer of this wonderful method of eyesight restoration, says, "Every sufferer may cure his or her own trouble at home inexpensively and speedily by following out the simple instructions I give, which are so simple that a child could understand, yet so effective as to be of benefit no matter how bad the sight may be."

Mr. Levison's discovery enables the weak-sighted to check the ever-growing worse condition of their trouble, and build up the eyesight in perfect strength to see clearly at any age. Mr. Levison does not claim his discovery as a "cure-all," but whenever a cure is possible the Levison treatment will accomplish it.

Most successful has the new discovery proved in the cure of

- | | |
|-----------------------------------|----------------------------|
| 1. Falling or Weakening Eyesight. | 7. Watery Eyes. |
| 2. Long Sightedness. | 8. Discharging Eyes. |
| 3. Short Sightedness. | 9. Unequal Power of Eyes. |
| 4. Old Sight and Blurring. | 10. Aching Eyes. |
| 5. Twitching Eyes. | 11. Red and Inflamed Eyes. |
| 6. Hot Eyes. | 12. Eyesight Headaches. |

Particularly those who are somewhat advanced in years find benefit from Mr. Levison's method, and already a great many men and women of fifty, sixty, or seventy years write him stating they can once again see clearly. Their tired eyes are re-strengthened, and they need no longer have recourse to their old glasses.

Mr. Levison has thought how he could best reply to the great number of eyesight sufferers who have written to him in order to let them know exactly what his discovery is, and how it may be adopted, and he has now prepared printed particulars which clearly set out what this wonderful method is, and what it will do for those with weak sight. Copies of these particulars may be obtained either by calling on Mr. Levison personally or by writing to him at The Levison Eyesight Institute, 64, Wigmore Street, London, W.

Naturally, Mr. Levison has already communicated his discovery to the scientific Press, and that old-established warmly approves of his clever discovery, and advises all who have weak or failing sight to write to him for the particulars he is for the time being prepared to send to anyone who will write him enclosing a penny stamp for reply. For your convenience the Coupon below may be filled in and posted for the particulars of the new discovery which restores weak or failing sight.

Cut out and forward for Free Book on Mr. Levison's Wonderful Eyesight Discovery.

To Mr. JOHN LEVISON,
84, Wigmore St., Cavendish Sq., London, W.

Please send me full particulars of your eyesight discovery. I enclose 1d. stamp for postage.

Name

Address.....

E.M., 9/5/13.

THE W.H.S. PEN

If you would own a pen that is built for service—designed to give celerity in writing and facility in filling—a pen that can be depended upon always—buy The W.H.S. Pen.

It is instantly responsive—never jibs—and has a delightful touch. It fills in five seconds, without a filler. It saves time, eliminates trouble, avoids mess, and is guaranteed to give two years of writing joy.

There are 72 styles of The W.H.S. Pen to choose from: every hand and handwriting can be exactly suited. The nib is of genuine 14-carat gold, tipped with iridium. Buy one to-day!

Have you seen the new model?

Of Your Stationer

“Popular! it speaks for itself, sir—everybody is having Hall’s Distemper walls now. We used to use it most among the artistic folk and people with fancy ideas, but now it is Hall’s Distemper everywhere.”

And no wonder! The English public, proverbially proud of their homes, have learned that behind the artistic idea

HALL'S DISTEMPER

(REG. TRADE MARK)

gives solid practical advantages, such as are offered in no other wall covering.

surface is so even and smooth, wall does not crack, blister, nor peel off. Unlike wallpaper it never fades nor changes colour.

It is instant death to all insect and germ life, and gives clean, healthy walls which may be washed by lightly sponging with warm water.

“HOW TO DECORATE YOUR HOME”—a booklet that helps, by giving beautiful examples in colours, and useful hints, free by post on application to the Sole Manufacturers:—

SISSONS BROTHERS & CO., Ltd., HULL.
 London Office: 195^B, Borough High Street, S.E.
 Liverpool: 65, Mount Pleasant.
 Glasgow: 113, Bath Street.
 Reading: 6, Gun Street.

and beautiful ideal, which may be called the Kingdom of God, and for the realisation of which they claim the assistance of all good and noble men and women.

As a last word, and as I know that Mr. Finch will say that our ideal is beyond reach, that Christ was an idle dreamer, with no practical knowledge of the world, and that the methods we propose “will not work,” I ask him to take a walk through some of the slums of East London, and then tell us solemnly and truly if he considers that the present system works. Further, I would respectfully present for his careful and thoughtful examination the proposition that, in order to attain these ideals, it is only necessary to make men believe in them, and that is precisely what we Socialists are trying to do, thereby apparently causing Mr. Finch much uneasiness.

With many apologies for taking up so much of your valuable space, I am, sir, etc.,
 Addiscombe, Croydon. R. C. DOODY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The discipline which your correspondent, “Manager from the Ranks,” deploras being absent is a different thing from the discipline originally understood by the word. To-day it does not mean conforming to rules necessary for the welfare of the community, but obedience to certain economic canons, of which, seeing that so large a number of the population are always on the verge of starvation, the least that can be said is that they are both cruel and false. These canons, teaching, as they do, that the worker can expect a bare subsistence only, are commonly supposed to hold the secret of national prosperity; and it is obedience to this doctrine which passes muster as discipline. Shade of Philosophy! “Manager” says that the evil conditions of the workers are due to lack of discipline, i.e., they do not submit with sufficient docility to the rule and system which give to the employer and organiser all the rare and refreshing fruits of intellectual and material production, and to the employed (the disciplined) a minimum immunity from pauperism.

It must be borne in mind that the happier position of the employer and the organiser is not due to a natural superiority in intellectual capacity. They are no more naturally born intellectual aristocrats than the worker is a naturally born servitor. The differ-grabbing facilities which each respects and money. These facilities offer to the one opportunities to enter positions where moderate efficiency is rewarded with all the solid delights that are within reach of the well-being permitted to live—and being disciplined.—I am, sir, etc., “DISCIPLINED.”

Jarrow-on-Tyne,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Will you permit me to controvert some of the statements raised in your issue for April 25th by a “Manager from the Ranks” and “Individualist”?

Your correspondents assert that Individualism is the only system capable of providing efficient “organisation, management, industry, initiative, to say nothing of character, loyalty, and other individual merits.”

Let me state the problem. Given a country and a people, how can we—the people—organise the activities of the whole people so as to produce the highest welfare of all?

Individualistic method: Liverpool has 15,000 dockers. Number required daily—8,000 to 10,000. Result: chaos; at least 5,000 unemployed daily; cheap labour; appalling suffering and degradation of character and efficiency.

Socialistic method: all industry so organised—shorter hours, sessional trades, etc., etc.—that every man would be employed, and would earn a full week's wages all the year round.

As to Initiative, the genius must invent, or write, or compose. The best work is done for little or no money. Under Socialism every person would have the opportunity of working and developing his capacities to the fullest. Given security for a decent existence, most men and women would scorn to work for the mere purpose of gain. It is only the competitive scramble for a living which makes people seemingly avaricious. Socialism would make life secure, and so set free the higher instinct of helpfulness.

It is admitted that Responsibility builds up Character. At present the majority of people have few opportunities of exercising and developing Responsibility. Their activities are ordered by the owners of land and capital, who permit the workers to live under a roof, and to work. The millions dare not live, work, think, and read as they would like to do. Socialism means Liberty for all individuals—liberty to live and work, liberty to enjoy fair wages, liberty to express thoughts, liberty to develop one's individuality to the fullest, so long as one does not encroach on the equal liberty of the others.

Under Individualism you cannot be moral. If you do not directly lie, rob, bear false witness, murder, it is only because someone else does it for you. Rent is robbery; interest is robbery; unearned increment is robbery; goods bought cheap at the cost of human life is murder; your whole life is a cowardly compromise. Socialism would harmonise principle and practice.

I have not attempted to prove how Socialism would do these things. I am prepared to do so at the proper time. What I have shown is that Individualism does not provide for the highest welfare of all people.—I am, sir, etc.,

HAROLD A. M. BRANGHAM.

Golder's Green, N.W.

PACIFISM AND IMPERIALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article on "Pacifism and Imperialism," by Enrico Corradini, in your issue of April 25th, seems open to criticism on many aspects, which I have neither the time nor space to deal with now. His classification, for instance, of pacifists is absurd; he has forgotten the fourth and most important class, viz., those who are pacifists from an economic and social point of view, without either sentimentality or bombast. I can only deal here with his principal point.

The main proposition which this writer appears to maintain may be summed up in his sentence, "Wars of conquest pour new life into a country," etc. But do they? He instances Italy's conquest of Tripoli, but Tripoli had been conquered by war many times before, and where was the new life? The Turks conquered Tripoli by war, and where was the new life then? and so on. What he appears to mean is that when Italy conquers a country new life is poured in. This seems to resemble the ideas of jingo Englishmen, who imagine that Providence designed the British nation to conquer all sorts of foreign countries for those countries' good.

A war of conquest may be followed by an inflow of new life and energy into the conquered country, and it

A Remarkable Letter from an Eminent Anatomist.

43, Russell Square, London.

Dear Mr. Cox,—Your lessons, or, rather, the explanation of your ideas as to the training of the power of memory, have given me the most intense pleasure, and I KNOW that you have got down to rockbottom truth in your ideas, and that you have developed the ONE correct plan to which to work for the purpose of memory training. You need have no fear with regard to the correctness of your physiology, which is correct in every detail, and your system is, I am sure, the correct method of thoroughly impinging upon the brain cells and causing them to react in response to the impulses sent to them. You see that you call into play the work of the nerve endings in the cells by force of will in the same manner in which they would be called into play by the senses through the organs of the eyes, ears, and fingers, and the impulse stops in the brain without being sent out again and dissipated in the use of those organs, which is naturally more or less of a drain upon the body.

Your system also compels concentration in three or perhaps more distinct ways, and I have always been of opinion that the reason of all poor memory was the inability to concentrate, and you have been able to explain in a very few words a threefold means of concentration which must be more than threefold more value than a single means.

I am quite sure that your system pursued will result in a strengthening of the nerve tissues involved in the act of storing impressions in the brain, and as use develops any tissue, so it will develop brain tissue also.

In each of us is the power of memory. It is only atrophied for want of exercise. It is a physiological law that what is not used begins immediately to atrophy, and we have allowed many of our powers to atrophy by lack of use, particularly the power of storing impressions.

I am quite sure also that your system will be of the very greatest assistance in maintaining and even in restoring the health of the physical tissues.—Yours sincerely, J. J. MAY.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright)

devised by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required.

All Subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift. Recommended by Physicians, Doctors, Clergymen, University Examiners and others. EVERY Musician can play from MEMORY.

EVERYONE can strengthen GENERAL MEMORY by this system.

All who need memory should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX, (Music Master, Tettenhall College), Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

Prospectus and full particulars free on application.

TO PLAY-WRITERS.—Manuscript Plays wanted for publication in book form. No fees. Send MS. to Publisher, 34, Maiden Lane, Strand, W.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND.—AN OFFICER'S OPINION. Captain E. A. Sanders, D.S.O., 14, Cambridge Terrace, Hyde Park, W., states: "I myself have learnt Pitman's and two other systems of shorthand, at different times, before taking up this Sloan-Duployan system, and I unhesitatingly state that I have found the last system the most satisfactory. I hold no brief for Sloan-Duployan, and this opinion is therefore the outcome of my own unbiased experience." SLOAN-DUPOYAN shorthand is acquired in a few weeks and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for free illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Rainsgate.

WANTED.—Copy of "EL KSIDAH," by Sir Richard Burton. Please send particulars to Box 204, EVERYMAN, Bedford St., London, W.C.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws," on Card. Something new. How the New Knowledge aids in daily life, study, &c. "Thought: Its Ten Laws," Companion Card, 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

STAMMERING AND ALL DEFECTS IN SPEECH effectually CURED by correspondence or personally. The "Practical Guide" is lent to inquirers, post free.—N. H. Mason, 30, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TO NEW WRITERS. Novels, etc., promptly placed with London Publishers at best possible terms. Prospectus and Testimonials free.—The Surrey Literary Agency, Strathmore, Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey.

WIENER LITERARY AGENCY.

MSS.—64, Strand, London (next to Tivoli), 1st, 2nd and 3rd floors. Special facilities for placing literary and dramatic works, drawings, etc. Advice on and revision of MSS. undertaken. Particulars post free. 'Phone 3691 Central. Wires and cables, "Out-general, London."

A THOROUGH SCIENTIFIC SURVEY OF THE PRINCIPLES OF MENTAL ACTIVITY

AND HOW TO STRENGTHEN AND APPLY THESE TO Professional Life, Business Life, and the thousand and one things that constitute our daily activities, is given in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration." It teaches you the laws of Attention, Observation, Memory, Fatigue Habit and Will-Power, and Thought-Control, and shows you how to develop and apply these to your daily requirements. "Scientific Concentration" makes you attentive, makes you observe and remember, develops your Will-Power, Self-Reliance, and Thought-Control to an enormous extent. It banishes Self-Consciousness, eliminates Worry, helps you to conquer Bad Habits, and is an invaluable guide to success in any pursuit. "Scientific Concentration" is practised by a large body of students of every class, in every part of the civilised world; and is recommended by the Editors of the following well-known Journals:—"Public Opinion," "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Review of Reviews," "Great Thoughts," "John Bull." Learn what "Scientific Concentration" will do for you. Send to-day for Free Booklet to the

CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS,
WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

PURE COFFEE FREED FROM CAFFEINE

For your nerves' sake drink Coffee that has no injurious effect upon the nervous system—Pure Coffee freed from the drug Caffeine. Your grocer has it or can get it. Over 2,000 doctors recommend it. Costs no more than other Coffees, and all growths may be had. Flavour, aroma, and quality fully preserved.

FREE

Sample sent on receipt of 1d. stamp for postage. Booklet free for the asking from The Lifebelt Coffee Co., Ltd. (Dept. 11), 71, Eastcheap, London, E.C.

THE ROTARY CYCLOSTYLE

Gestetner's Patent.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEPARTURE
IN DUPLICATING MACHINES.

2,000 Copies from One Original.

HANDWRITING—TYPEWRITING—DRAWING—MUSIC.

THE DUPLICATOR FOR FINEST WORK.
SPEED, CLEANLINESS, AND RELIABILITY.

Full particulars on application to—

The CYCLOSTYLE CO.,
50, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Telephone 5454 Gerrard.

Wholesale & Export: TOTTENHAM HALE, LONDON, N.

may not. That is the danger of allowing such a means to such a precarious end. This writer's main proposition is only true on chance occasions, and, like all such appeals to physical force, is capable of unlimited and very dangerous extension.

The only other point I can refer to here is this. It is not necessary to have a war of conquest to pour new life into a country. Consider how British—and other—capital has poured new life into the Argentine without any war of conquest. The only wars in that region of South America among the governing powers are deterrents, not aids to business, and these powers are beginning to see the folly of such wars.

Enrico Corradine's arguments appear to be just the same old arguments in a new "Imperial" form, and, if he has an influence on Italian thought, I regret it is not devoted to other and, to my mind, better ends.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. EDWARD MEADS.

Bexhill-on-Sea, April 27th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Signor Corradini's article on "Pacifism and Imperialism" so aptly exposes the mind of the so-called Imperialist all over the world, and is so full of florid generalities, half truths, and misapplied analogies, that I suspect your letter-bag will be filled with attacks on one or other of the pseudo-arguments used by the writer. I would, however, presume on your generosity to place before your readers the views of a plain man on the subject.

Firstly, the three kinds of pacifists. I quite agree that war is harmful to the interests of the large majority of financiers and plutocrats, and that if it were otherwise the probability that they would become war advocates is proved by the armour-plate ring scandals now being exposed in Germany.

As regards the sole reason put forward to explain the attitude of Socialists to war, I do not think Signor Corradini will find one man in a thousand to take his statement seriously. Little as I may accept the Socialist programme as a practicable or advantageous policy, there is no doubt in my mind or in that of the majority of unbiassed inquirers that Socialists throughout the world are dominated by the desire to secure better life conditions for the majority. That being so, it would be necessary for your contributor first to prove that war was other than harmful or merely ineffectual in its results on the life of that majority before he could put forward the shadow of a reason for stating that Socialists were acting falsely to their ideals in opposing warfare, or that they do so solely in the interests of class-warfare.

The long argument that war is the quickening force of the world, as peace is its organising and conserving force, is plainly founded upon an amazing misconception of the teachings of biology. To attempt to uphold so untenable a theory as that war between nations is in these days merely a further illustration of the world-old law of the survival of the fittest would seem impossible except to one blinded by the glamour of a recent war.

As regards individuals, war is, of course, the decay or destruction of the fittest. No country sends its weakest or consumptive or feeble-minded citizens to fight its battles. No, such citizens remain at home to reproduce their defects in the next generation while the stronger and sounder units go forth to possible and sometimes certain destruction.

To the statement that "war, whether it manifests itself as war or as revolution, is the force which revives our social organisms," it is only necessary to ask its application to the continual wars and revolutions of some of the Republics in South America. I quite agree with Signor Corradini that revolutions, taken in the bulk, where they are revolutions against a form of tyranny, do revive social organisms, and that wars undertaken for the same purpose, such as the Italian war of unity fifty years ago and the present Balkan war, answer his assumption, but I totally deny his statement as an absolute result of war in every form or for any object.

I should also like to ask your contributor whether he considers the Turkish war of conquest, which added the Balkans to the Turkish Empire in Europe, is an exception to his unqualified statement that "wars of conquest pour new life into a country" and establish a productive race in the place of those who, according to this proposition, must be an unproductive race because they have been conquered.

Finally, as to the writer's justification of the Italian war in Tripoli on the ground that Italy has, by establishing itself as conqueror of Tripoli, accomplished a task of justice and of advantage to the world by replacing the unproductive Turk and Arab by the productive Italian. If the Italians had been frustrated in their task by a powerful Turkish navy they would presumably then have been proved to have no claim to be a more productive race than the Turks. This is an absurd conclusion, and therefore the original premises cannot have been sound.

Also, surely there are more productive races than the Italians. They cannot claim so great a productivity as the German race, or so successful a colonising ability as the English. Therefore, I presume, Signor Corradini would consider either or both England and Germany would be justified, if not theoretically compelled, to undertake the reconquest of Tripoli from Italy, or the conquest of Italy itself, in the same world interests by which he seeks to justify the Italian raid on the Tripolitan shores.

I am sorry to trespass so greatly on your space, but would be glad, indeed, to read your contributor's reply to the points raised in this letter.—I am, sir, etc.,
April 26th, 1913. VICTOR MOLLOY.

THE ABOLITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been struck by the reflectless scepticism and the antagonistic spirit by which the correspondents of your current issue of EVERYMAN have replied to the excellent and provokingly plucky article of Mr. Money's on the abolition of the working classes.

One writer says the middle classes have the hardest work and no trades unions, which strikes me as being rather cool and green—a green Hailstone from the prolific isle of Jersey. I should suppose that if that writer works very long hours he reaps the full benefit of it, at least I hope he does.

"Now surely," writes another, "there is other work, and hard work, too, besides manual labour? Does a clerk do no work? Am I a 'drone' because I don't mend roads or build houses? If I want to build a house it is just as necessary to think how to build it and to draw the plan as it is to put one brick on top of another. Is not this also 'Work That Must Be Done'?" Is it not surprising, Mr. Editor, that your correspondent should ask such a question? I would suggest to the writer of these questions that he try and read Mr. Money's article with sympathy, which I more naturally do, as I am an ordinary working man, and then he will readily see that Mr. Money has no idea of excluding these as workers of the work that must be done.

PROBLEMS OF PROGRESS.

By H. VINCENT.

The road to Prosperity is, as everybody knows, not the straight, smooth, long road of our desires; it is a devious, rough, and sometimes difficult road to follow.

Yet I venture to think that the majority of "side-tracked" wayfarers upon that road have something other than the road to blame; often, I think, themselves.

Nothing is more piteous than the man—or the woman—who is "in the rut," a-rusting upon some dismal byway of commerce; yet being more the result of fault than of opportunities.

It cannot be too often said that there are as many opportunities in the world to-day as at any stage of the world's history; even more, the busy business world is full of chances to "get on"; full of the beginnings which, rightly used, end in prosperity.

Every year extends the sphere of business; every year adds to its activities, and every extension brings a fresh crowd of chances to the men and women who want to "get on."

Advertising is one of the most notable recent examples of a new plan of business-creating occupation, and good opportunities for thousands.

Ten or twelve years ago, advertising was, to a great extent, in its infancy in this country; we were only on the verge of those developments which to-day afford a lucrative occupation for many workers.

It is to such professions as these, that the man or woman "in a rut" should turn in search of progress; for then progress is possible.

An easy and safe avenue of approach is supplied by the excellent and practical course of correspondence instruction in advertisement-writing and designing which the Practical Correspondence College offers. The Practical Correspondence College is an institution which has already proved of immense value to men and women all over the country, who, refusing to "rust" in the by-way of business, at a starvation wage, have sought a field where their brains could be used to profitable account.

I know one young fellow—a shop assistant in the provinces some six years ago—now occupies a manager's position in one of the biggest and most successful advertising firms.

He was trained to success by the P.C.C.

I know another who not four years ago was working very hard in uncongenial employment at a very small salary. To-day he is acting as advertising representative for a thriving newspaper.

He also was trained to success by the P.C.C.

I could multiply these cases a hundredfold, and not exhaust one half of the remarkable instances of how a P.C.C. training can lift a man up from obscurity and poverty to a good position and a lucrative income.

To the man or woman, then, with the ambition to prosper and the energy to devote a little spare time to preparing themselves for betterment I can indicate no better course of action than to write to the Secretary of the Practical Correspondence College for a copy of "Brains and Ink," an illustrated and thoroughly interesting booklet on the possibilities of the advertising profession and the means which the P.C.C. place at its students' disposal to aid them in qualifying for a well-paid position in that well-paid profession.

"Brains and Ink" will be sent post free upon request. Address, the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

It is marvellous what sympathy does in the criticism of work, play, books, science, art, and in fact anything; and it is, indeed, in these social questions of ours needed more than anything else.

The next correspondent asks, "May I ask would the same wages be given to the honest and dishonest worker?" Well, sir, I have in this active present time known of cases where the dishonest worker received more than the honest one in the same business; and will any capable thinker say that justice in the matter of wages is the order of our day? I think Mr. Profit must drop his "justice," for the question is, What has—not what will—become of it? And as to equation in the distribution of wages, I will proffer one suggestion in answer to him and to your correspondent "Senex's" query as to his imaginary army of inspectors. We will suppose that a body of workmen form themselves into a company for the purpose of carrying on a specific business, themselves doing all the work necessary to that business, and on conditions of equal wages and equal sharing of the profits and responsibilities of that business. Will they not become all inspectors without any additional expense, and would not the lazy and dishonest boulder have a bad time of it?—nay, I think they would make a better man of him.

Now, a body of workmen have as much right as any other corporation of men to establish a business on equal rights of work, remuneration, distribution of profits, and in committee of responsible government; if this is admissible, I cannot see for the very life of me why it is not as just for the whole nation to do it, because in that there is this further advantage, that, if in any department of the State a member of that specific corporation shows an inaptitude for its work, he can with advantage be transferred to another for which his faculties are better adapted. This is only one reason, but a multitude of others will suggest themselves to the practical mind.

Burns has told us, "A king can mak a belted knight, a marquis, duke, an' a' that; but an honest man's aboon his might," and what he applies to his Majesty's prerogative applies also to his Parliament. No, it cannot make us honest; but it is that other magical and merciful power which Napoleon began to realise in his days of captivity—a power which he recognised as holding the greatest dominion on earth—the love of the homeless Man of Nazareth, Emanuel—God with us; that love which makes Christianity a "self-denying ordinance," and whose symbol is the Cross. When that comes amongst us we shall soon right ourselves. There will be no want, but work with peace and pleasure.—I am, sir, etc., WILLIAM R. LETHABY.

THE USE OF BOOKS TO WORKING MEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with much interest and sympathy the article by Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., on the "Use of Books to Working Men," which appeared in your issue of the 18th. If there is a blessing on him who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, and Dean Swift said there was, he is a happy man, too, who can teach others to care for good reading and open a door for them to the palace of books. As Mr. Clynes says, "Many a good book is as a gateway leading from a long round of drudgery and effort to obtain the means of daily bread," and nothing is truer than that "the one department in which all workmen should ensure increase is the department of thought and outlook." The article brought at once to my mind the National Home-Reading Union, with which I have been associated for many years, and the very valuable work it is seeking to do in kindling fresh interest in books and helping people to read in the most profitable way. Many working men have but little time for reading: they cannot afford to waste it on second-rate books. For such there could be no better adviser and helper than this Union, with its widely varied lists of recommended books, its magazines with suggestive articles upon them, and, above all, its reading circles for mutual stimulus and help. "It has been the making of my mind," a village cobbler once said, speaking of his association with the Union, and this is typical of the Union's work and influence. I have nothing to add to Mr. Clynes' arguments with regard to the value of books to working men—he touches all aspects of the question, and makes the case clear and unanswerable—but I should be glad if you could kindly find room for this letter with reference to the very useful Association I have described.—I am, sir, etc., J. SCOTT LIDGETT.

THE DAPPLED PADDOCK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was astonished to find your reviewer waxing scornful in EVERYMAN of the 2nd inst. anent Mr. Spencer Muirhead's lines:—

"Or I shall see with quiet eye
The dappled paddock loping by."

It seems to me that he remarked truly that in his ignorance he supposed a "paddock" was a term applied to fields or pastures. Of course it has this meaning, but is it not also an old English word for a frog or a toad? Does your reviewer know that exquisite child's grace of Robert Herrick's? Surely the use of the word "paddocks" does not convey the idea of fields or pastures in the following:—

"Here a little child I stand,
Heaving up my either hand;
Cold as paddocks though they be,
Here I lift them up to Thee
For a benison to fall
On our meat and on us all."

In the light of this meaning, I submit that the phrase "the dappled paddock loping by" is a very happy description of the speckled frog jumping through the green, newly sprung grass, and I am surprised to find in the pages of your excellent paper a disparaging remark regarding the couplet, which a little thought or inquiry would doubtless have prevented.—I am, sir, etc., W. NOWLAN SHERLOCK.

Liverpool, May 4th, 1913.

PHILLIMORE ON CROMWELL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Prof. Phillimore, in his article on the Æneid in your issue of the 25th ult., would seem to have needlessly gone out of his way to express his antipathy to Puritanism, and to assert, as though it were common knowledge, that Cromwell and Milton were rogues of a very base sort.

His phrase, "as morally leprous with hypocrisy as Cromwell," will surely cause some resentment in those who, recognising the narrow outlook of Cromwell, yet see through all his life a lofty aim and an admirable singleness of purpose.

To understand his life one must grasp the intense religious faith he held, and of which his political actions were a direct outcome. The sober and serious mind of the Puritan, embittered by the remorseless persecution of Laud, and narrowed by seeing all his hopes of a Puritan England passing away, had conceived an intense conviction of his individual respon-

(Continued on p. 137 124.)

A GREAT PHYSICIAN

SAYS:

"70% of all Diseases are caused by the pores becoming clogged, thus shutting up in the blood the Poison and impurities which Nature intended they should eliminate."—ERASMUS WILSON, M.D.

THE CENTURY THERMAL BATH

OPENS THE PORES and sweats all the poison out of the blood, leaving it pure and healthy.

In the cure of RHEUMATISM, Kidney and all Blood Diseases, there is no treatment so sure and speedy as the Hot Air Bath.

S. CUTHBERT'S, ROKER, SUNDERLAND.
May 22nd, 1911.

"DEAR SIR,—In 1901 I bought one of your 'Thermal Cabinet Baths,' and have had on an average one bath a week since. Previously, from the age of nine (when I had Rheumatic Fever) up to forty-two, I was more or less in the Doctor's hands, suffering from Rheumatism in various parts of the body. I was also never free from Indigestion. Since using your Bath I have not had a Doctor once, and have now perfect Digestion. I have every reason to be thankful for having bought one of your Baths. Please send me a 5/- bottle of your Liquid Sulphur.—Yours truly,

(Signed) "H. J. LOVEJOY (Rev.)."

Inside or Outside Heater.

Vapour Baths energise, invigorate, vitalise; they are a luxury beyond the conception of all those who have not taken them by means of the Century Cabinet. Scientifically constructed, self-purifying, strong, compact; folded, it occupies only two-inch space; has head steamer whereby the head and face get same treatment as the body. The top is constructed of four flaps, patented; regulates temperature at will of bather.

The Century Cabinet is sold complete with Heater and Vaporiser at 35/-, 50/-, 63/- and 70/- (Cheaper Cabinets 25/-). We allow 30 days' trial, to be returned at our expense, if, after testing it, it is not found as represented. We make this offer so that you shall be sure of having the BEST BATH CABINET MADE. Write for Catalogue No. 708, FREE and Samples of Goods sent, also valuable book: "Health, Strength, Hygiene," and Medical Testimony. Thousands of Century Cabinets in use. Agents wanted. Please mention EVERYMAN.

CENTURY THERMAL BATH CABINET, Ltd. (Dept. 708), 205, Regent Street, London, W.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

ARE YOUR NERVES HEALTHY?—If not, let me explain an inexpensive, drugless treatment. Banishes depression, sleeplessness, irritability, brain-fag, lassitude. Renews youthfulness.—Write "Specialist," c/o EVERYMAN, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Sberthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1563.

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready. Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost. Gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to cats. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

FIGURE DRAWING

Taught in a series of Postal Lessons at a Moderate Fee by means of the Hulme-Sydney System

The method of training enables the Student to draw the Human Figure accurately, and from memory, in a comparatively short time. Send a stamp for Illustrated Booklet to The Director, HULME-SYDNEY CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL STUDIOS, 8, Glsburn Mansions, Hornsey, London, N.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLIX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverlill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

WHY RENT A HOUSE? You would not rent anything else in everyday use. You would buy it outright, and you can buy your house whether you have capital or not. Send for "Every Man his own Landlord" post free on application to Managers, 246, Bishopsgate, E.C. Mention Everyman.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof. Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free, 15/- complete. Money refunded if not satisfactory. A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

REGD.

sibility to God, and saw the divine leading in every aspect of his life; and this was no mere dogma, but a very vivid part of his inmost life.

Such was Cromwell's faith when the outbreak of the Civil War called him from his farm in the Fens; and in his rapid rise in the Army, and later in the Parliament, he felt himself individually called by God to save England and the religion he believed to be the highest one. To us it may seem a pathetically narrow conception of life that only the Puritans should be the chosen people of God; but it is well to remember that men had been forced by the events happening all round them to think of liberty and Puritanism and of the High Church of Laud and tyranny. Granted its narrowness, there was no trace of selfish ambition in the Puritans, still less of "leprous hypocrisy." Cromwell's aim was pure and high, and though his religious convictions were responsible for some tragic mistakes, they also enabled him to live a straight and upright life through a time of very great temptations; and though these convictions caused him to be harsh and cruel to his former oppressors, he believed he did it to the "glory of God."

His words, "God knows I would have been glad to have lived under my woodside and to have kept a flock of sheep rather than to have undertaken this government"; and again, as he was dying, "I would be willing to live, to be of further service to God and His people, but my work is done. Yet God will be with His people," give a just view of a great man, to whom England (and Prof. Phillimore) owes much.—I am, sir, etc.,

FAIRPLAY.

Sudbury, April 30th, 1913.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE ADVENTRESS, by George Willoughby (Max Goschen, 6s.). This is an attractive volume of short stories which should appeal to those of our readers who prefer their reading in breathless spasms to the quieter form of narrative. The tales are decidedly well written, and range over a large section of the human emotions. They can hardly be described as anything more than light sketches, however, and comprise chiefly episodes in the lives of the various characters which may be regarded more or less as "turning-points" in their affairs. The first story in the book, which gives its name to the whole collection of sketches, is written with a notable delicacy, but, at the same time, gives a clear insight into the character of the heroine, Nina. This lady, while apparently in love with one man, does not regard it as at all out of the way to go out to supper and a midnight drive with the fiancé of her friend, and subsequently to fall asleep, after a highly emotional evening, clutching a letter from her legitimate lover and to dream sweet dreams of him, quite forgetting her latest flame, who is driving away in the cab which brought her home, hugging himself in the belief he has made a conquest. The stories are not all in this vein, however, and there is one, "The Sea Captain," which cannot fail to appeal to our readers, revealing, as it does, how terribly difficult it is sometimes to get away from environment, and that one's so-called "freewill" is so frequently open to question. The characters of the mother and daughter in this tale are cleverly depicted. "Savoir Faire" is distinctly amusing, and shows how the lives of three people might have been affected if a lady's dressing-bag had not gone astray. It does not seem to be necessary to mention any other of the stories, as the three we refer to are fairly comprehensive, and will give the reader a tolerable inkling of what to expect from Mr. Willoughby's latest volume.

THE LOST MAMELUKE, by David M. Beddoe (J. M. Dent and Sons, 6s.), is a tale of Egypt at the time of the Napoleonic invasion. The story grips one from the first, and the plot is carefully thought out, and of real interest. For the benefit of the uninitiated it would perhaps be as well to explain that the Mamelukes were slave soldiers who had got the upper hand and ruled Egypt for some centuries prior to the time of the story. They were very valiant and brave men, incomparable horsemen and swordsmen, and, under the sway of the Beys, governed Egypt with a hand of iron. The author could hardly have chosen a more picturesque setting for his story than this of the country of the Nile, and his descriptions of the fierce fights and battles are vivid in the extreme. The story concerns the fortunes of a certain Englishman who has turned Mussulman, and serves under Murad Bey, a powerful ruler of certain provinces, who is at continual warfare with his rival, Ibrahim Bey, but who always manages to keep the upper hand until the awakening comes and Napoleon and his army utterly defeat the brave Mamelukes. This Englishman, Stephen Hales, has a son who is supposed to have been drowned at an early age, but who has really been stolen by a servant with a grudge against his master. The boy is brought up as a Mussulman and taught by an old Sheik, who hopes to train him to become a Sheik also. Margaret, Stephen's Christian wife, leaves her husband upon his becoming a Mussulman and goes into partnership with a delightful old Frenchman, Jules Lefebvre, who keeps a silk store. How she eventually finds her son, and what happens when she does, it would be unfair to disclose. The lost Mameluke is an English friend of Murad Bey, who has mysteriously disappeared for about fifteen years. There had been a terrible misunderstanding and bitter quarrel between Murad and Mustapha, who is cruelly bastinadoed, with the result that he becomes a cripple. In the character of a beggar he haunts the streets of Cairo, seeking an opportunity to revenge himself on his friend, whom he believes has wronged him. Radouan, the eunuch, who is the friend and confidante of Murad, eventually finds him, and the two are reconciled.

The author has the faculty of bringing vivid pictures before the eyes of his readers, and the whole story is written with a spirit and dash that is most refreshing. We trust our readers will enjoy the book as thoroughly as we did.

Breathless excitement and dramatic incident is the keynote of RALPH RAYMOND, by Ernest Mansfield (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.). The opening chapter reveals the sumptuous offices of a mighty City magnate, into which the hero boldly thrusts himself with a determination that will brook no denial. He has a tremendous venture on hand, no less than two mines he has discovered in India, rich in rubies and gold, and he desires Lionel Roy to finance these undertakings. Roy takes a fancy to Raymond, invites him home, agrees to finance the companies—and introduces Ralph to his daughter Berice. The result is love at first sight. Raymond goes away to return in a few years a successful man. He takes Berice by storm, and is accepted. So far their love story runs smoothly, but tragedy is only waiting an

(Continued on page 126.)

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

ATHENÆUM: "Mr. Wicksteed proves himself an admirable guide. He gives a good summary account of Aristotle's teaching and its varied fortunes till it conquered the schools in the middle of the thirteenth century, and received its final form, so far as the mediæval world was concerned, at the hands of Albert and St. Thomas. We can recommend it as a disinterested treatment of the scholastic philosophy of Aquinas."

SWINBURNE

By JOHN DRINKWATER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MORNING POST: "From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

THE MYSTIC WAY

A Study in Christian Origins.

By EVELYN UNDERHILL. 12s. 6d. net.

THE TIMES: "Miss Underhill's book is a triumph of erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

DREAMS AND THE WAY OF DREAMS

By REGINALD L. HINE. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Study of dreams in general, their significance, their dramatic, imaginative and practical value.

ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN

EDITED BY C. H. COLLINS-BAKER

1/- NET
MONTHLY

1/- NET
MONTHLY

A SERIES DESIGNED WITH A VIEW TO PROVIDING THE ART-LOVER WITH A REPRESENTATIVE COLLECTION OF BEAUTIFUL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN. EACH PLATE IS ACCOMPANIED BY A DESCRIPTIVE, CRITICAL NOTE BY THE EDITOR.

CONTENTS OF PART 4.

- | | |
|---------------------------------------|------------------|
| Heracles | Scopas |
| The Blood of the Redeemer | Giovanni Bellini |
| Portrait of a Lady | Goya Lucientes |
| Moonrise on the Marshes of the Yare | John Crome |
| A Music Lesson | Frank Potter |
| The Holy Family | Michelangelo |
| The Music Lesson (Chelsea Porcelain). | |

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUS.

3 NEW NOVELS.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS, 6s.
Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc.

Times.—"Full of a galloping movement that is over-mastering."
Morning Post.—"We recommend our readers to get the book for themselves."
Pall Mall.—"A very fine piece of work."

THE LOST MAMELUKE.

By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.
A thrilling, vigorous narrative of Egypt in the days of the Mameluke ascendancy.

DAISY DARLEY;
or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN. 6s.
Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."
Daily News.—"A clever, attractive book. Mr. Ryan has made a genuine success in his delightful sketches of the subsidiary characters."

opportunity to step in, and now is her turn. Gerald Fraser, a young barrister, is determined to have Berice himself, and he hits upon a truly diabolical method of ridding himself of two rivals at one blow. He shoots Captain Lennox, one of Berice's admirers, and contrives that suspicion falls upon Raymond, who is arrested and tried, but the jury disagree. While Ralph is awaiting his second trial, Berice arranges his escape, which is safely negotiated, and Raymond is shipped to Australia. After a terrible experience at sea, he eventually lands in Australia, where he joins in a gold "rush." Berice meanwhile is under the impression he has been murdered at sea, and at last yields to the importunings of Gerald, and becomes engaged to him. At the last moment, however, she learns her lover is alive, and he is brought back to England to stand his trial. What happened at the trial, and how the guilty one is brought to justice, we will not reveal; but the reader need rest under no apprehension that he will be bored for lack of interest. Mr. Mansfield, it may be presumed, is desirous of affording his public entertainment, and there can be no possible doubt that he has amply achieved this.

ZOE THE GYPSY, by Hugh Naybard (Murray and Evenden, 2s. net). We must confess to disappointment over this book. From the author's previous achievements we had expected better things. The book is purposeless and feeble, and has not even the excuse of being humorous. The plot is disconnected and far-fetched, and the characters do not live, but move stiffly. Zoe, who turns out to be the daughter of the man who appears to be in love with her, is less unreal than the majority of the characters, but we cannot say we felt a great interest in her. The account of the bull fight is the only part of the book which is tolerable reading, and that is somewhat revolting, though it carries more conviction than any other incident.

Mr. Vincent Brown brings to his works a quality of detachment, a capacity for viewing men and women at an angle unknown to the majority. His theory of moral values is startling, and occasionally unconvincing. The point of view from which a person or an act is regarded would seem to him the vital consideration. It is not sufficient to feel compassion for a thief caught in the act; the emotion roused must be one of poignant pity that the culprit should ever have been tempted, a pity that seeks to blot out all moral disadvantage and induces an attitude almost apologetic. To judge the motive of any act is to ape the function of a god. To blame the theft and not the thief is the utmost we can hope for from poor human nature. To go beyond this is to run the risk of falling into the quagmire of expediency, where the outlines of both right and wrong grow blurred and the moral sense finally becomes amorphous. Amos Dalyn, the preacher of Bethsaida, is permeated with a sense of his own deficiency and an engulfing pity for the world in general, and his wife in particular. A handsome woman of some five-and-thirty, she and her husband separated some short time after their marriage, when her charms, distinctly of the flesh, had begun to awaken doubts in Amos, whose dreary and unpractical temperament had roused Caroline's most antagonistic instincts. The wife drifts into a life of self-indulgence, preferring the sordid shifts and debasing episodes of a casual existence to life with Amos. And we cannot wholly blame her. A man who at times is unable to appreciate the difference between real life and dream life, whose fear of judging others drives him into a morbid fear of inflicting pain, is hardly a stimulating companion. As inevitably happens, this shrinking from decisive action, even in self-defence, encourages Caroline's egotism. She swoops down on Bethsaida, demands further supplies from Amos' scant resources, and finally involves him in utter ruin and disgrace. She secures a valuable collection of watches from a house in the neighbourhood, loses her nerve, and finally hands them over to her husband, who wanders about the country with them in his pocket, quite unable to come to a decision as to what he shall do. We are reminded of the lady sketched by George Moore in "Evelyn Innes," who suffered agonies when she was called on to make the slightest choice, and took to her bed worn out with the strain of deciding between the merits of boiled sole or fried plaice. In the ultimate, Amos is accused of the theft, being discovered in the grounds of the house, feebly trying to find his way. He is found guilty, and serves a sentence of six months' imprisonment. He comes out of prison, and is joined by his little girl—whom he has never dared publicly to acknowledge as his daughter. The future of Amos, we conjecture, will be a replica of his past. He is a person of devastating amiability, who carries with him the moral infection of weakness and intolerable pacifism. We recall with regret Mr. Brown's earlier methods. The splendid isolation of the woman in "The Magdalene's Husband" dwarfs into utter and abject insignificance the feckless creature shown to us in CONSIDER THIS MAN (Chapman and Hall, 6s.).

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Balzac, Honoré de. "Gobseck." (Oxford University Press, 3s.)
 Barnes, R. Corell. "Out of the Blue." (Longmans, 6s.)
 Buxton, Noel. "With the Bulgarian Staff." (Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d.)
 Chadwick, Mrs. Ellis H. "Mrs. Gaskell." (Pitman, 5s.)
 Engelbach, A. H. "Anecdotes of Bench and Bar." (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.)
 Horsley, Canon. "How Criminals are Made and Prevented." (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.)
 Hannah, Ian C. "The Berwick and Lothian Coasts." (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)
 Le Roy. "A New Philosophy, Henri Bergson." (Williams and Norgate, 5s.)
 Rice, Cate Young. "Porzia." (Doubleday, Page and Co., 5s.)
 Whitten, W. "A Londoner's London." (Methuen, 6s.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation.

There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave—not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON.

POST TO US — GET THE BOOK.

POST IT NOW

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

Name

Address

CUT THIS CORNER

POST IT NOW

First in 1847—Foremost in 1913.

Bohn's Popular Library

Fcap. 8vo, each with designed title-page, binding, and end-papers, strongly bound in cloth.

One Shilling Net.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books," said Carlyle, "'BOHN'S PUBLICATION SERIES' is the usefulest thing I know," while Emerson said that "The translations of 'BOHN'S LIBRARY' have done for literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse." The continued success of the Libraries, founded in 1847 by Henry G. Bohn, and taken over by Messrs. Bell in 1864, has amply confirmed this glowing testimony.

The present re-issue of the Libraries at a still cheaper price, and in more handy form, will bring "Bohn"—already endeared to every discriminating book-lover—within the reach of a still wider public.

First List of 20 Volumes. Just Published.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. SWIFT (Jonathan). Gulliver's Travels. Edited by G. R. Dennis. 2-4. MOTLEY (J. L.). Rise of the Dutch Republic. With a Biographical Introduction by Moncure D. Conway. 3 vols. 5-6. EMERSON (R. W.). Works. A New Edition. Edited by George Sampson. Vol. I., Essays (1st and 2nd series) and Representative Men. Vol. II., English Traits, Nature, and Conduct of Life. 7-8. BURTON (Sir Richard). Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah and Meccah. Introduction by Stanley Lane-Poole. 2 vols. 9. LAMB (Charles). Essays. Including the Essays of Elia, Last Essays of Elia, and Eliana. 10. HOOPER (George). Waterloo. The Downfall of the first Napoleon. New Edition, with Maps and Plans. 11. FIELDING (Henry). Joseph Andrews. | 12-13. CERVANTES. Don Quixote. Motteux's Translation. Lockhart's Life and Notes. 2 vols. 14. CALVERLEY (C. S.). The Idylls of Theocritus, with the Eclogues of Virgil. English Verse Translation by C. S. Calverley. Introduction by R. Y. Tyrrell, Litt.D. 15. BURNEY (Fanny). Evelina. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Annie Raine Ellis. 16. COLERIDGE (S. T.). Aids to Reflection, and the Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit. 17-18. GOETHE. Poetry and Truth from my own Life. Revised Translation by M. Steele Smith. With an Introduction and Bibliography by Karl Breul, Litt.D., Ph.D. 2 vols. 19. EBERS (Georg). Egyptian Princess. Translated by E. S. Buchheim. 20. YOUNG (Arthur). Travels in France during the years 1787, 1788, and 1789. Edited by M. Betham Edwards. |
|--|--|

Extracts from the First Press Opinions.

"We wish immense success to this new venture."
Daily News & Leader.

"Nothing has given us such pleasure, present and reminiscent, as the reappearance of a famous and standard series in this inexpensive, elegant, and handy form."
Pail Mall Gazette.

"Every volume is worthy of its place on the scholar's bookshelf. . . . Messrs. Bell are to be congratulated on the spirited enterprise they are now so admirably carrying out."
Manchester Courier.

" . . . Every book-lover and every student of thought and ideas will applaud this enterprise of Messrs. Bell & Sons, who, by bringing out an edition of these books at the popular price of one shilling, have placed themselves in the position of public educators."
T. P.'s Weekly.

"The paper is thin but strong, and opaque enough only to show only one side of the page at a time. The print is bold, round, and clear; and we have found none of that distressing 'greyness' which means bad machines or careless machining. . . . We have no doubt that the bell on the cover is ringing in a prosperous life to those newly reborn."
Times.

"In every way a credit to their publishers."
Nation.

"A venture upon which Messrs. G. Bell & Sons are to be heartily congratulated. . . . Better value has never been offered for the nimble shilling."
Daily Telegraph.

"Bohn's Popular Library makes an excellent start. It contains no rubbish, and it cannot do other than meet with a reception as wide as it will be cordial."
Westminster Gazette.

WRITE TO-DAY for a copy of the detailed prospectus containing a history of the famous "Bohn's Libraries" from their inauguration to the present day.

G. BELL & SONS, Ltd., Portugal St., Kingsway, London, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 31. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MAY 16, 1913

One Penny.

FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, NATUS 1844, OBIT 1900

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of Nietzsche | 129 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 130 |
| Canada and Canadian Policy—By Augustus Bridle... .. | 131 |
| Ethics in an Age of Locomotion—By G. F. Barbour, D.Phil. | 132 |
| Women at Work. XI.—The Woman in Politics—By Margaret Hamilton | 134 |
| Nietzsche—By Charles Sarolea | 136 |
| Considerations Touching our Future State. Part II.—By Maurice Maeterlinck | 138 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. "The Cloister and the Hearth," by Charles Reade—By C. Sheridan Jones... .. | 139 |
| Bluebells—By J. W. Marriott | 140 |
| Spring—By Dorothy Eyre | 140 |
| Liselotte: A German Princess at the Court of Louis XIV. Part II.—By the Editor | 141 |
| The Man with the Brain of Gold—By Alphonse Daudet | 144 |
| Everyman's French Page. The Death of Napoleon—By Louis Adolphe Thiers... .. | 145 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Enterprise in Business... .. | 146 |
| George Borrow... .. | 147 |
| Cobbett's "History of the Reformation" | 147 |
| Conscription and the Workers | 148 |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? | 149 |
| The Typist | 150 |
| The Abolition of the Working Classes | 151 |
| Pacifism and Imperialism | 152 |
| Paganism and Christianity | 152 |
| The Dappled Paddock | 154 |
| The Use of Books to Working Men | 154 |
| Books of the Week | 155 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE outstanding event of the week has been the easing of the European situation. King Nicolas has agreed to surrender Scutari, and Turkey has joined the great Powers in giving her assent to the draft-treaty of peace. The only remaining difficulty is Greece, who naturally wishes to be reassured concerning the islands and the southern Albanian frontier. There is little doubt, however, that under her present competent leadership the matter will be settled without disturbing the present trend towards peace. It is safe to say that any of the Allies who fall out of line now will come under the most effective ban of Europe, and speedily be shown which way prudence lies. How long such moral compulsion can secure peace is another question.

The Australian Labour party is once more demonstrating its Imperial sympathies and its keen interest in national defence. The Australian Labourite, while he lays all the emphasis upon industrial reform that his profession demands, stands in sheer contrast to his English and Continental brother in his dislike of theoretical Socialism, his talent for foreign affairs, and his broad-gauged Imperial outlook. Whatever weaknesses the Fisher régime may have in the eyes of the Opposition—and extravagance seems to be the main charge brought against it by cautious Liberals—Tolstoyan principles and preoccupation with domestic affairs are not among them. National Defence has all along formed a very solid plank in the Labour platform, and now a scheme for the organisation of sea forces is well in hand, the programme including a number of cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, a supply ship, a naval college, a shipbuilding yard, and an aviation school. A floating dock and two naval ports are in process of construction, and a wireless rim has been carried more than half-way around the 12,000-mile coast.

In a very interesting article on the Albanian problem, by Chedo Miyatovich, appearing in Tuesday's Daily Telegraph, we are given a glimpse of Albanian ideals and aspirations from the inside. "The Albanians," says the writer, with a certain engaging naïveté, "are not only the bravest of men, but very intelligent and rather gifted. They have a great sense of honour, and even among the wildest of them the women are held in sacred respect." He goes on to give a picture of the type of king Albania is looking for. "But the future of Albania will depend far more on the character and ability of her first king than on any written Constitution. The first King of Albania must be in appearance and in character a fine soldier, a real knight, 'sans peur et sans reproche.' The Albanians, a fighting race and born soldiers, would follow only a man who is himself a good soldier. But that is not all that is wanted. That Royal soldier must be a statesman too. He must be dignified, a born king, yet at the same time quite democratic, accessible to every man and helpful to everybody. It is desirable that he should be well connected with the dynasties of the Great Powers, and that he should have a fair personal fortune. But these two last conditions are not absolutely indispensable. More desirable is it that he should be a man capable of inspiring the people with confidence in his devotion to their interests, and the Powers with confidence in his loyalty and honesty.

Old London will soon be as completely submerged as Pompeii. Drastic changes are in the air, and every spring-time rings the death-knell to a number of old landmarks. Fleet Street has once again fallen a victim to the puller-down, and this time it is the famous Bolt-in-tun, once a Carmelite House, but most of the time a tavern, and now almost the last survival of the old-time London coaching inn. A change of a different kind is likely to be brought about by the concentration of the thirty-two Colleges of London University in Bloomsbury. This may mean the transformation of Bloomsbury into a London Quartier Latin—a students' paradise, with no proctors to grieve the sensitive soul of the undergraduate with awkward inquiries and irksome rules. Some two or three thousand men and girls between the ages of eighteen and twenty-two are to enjoy a glorious liberty and perfect freedom of intercourse within this new University Quarter, and while some cautious Conservatives shake their heads over it, no trouble is anticipated by the enthusiastic promoters of the concentration scheme.

During the past month several religious periodicals have given special prominence to the problem of the work of the Church in the countryside, and the point of general interest emerging from the discussion is our practical ignorance of the conditions of British village life. We have a number of sane and competent investigators of the conditions of city life, but our practical knowledge of the conditions which govern life in our country districts—and these conditions vary considerably—is surprisingly meagre. What is wanted is a Charles Booth who will give us the life and labour of the people of the countryside of Great Britain. A number of really reliable commissioners who would inquire with practical thoroughness into the actual conditions, not only of the farm labourer, but of the small shopkeeper, the tradesman, and, in fact, of every individual who lives in a village community, might supply such data to the social reformer as would make his work a far less haphazard and discouraging task than it often is at present.

CANADA AND CANADIAN POLICY

A NATION AND A NAVY ❁ ❁ ❁ BY AUGUSTUS BRIDLE

I.

TWO political leaders unalterably opposed and absolutely dissimilar stand out before public expectation in that part of the Empire beginning at Prince Edward Island and ending at the Island of Vancouver. One is Right Hon. Robert Laird Borden, Premier of Canada since September 21st, 1911; the other is Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada until that date from June, 1896. The difference between these two leaders, if it could be fairly determined, constitutes Canada's position in the Empire of to-day.

And it was not so in 1896, when Laurier became Premier, nor in 1897, when Borden became leader of the Conservative party. Then the divergence was local. Now it is Imperial. And the struggle over the Naval Bill in the Parliament of 1912-13 has put an accent on Imperial issues in Canada as no election and no political struggle has done since Confederation.

In a nutshell, the struggle resolves itself into whether Canada shall contribute 35,000,000 dollars for a probable three "Dreadnoughts" to the Imperial Navy, or whether she shall spend that immediate amount of money in building warships in Canada, to be manned and maintained by Canadians. There is no question about spending the money for the purpose of naval defence. The problem is altogether as to the best means of doing it.

Empire, like other vast institutions, is largely a series of accidents. It is something of an accident that the Liberal party in Canada is opposed to a contribution, and the Conservative party in favour of it. The reverse might have been true. In 1899 the Liberals sent Canadian contingents to the South African War—to crush a people who desired a certain kind of autonomy. In 1913 Canadian Liberals, for the sake of their interpretation of autonomy, resist the attempts of the Conservatives to pass a Bill looking to the unity and preservation of the Empire in a time of war.

II.

Are Canadian Liberals less Imperially patriotic in 1913 than they were in 1900? Is Sir Wilfrid Laurier less of an Imperialist now than he was when the Parliament of Canada, controlled by his party, sent Canadian contingents to help conquer the Boers?

Probably not. Sir Wilfrid, who is, as he has long been, the most conspicuous figure in Canadian political life, reiterated to the writer just a few days ago that he became a Liberal by reading British Constitutional history. He made the same statement in 1895, when leader of the Opposition. He has not changed—his Liberalism is of a British origin.

But there are those who affirm that Sir Wilfrid, undoubtedly always a Liberal, has never been an Imperialist. The present attitude of his party confirms that view. Is it right—or wrong? The answer is largely one of definition.

And there is no issue that has ever been so mysteriously bedevilled in Canada as what people choose to call Imperialism. I am quite sure Sir Wilfrid considers himself an Imperialist. So does Mr. Borden. So—once in a while, at least—does Henri Bourassa, the brilliant Nationalist leader, who, at the time of the Boer War, broke with the Liberal party and founded Nationalism; at the election of 1911 cast in his lot with the Conservatives to defeat Laurier; and afterwards backed the Conservatives, largely because he and his followers disbelieved in both the Naval Bill and the Laurier Canadian Navy.

There is but one party—if such it may be called—that puts a clear accent on anything like Canadian independence. That is the Nationalist party, or phantom, whichever you choose. They are a minority of French-Canadians. And it is because of the balance of power which that party held in 1911, and the probable balance that it still retains, that Mr. Borden has in his Cabinet a Nationalist wing, and in his Naval Bill no explicit declaration of a permanent policy respecting contributions to the British Navy.

Such is the delicate relation between local and Imperial policies in Canada.

III.

Now, to determine the peculiar significance of this struggle over the Naval Bill in the affairs of Empire, it must be clearly understood how each party derives its point of view. In all Canadian political history since Confederation there has never been such a contest as for weeks past has raged on Parliament Hill between Conservatives and Liberals. Never has been such a deadlock. Never such a rallying of forces. Never such positions of no compromise on a question that has nothing whatever to do with tariffs, or trade, or immigration, or agriculture, or manufacturing, or the building of railways, or any of the chief problems that are supposed to engage the attention of a young autonomous country within a vast Empire.

The odd thing about it is that most of the political struggles in Canada have been over tariffs, and some over railways. It was a transcontinental railway scandal that in 1873 drove John A. Macdonald and the Conservatives out of office and put in Alexander Mackenzie. It was a tariff issue in 1878 that put Mackenzie out and Macdonald in as the practical author of the National Policy, designed to build up Canadian industries at the comparative expense of all competing industrialisms, including that of Great Britain. It was a tariff issue again in 1887, and again in 1891, that enabled Sir John Macdonald at one and the same time to oppose any form of commercial union with the United States, and to wave the old flag in the cause of a united Empire. So that the Conservative party from 1878 till 1891 achieved the paradox by putting the accent on both nationalism in manufactures and Imperialism in sentiment.

IV.

It was the Liberal party in Canada, from the time of the National Policy until the return of Laurier to power in 1896, and for some little time afterwards, that professed, not less attachment to the British connection, but more preference for freer, if not absolutely free, trade between Canada and the United States. Time worked some transitions. In the first place it was a political accident that enabled Macdonald to take up the National Policy before George Brown had time to reach it—when he was heading in that direction. It may have been less of accident and more of intention that caused the Liberals after 1896 to say less about free trade and more about a reasonable tariff for revenue.

And the tariff grew steadily higher; trade grew and population multiplied; railways were flung with prodigal magnificence across unoccupied areas; national sentiment, such as there was, began to develop; and, from being a bi-lingual country with a French root, Canada became a cosmopolitan country, with most of the languages of Europe and some of Asia. It was the Conservative Government that fathered the first transcontinental railway, the C.P.R.—in the interests of Canada, the Empire, and the Conservative party. It was the Liberal Government that fathered the second, the Grand Trunk Pacific, not yet completed; and fostered the third, the Canadian Northern, still in process of extension.

Under the Liberals the era of the race of railways and the planting of peoples came to its height. With unparalleled advantages of great natural resources, of incomparable land, of an aggressive people, and an age of material progress in the world at large, Canada was able to force her way to the front among all the over-seas dominions, and to practise the arts of peace on a scale that, in ratio to population, has never been equalled anywhere else in the world.

V.

But up till 1909 it had never been profoundly necessary for a Canadian political leader to declare himself emphatically on the question of a navy. What need had Canada of a navy? What need of direct contributions to an Imperial navy? Relatively—none.

"It ain't a navy we want," growled a lanky Westerner the other day on Parliament Hill; "what we want is more railroads and reciprocity. T'ell with the navy!"

This epigrammatic sentiment has been more blandly expressed by adherents of both parties in Canada, and it has been tacitly practised by masters of industry and national expansion. At the same time, the trade of Canada has been carried over the seas in perfect safety, without Canadian men-of-war or a dollar of direct contribution to the building of "Dreadnoughts." Canadian railways have been built and extended, steamship lines developed, and immigration increased, much owing to the lavish borrowings of British capital by Canadians. Without preaching Empire on a basis of either sentiment or trade, Canadian expansionists, under a Liberal régime, have been consolidating the ties of Empire. And it was good national business so to do.

VI.

But it has always been a sort of unwritten axiom in Canada that the greatest over-seas dominion is essentially a land of agriculturists. The colossal expansion of industries and trade and population was made possible because of the farmer, especially in the West. The production of wheat has increased in a ratio that made it possible to coin the flamboyant phrase, "Granary of the Empire." This phrase has been lavishly and magnificently worked in Great Britain for the sake of booming immigration.

At the same time, the multiplication of farmers in a vast area of land contiguous to a huge natural market made it a serious business with Canadian statesmen and politicians to consider the welfare of people whose produce was sent thousands of miles overland from West to East to the markets of Great Britain, and whose manufactured goods travel thousands of miles overland from the factories of the East. A measure of reciprocity began to look like a good stroke of business. It was the Liberals returning to their old love.

ETHICS IN AN AGE OF LOCOMOTION

By G. F. BARBOUR, D.Phil.

I.

"IN thousands of years, when, seen from the distance, only the broad lines of the present age will still be visible, our wars and our revolutions will count for little, even supposing they are remembered at all; but the steam-engine, and the procession of inventions of every kind that accompanied it, will perhaps be spoken of as we speak of the chipped stone of pre-historic times: it will serve to define an age."

In these words the characteristic feature of our time has been defined by its most brilliant thinker, M. Bergson; and although the idea is not unfamiliar—some might say it is a truism—it has implications that are not always realised. For let us place beside it another truism, that moral problems are constituted both for individuals and for groups of men by outward conditions, not in themselves directly moral. We then see that, if the steam-engine and its electrical rivals and successors form the chief fact of our age, the proper use of these manifold inventions may well be its chief moral problem. And if for the present we confine our attention to modern inventions as a means of transmitting men and ideas from one part of the globe to another, it can hardly surprise us that the present ethical task of mankind is largely determined by the great modern increase of locomotion.

It is true that we often speak and write (though perhaps not quite so often as our parents did) of the modern annihilation of space as being, beyond question or criticism, part of the general and triumphant progress of mankind. The wealth, both material and spiritual, of distant countries is brought to our doors; and this commerce of things and ideas adds enormously to the interest and variety of life—in the case, at least, of those who are fortunate enough to be able to take advantage of it. Severed friends can communicate quickly and cheaply, where before communication was almost entirely cut off; so that it is now possible for those whose work takes them to distant parts of the earth to retain many close ties with the homeland that they have left. All this, and much more, is true. But it is so habitually before our minds that it needs no repetition; while it may be worth while to turn to the other side of the picture, not because we have a preference for dark colours, but because it is well to recognise them when they are present.

II.

In this respect there is a close analogy between medical and moral problems. Of all the achievements of civilisation, there is none of which we are more justly proud than those of medical science. Here at least we are sure that the science and skill of the white man has benefitted the whole human race. Yet even here there is another tale to tell; and Sir Harry Johnston has lately told it in an essay which gives a ghastly catalogue of the diseases which the white man, in his passion for transporting other races as well as his own, has introduced into countries and continents where they were previously unknown. So it appears at times as if the healing inventions of civilisation were in danger of being outstripped by those locomotive inventions which have so gravely increased the problem which medical science is set to solve.

In the sphere of morals and customs a parallel process goes on. It is indeed true that ethical thought tends, like science, to become international, and there is at least the possibility that it may pass swiftly from land to land. But it often seems hard to bring this possibility into action—curiously hard, until we remember how peculiar and native to itself are the best customs of each people, and how slowly we adopt, or even understand, those of others. This fact, that it is always easier to copy the bad than the good customs of strangers, at once makes it clear why the mingling of races is often so dangerous morally, and why the meeting-points of the continents have so often been centres of corruption.

So it comes about that the increase of travel, which follows a period of good government and peace, brings not only opportunities of moral enrichment (as when the Persian rule in the sixth century B.C. first brought the idealism of the East to Egypt and thence to Greece, or when the pax Romana opened a path for the advance of Christianity), but also a considerable degree of danger. In the fusion of ethical standards, there is always a possibility of their total collapse; and that possibility is one which our age is especially called to guard against.

III.

But, in addition to the fusion of different races and ideals, we are also confronted by the instances in which races remain obstinately unfriendly and suspicious, although modern transit has brought them into close outward neighbourhood. Thence arises the "race problem," which is so widespread and in some lands so menacing. Europeans have penetrated Africa and Asia: they have taken Africans to America, whither Asiatics are now following. These great movements, with many minor ones, have caused a new intensity of racial rivalry and bitterness—a strange result in an age which claims to have deserted religious dogma in order to return to the ethic of the gospels.

Further, it seems probable that this process of race-mingling will be continuous rather than intermittent. In the past it has proceeded spasmodically. Obscure causes set some warlike race in motion, impelling them to attack a country more favoured than their own. This gave rise to migration, and then followed conquest; but, although the confusion and suffering so caused might be long drawn out, a new equilibrium and a new stability emerged. For the conquerors either imposed their language and customs on the conquered or adopted those of the latter, and so the two were gradually welded into one nation.

But strong forces were needed to start the process. The Aryans who invaded India in early times, or the Gauls and Goths who poured down upon the lands around the Mediterranean, must have been driven by some impulse of no common strength to cross the mountains which barred their way to the southern plains. And so most migrations and conquests were followed by an interval long enough to allow a new order to emerge in the subjugated country. But great racial movements, once intermittent and attended by many difficulties, have now become outwardly easy, and hence seem likely to prove continuous. It no longer needs exceptional enterprise and resolution for a large body of people to move to a distant land. There are now no Alps to cross: they have been penetrated in advance by tunnels. Or, if the ocean be the barrier, the steamship-agent is everywhere, and his mission in life is to show how it has been robbed of its terrors.

Hence it seems probable that, except in those cases where strong legal barriers are set up against immigration, instead of the torrent-like migrations of the old world, fierce while they lasted, but subsiding as quickly as they rose, the world will in future see a gradual, steady inter-penetration of different peoples. But this more continuous, less dramatic, form of race-movement, while it is happily free from the grosser turbulence and violence of the old, has difficulties of its own, one or two of these we have just glanced at.

IV.

Other branches of the same subject suggest themselves. It is tempting to diverge into a discussion of the psychical effect of the quick movements and transferences of modern life. For the individual is affected as well as the nation, and that though he never crosses the frontier of his native land. Dean Henson has said that one of the greatest difficulties of the modern preacher is that he can seldom keep his audience long enough to influence them profoundly, so constant are the comings and goings of our modern city-dwellers. But this remark is capable of a wider application; until we find ourselves questioning whether the modern gain in width and variety of experience is not often more than counter-balanced by the loss of that stability of character and centrality of conviction which demands a settled environment for its growth. But these questionings all run up into the larger doubt whether we have not ourselves been mastered by those very instruments which we have evolved for the mastering of Nature. It may be that this is Nature's revenge on her too daring child,—or, if man cannot be too daring, then on the child who has forgotten that the secret of his true life lies in the supremacy of Spirit, and not merely of inventive intellect, over the powers of the natural world.

Certain it is that, as regards a great part of civilised life, "things are in the saddle, and ride mankind." The words are truer than when Emerson wrote them; and they lead us to ask whether a reaction will come, and a return to other ideals. Perhaps to some they will bring a longing for a science, which the Greeks would have named "architectonic," which should open our eyes to the proportions of things, and teach us the due—the truly human—use of our new-found control over the material. Such a science of life would teach us that man shows himself truly master of space and what it contains, not so much when he "annihilates" it by his inventions, which may but bring him into a new subjection, as when he transcends its limitations by his power of finding significance in all places and all circumstances.

But this train of thought is carrying us into cloud-land, whereas it was the object of this paper to remain on the prosaic ground of fact. The fact that man moves about on the surface of his planet with a speed and a persistence unknown in the past is both obvious and prosaic; yet we have seen that it possesses a grave ethical significance, and that it is moulding, and will mould yet more decisively, our life and its tasks. So it is that our inventors and engineers—nay, our chauffeurs and airmen—have shown themselves strong enough to dictate the problem which moralists, educationalists and statesmen must strive for the next generation or two to answer.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

We hope to begin in our next issue a New Series of special interest—"Great Cities of the World"—on the same lines as our parallel series, "Great Countries of the World."

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

XI.—THE WOMAN IN POLITICS

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

THE democratisation of politics has opened the doors to feminine activities, and allowed woman to play a prominent part in the affairs of government. From time immemorial she has been a factor in things political, a secret but determining force; but to-day, with flags flying and banners spread, she has taken the field, and, in those departments to which she is admitted, has shown a marked capacity for administration and control.

Feminine tact and the power of persuasion have always made her invaluable to Parliamentary candidates. It is an axiom that one woman canvasser is worth three men, and a refractory voter who has resisted the persuasions of innumerable male callers will yield to the blandishments of a pretty woman and meekly accompany her to the poll.

The beautiful Duchess of Devonshire, who promised the blacksmith a kiss for a vote, and won what appeared a hopeless contest by the bribe, has her modern prototype. Society women, in smart motors and exquisite gowns, smile at slum dwellers and go into ecstasies over poor little ragged babies at election times, however oblivious they may be of their existence at other seasons. But, for the most part, women take these things seriously nowadays, and are far from content to play a minor part.

Recalling the thunders of denunciation that the suggestion of women as members of representative bodies have from time to time called forth, it is interesting to note the important part that they have played in the careers of some of our most famous statesmen and notable politicians. Mrs. Gladstone was the confidante of her husband's ambitions, the sharer of his secrets, with whom he took counsel as to his most cherished schemes. She made it her business to shut out from his knowledge all household disturbances or domestic jars, careful to preserve his peace of mind and equanimity of spirit, no matter at what cost. She accompanied him on his political campaigns, was invariably present in the Ladies' Gallery of the House of Commons when he made one of his important speeches, and was ready and waiting, serene and smiling, to accompany him home after a stormy debate.

Lady Beaconsfield, wife to the great statesman's rival, played as important a part in her husband's career as did Mrs. Gladstone. A simple woman, undistinguished by brilliancy of intellect or subtlety of comprehension, she possessed a power of affection, a wealth of devotion inexpressibly sustaining to the restless temperament of her famous husband. It is told of her that, driving with him one night to the House in the days when he was known as Disraeli, the carriage door was accidentally shut upon her hand, smashing her fingers. She endured the most terrible agony, but controlled herself with such courage that not a cry of pain broke from her lips. Disraeli was to make a great speech that night, and, had he learnt of the accident, would infallibly have been unnerved and unequal to the task. Not till the debate was over and he had scored a brilliant triumph did he learn what had occurred. One can imagine with what a wealth of gratitude and tender reproach he greeted her. One can conjure up the vision of her smiling through her tears.

Widely divergent in character and attainment, these two men, giants of their generation, were alike in their simple, unaffected recognition of the debt they owed to the unselfishness and devotion of their womenkind.

One of the most touching sights of modern times was the spectacle of Mr. Henry Fawcett, the blind Postmaster-General, leaning on the arm of his wife, who led him from the carriage into the House night after night. She acted as his secretary, and was his chosen confidante and counsellor. To deny a woman of Mrs. Fawcett's force of intellect and practical knowledge of affairs the right to take an active part in the governing of the country was an anomaly that the Local Government Act of 1889 was framed to destroy.

By the provisions of this Act the County Councils were constituted, and, though it was designed to include the admission of women as members, owing to a technical error in the wording of the clause, the provision was defeated, and, though women were elected, they were not allowed to sit, save under the penalty of a heavy fine. Since that date the Act has been amended, and at the present moment women can sit, and do sit, side by side with men in the Council Chamber, though it is a notable fact that the number of female candidates is extraordinarily small.

The Borough Councils have attracted a larger number of enterprising women, who have done good work in securing the abolition of slums and improving the housing conditions of the poor generally.

Women have always been eligible to serve as Poor-law Guardians, and some of the finest and most lasting work in social reform are due to their efforts. But the activities of the political woman of to-day demand wider scope than that afforded by the patient service and quiet endeavour necessary to the proper performance of the duties of a guardian of the poor! Man is at times an illogical animal, and, while loudly declaiming that women shall not vote, contentedly permits her to play a considerable part in matters of local legislation.

Women councillors are concerned with framing regulations as to housing, the making of roads, the improvement of drainage, the licensing of music-halls, the administration of the Shop Hours Act, and of the tramway systems. They are part and parcel of the bodies empowered to inspect slaughter-houses, dairies, to check adulteration of food, and to secure decent conditions in public lodging-houses. Under their control are the infirmaries, the workhouses, the granting and withholding of small luxuries to the aged, the boarding out of young children. Man does not shrink from allowing the political woman to inspect his meat, control a part of his amusements, look after his aged poor, or arrange for his infant delinquents. She can help to decide whether or no he can take a tram and what he shall pay for his journey, the width of his roads, the elevation of his houses—the very hours at which he may or may not buy the 'baccy for his pipe. All these things, and more also, he places in her hands, but, having given her power and authority over him to a fuller extent than the majority realise, like the Bishop of Rummyfoo, he draws the line at unexpected places and refuses to give her a Parliamentary vote—having already permitted her to exercise local franchise.

It is no part of the writer's aim in this article to argue for or against the granting of Votes for Women, but the fact remains that, having admitted the feminine element in constructive politics to the extent shown above, it is a farce to refuse the symbol of the power already given.

That woman is able not only to combine but to subordinate individual aims to a general object has been shown in a striking fashion during the recent increase in the price of food. The women of France took drastic steps and put a stop to the shopkeepers' exaction. They formed a Consumers' League, advanced on the markets of Paris and the principal provincial towns, interviewed the trembling purveyors of edibles, and proceeded to dictate their terms. If the tradesman accepted their offer and abated his price well and good, peace was restored; if not, these notable and excellent housewives took a short way with recalcitrants and effectively demolished their stalls. The whole thing was carried through with the neatness and dexterity for which the feminine genius is remarkable, and prices fell and tradesmen covered before their masterly and sagacious tactics.

It is that same quickness for detail and accuracy of observation that makes the political woman so successful a speaker. Less florid than the average man, more fluent, and free from redundancy, her criticism is sharp and to the point; and though, as a rule, her point of view is less original than her masculine neighbour's, and the matter of her speech less provocative of thought, the manner of its delivery, the conciseness of its statement, reaches a level that leaves the average man far behind.

There are a number of committees in London concerned with the problem of the woman in industry, and for the politically ambitious there is no field where a better training in public speaking and the arts of administration and organisation is afforded. There are a large number of periodicals devoted to the discussion of industrial questions, and of these the majority are run by women, who have already made a steady advance in the political world.

Each day finds a new organisation founded by the woman in politics, and having for its aims and objects the carrying out of a definite programme either of construction or destruction. And this brings me to the discussion of the woman militant, the revolutionary who has abandoned a constructive programme for a policy of demolition.

The constitutional Suffragettes have included many notable women. Mrs. Fawcett for years was the guiding spirit of the movement, and with her were closely associated Lady Henry Somerset, one of the greatest women orators, and Lady Wynford Phillips. At the present moment there are twenty-one suffrage societies in England, and of these seven are militant. The first societies were formed as far back as 1867, drawn from families associated with both political parties. Thirteen Women's Suffrage Bills have been introduced in the House of Commons. Of these, seven have passed second reading. It is claimed that there had been a majority in the House of Commons in favour of Votes for Women since 1886, but that it has never become law owing to the manœuvres of the various Governments in power, the Bill having been blocked, postponed, crowded out, and so never advanced beyond the stage of second reading.

Public meetings in favour of the extension of the franchise rapidly increased. It is roughly estimated that in 1911 these amounted to some 5,000, a number which was nearly doubled in 1912. One of the most remarkable demonstrations ever witnessed in London was the procession of some 40,000 women from the Embankment to the Albert Hall, of all ages and conditions.

The woman in politics usually springs from the upper and middle classes. The working woman, the mother of a family, the wife of a labouring man, has no time to make speeches, listen to arguments, or indulge in propaganda. Only when she is moved by the sense of pressing necessity for immediate action does she move aside from her arduous path. Witness the records of some of the smaller unions that have been organised in the teeth of the most adverse circumstances, and sustained only by heroic self-sacrifice. These things apart, the woman worker is not attracted by politics; a vote is to her emptied of concern. The prospect of an added shilling to Bill's wages is a far more vital matter.

Whether, if the militant Suffragettes made the betterment of industrial conditions a plank in their platform, they would succeed in enlisting the help and enthusiasm of the woman of the working class is open to question. Personally, I do not think it likely.

"God bless you, miss," said a cheery charwoman, the mother of five sturdy babies, and wife to a slow-brained but irreproachable bricklayer, "they must have somewhere to talk by theirselves, men must. If it ain't Parliament, it's the pub—same thing! They likes to have their say without our hearing of them, and so long as they bring their wages home reg'lar, let 'em have it, I say. It don't interfere with us, and it amuses them—men must have somewhere to talk by theirselves."

The function of Parliament, as expressed by this good lady, is one held by the majority of women in the East End.

"Vote!" said an irate housewife to me, when I meekly solicited her help in regard to her husband, "no, that he shan't! Ten year an' more we've lived here, and twelve year in the next street, and never has he done anything so disrespectable as to vote!"

I retired before this amazing testimony to the disreputability of politics, and left the lady in possession of the field.

The political woman, whether in the suffrage movement or elsewhere, can generally earn a fair income if she be a good speaker. This, of course, does not apply to Councillors, but to the political free lance, who for a fixed sum is ready to speak with eloquence on Tariff Reform, Free Trade, for or against the Insurance Tax, or on any subject that is on the tapis, and in which she believes, for, and this is an important point to note, the woman in politics is, as a rule, uncompromisingly honest. She must speak from conviction or not at all, and her presence in a movement, as on the council of a public body, inevitably makes for purity and the disappearance of corruption.

The Suffrage Societies of England are officered by women, and the journals connected with the associations are edited and managed almost entirely without male aid. It is a tribute to the capacity and industry of woman that in nearly every case these papers and periodicals have achieved a triumphant success, both from a financial and journalistic point of view. It remains to be seen whether the propaganda will prove as triumphant as their circulation.

The vote is but the symbol of the power a public woman already possesses. It has yet to be decided if man, who has already given her power over his trams, will permanently deny her access to a ticket! Whether or no she gains the shadow, she is already in possession of the substance.

The woman in politics has come to stay!

NIETZSCHE BY CHARLES SAROLEA

THE English reader is now in possession of a complete translation of Nietzsche, in the admirable edition published by T. N. Foulis, and edited by Oscar Levy, of which the eighteenth and concluding volume has just appeared. To the uninitiated I would recommend as an introductory study: (1) Professor Lichtenberger's volume; (2) "Ludovici Nietzsche" (Is., Constable), with a suggestive preface by Dr. Levy; (3) the very useful summary of Mr. Mügge—an excellent number in an excellent series (Messrs. Jack's "People's Books"; (4) Dr. Barry's chapter in the "Heralds of Revolt," giving the Catholic point of view; (5) Mrs. Förster-Nietzsche: "The Young Nietzsche"; and (6) An essay by the present writer, published as far back as 1897, and which, therefore, may at least claim the distinction of having been one of the first to draw attention in Great Britain to the great German writer. But a searching estimate of Nietzsche in English still remains to be written. And there is only one man that could write it, and that man is Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton. I confidently prophesy that a study of Nietzsche, if he has the courage to undertake it, will be Mr. Chesterton's greatest book. He will find in the German heretic a foe worthy of his steel.

I.

Like the history of most great thinkers, like the history of Kant and Schopenhauer, the biography of Nietzsche is totally barren of incident, and can be disposed of in a few lines. Born in 1844, apparently of noble Polish extraction ("Nizky," in Polish means humble), the son of a clergyman, and the descendant on both sides of a long line of clergymen, the future "Anti-Christ" spent an exemplary, studious, and strenuous youth. After serving his time in the army—he was considered one of the best riders of his regiment—and after a brilliant University career at Bonn and Leipzig, he was appointed, at twenty-four years of age, Professor of Greek in the University of Bäle. His academic activity extended over eleven years, and was only interrupted in 1870 by a few months' service in the Ambulance Corps, during the Franco-German War.

His first book, "The Birth of Tragedy," appeared in 1871. Like most of his books, it was published at his own expense, and, like most of his books, it did not find a public. The three first parts of his masterpiece, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," were such a desperate failure that Nietzsche only ventured to print fifty copies of the fourth and concluding part, and he printed them merely for private circulation amongst his friends, but he only disposed of seven copies!

In 1879 he resigned, owing to ill-health, with a pension of £120. After his retirement he spent a nomadic life wandering from Nice to Venice, and from the Engadine to Sicily, ever in quest of health and sunshine, racked by neuralgia and insomnia, still preaching in the desert, still plunging deeper and deeper into solitude. And as the world refused to listen to him, Nietzsche became more and more convinced of the value of his message. His last book, "Ecce Homo," an autobiography, contains all the premonitory symptoms of the threatening tragedy. It is mainly composed of such headings as the following:—"Why I am so Wise," "Why I am so Clever," "Why I Write such Excellent Books," and "Why I am a Fatalist."

Alas! fatality was soon to shatter the wise and clever man who wrote those excellent books. In 1889 Nietzsche went mad. For eleven years he lingered on in private institutions and in the house of his old mother at Naumburg. He died in 1900, when his name and fame had radiated over the civilised world, and when the young generation in Germany was hailing him as the herald of a new age. England, as usually happens in the case of Continental thinkers, was the last European country to feel his influence; but in recent years that influence has been rapidly gaining ground, even in England, a fact abundantly proved by the great and startling success of the complete edition of his works.

II.

Most writers on Nietzsche—and they are legion—begin with extolling him as a prophet or abusing him as a lunatic. I submit that before we extol or abuse, our first duty is to understand. And we can no longer evade that duty. We cannot afford any longer to ignore or dismiss the most powerful force in Continental literature, on the vain pretence that the author was mad, as if the greatest French thinker of the eighteenth century, Rousseau, and the greatest thinker of the nineteenth century, Auguste Comte, had not fallen victims to the same disease.

And, on the whole, Nietzsche is not difficult to understand, although there has arisen a host of commentators to obscure his meaning, although Nietzsche himself delights in expressing himself in the form of cryptic and mystic aphorism, although he continuously contradicts himself. But apart from those difficulties, his message is strikingly simple and his personality is singularly transparent. And his message and his personality are one. He is a convincing illustration of Fichte's dictum, that any great system of philosophy is the outcome, not of the intellect, but of a man's character. Nietzsche is not a metaphysician like Hegel, whom he abhorred. He is not a "logic-grinder," like Mill, whom he despised. He is a moralist, like the French, whom he loved. His culture and learning were French even more than German. He was steeped in Montaigne, to whom he has paid a glowing tribute in "Schopenhauer as Educationalist." He was a careful student of the great French classics of the seventeenth and eighteenth century. He read and annotated Guyau, with whom he had many points in common. By a curious coincidence, a few years before the advent of Nietzsche, a great French thinker had anticipated every one of Nietzsche's doctrines, and had expressed them in one of the most striking books of the French language. And by an even more curious paradox, whilst every European critic devotes himself to-day to the interpretation of Nietzsche's philosophy, they systematically ignore—as Nietzsche himself ignored—the masterpiece of the Frenchman.

III.

Let us, then, first keep in mind that Nietzsche is not a metaphysician or a logician, but he is pre-eminently a moralist. His one aim is to revise our moral values and to establish new values in their place. For Nietzsche does both. There are two poles to his thought. He is an iconoclast, but he is also a hero worshipper. He is a herald of revolt, but he is also a constructive thinker. Even in his earliest work, "Thoughts out of Season," whilst he destroys the two popular idols of the day, the theologian and the historian, he sets up two new heroes, Schopenhauer and Wagner.

IV.

We have said that Nietzsche's philosophy is strikingly simple. Its whole kernel can be expressed in two words. He is a systematic pagan, and he is an uncompromising aristocrat. As a pagan, he is a consistent enemy of Christianity. As an aristocrat, he is a bitter opponent of democracy. He proclaims that anti-Christ has appeared in his own person. He hails the advent of the Superman.

First, he is a pagan, a pagan of Greece, or, rather, a pagan of the Renaissance, and, as a pagan, he considers Christianity the real enemy. Christianity denies life; Nietzsche asserts it. Christianity mainly thinks of the future world; Nietzsche has his feet firmly planted on Mother Earth. Christianity glorifies meekness and humility; Nietzsche glorifies pride and self-assertion. Christianity defends the poor and the weak; Nietzsche contends that the strong alone have a right to live. Christianity blesses the peace-makers; Nietzsche extols the warriors. Christianity is the religion of human suffering; Nietzsche is a worshipper of life and proclaims the joyful science, "die fröhliche Wissenschaft," the "Gaya Scienza."

It is impossible within the limits of a short article to discuss Nietzsche's view of Christianity. We are concerned here not with discussion, but with exposition. At an early opportunity we hope to deal at some length in the columns of EVERYMAN with Nietzsche's criticism of Christianity. For the present, let it be sufficient to say that no theologian would be prepared to accept his interpretation of the Christian religion. The everlasting conflict of spirit against sense and brutal force, which is the essence of Christianity, is hardly conducive to passivity. It is, on the contrary, a consistent discipline in modern heroism. There is not much meekness about the Jesuits or the warrior Popes. Nor is there much melancholy about St. Francis of Assisi or St. Theresa. The only smiling countenance in a hospital is the Sister of Mercy. The only active resisters under the despotism of Henry VIII. were Sir Thomas More and a broken octogenarian priest, Cardinal Fisher.

V.

The same fundamental instinct or principle, the same defiant optimism, the same exultation in the pride of life which makes Nietzsche into an opponent of Christianity, also makes him into an opponent of democracy. The same belief in force, in the will to power, which makes Nietzsche into a pagan also makes him into an aristocrat. For the political expression of Christianity must needs be democracy. We are democrats because we are Christians, because we believe in the essential dignity of man. On the contrary, the political outcome of paganism must needs be despotism and aristocracy. We believe in despotism and aristocracy because we believe in the natural inequality of man, because we believe in force and pride and self-assertion, in the power of the strong to oppress the weak. Nietzsche is against the oppressed and for the oppressor; for the Superman, against humanity. For in Nietzsche's view an aristocracy is the ultimate purpose of life.

But Nietzsche is not an aristocrat, like the ordinary Darwinian. He does not believe in the survival of the fittest like the typical evolutionist. He does not believe that a survival of the fittest will come about mechanically by the mere play of blind forces. Regression is as natural as progression. No one has pointed this out more convincingly than Huxley in his "Evolution and Ethics." The progress of the race is not natural, but artificial, and accidental and precarious. Therefore Nietzsche believes in artificial selection. The Superman is not born, he must be bred. Nietzsche is the spiritual father and forerunner of the Eugenists.

And he is also the spiritual father of the Imperialists and latter-day Militarists. The gospel of the inequality of the individual implies the gospel of the inequality of race. The gospel of Nietzsche has not only been anticipated by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, but by his much more influential German namesake, Mr. Houston Stuart Chamberlain, the author whose books the Kaiser liberally distributed amongst his generals and advisers. The doctrine of force, the belief in the German people as the salt of the earth, the self-gratification of the modern Teuton, can be traced directly to the influence of Zarathustra, and it is significant that the latest German exponent of Imperialism, General von Bernhardi, should have selected an aphorism of Nietzsche as the quintessence of his political philosophy.

"War and courage have achieved more great things than the love of our neighbour. It is not your sympathy, but your bravery, which has hitherto saved the shipwrecked of existence."

"What is good?' you ask. 'To be braced is good.'"

VI.

Quite apart from any elements of truth contained in Nietzsche's Ethics, the first reason for his popularity is, no doubt, the perfection of his form and style. Nietzsche is one of the supreme masters of language, in a literature which counts very few masters of language, and the beauty of his style is transparent even in the disguise of a foreign translation.

The second reason is that Nietzsche, who imagined that he was fighting against the times, was in reality thinking with the times, and he has met with a ready response, in the dominant instincts of the present age, in the aggressive materialism, in the race for wealth and power. The Supermen and the Super-races of to-day only too cordially accept a philosophy which seems to justify extortion, aggression, and oppression in the name of a supreme moral principle.

The third and most important reason, and the real secret of Nietzsche's influence, is the fine quality of his moral personality. However much we may be repelled by the thinker, we are attracted by the magnetism of the man, by his noble courage, by his splendid integrity, by his love of truth, his hatred of cant. Even though he has himself misunderstood Christianity, he has done a great deal to bring us back to the fundamental ideals of the Christian religion. He has done a great deal to undermine that superficial and "rose-water" view of Christianity current in official and academic Protestant circles. He has done a great deal to convince us that whatever may be the essence of Christianity, it has nothing in common with that silly and pedantic game which, for half a century, has made Eternal Religion depend on the conclusions of "Higher Criticism," and which has made theology and philosophy the handmaidens of archæology and philology.

Nietzsche is a formidable foe of Christianity, but he is a magnanimous foe, who certainly brings us nearer to a comprehension of the inmost meaning of the very doctrines he attacks. And it is quite possible that the Christian champion of the future may incorporate Nietzsche in his apologetics, even as St. Thomas Aquinas incorporated Aristotle, even as Pascal incorporated Montaigne. It was in the fitness of things that Nietzsche should be the descendant of a long line of Protestant ministers. For, indeed, he is the last of the true German Protestants, ever ready to protest and to defy and to challenge. He is the noblest of modern German heretics.

* Nietzsche's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," First Part, 10th Speech.

CONSIDERATIONS TOUCHING OUR FUTURE STATE. PART II. BY MAURICE MAETERLINCK

From his volume, "La Morte" (Fasquelle). By permission of the Author

I.

AS soon as man ventures too far into the regions beyond the tomb, he strikes against strange obstacles and breaks his wings. If we admit that our ego does not remain for ever what it was at the moment of our death, we cannot then conceive that at a given moment it ceases, stops all development and growth, reaches its perfection and fullness, to be no longer aught but a kind of stray, unchangeable, in suspension in eternity, a finite thing in the midst of what will never end. That were indeed the only true and veritable death; and the more terrible in that it would put an end to a life and mind without parallel, by the side of which those that we possess here on earth would not weigh even as much as a drop of water in comparison with the ocean, or a grain of sand against a mountain chain. In a word, either we believe that our evolution will one day cease, which is an incomprehensible end, and an inconceivable kind of death, or we admit that it will have no end, and hence, being infinite, it takes all the characteristics of the Infinite, and must be lost and merged in it. Indeed, this is the ultimate conclusion of theosophy, spiritualism, and all religions by which man, in his supreme state of bliss, is absorbed into God. And this again is an incomprehensible end; but it is at least life. And then, weighing incomprehensible against incomprehensible, after doing everything humanly possible to understand one riddle or another, let us preferably choose the greatest and therefore the most probable, the one which contains all the others, and beyond which there is nothing left. Otherwise questions rise up again at every step, and the answers are always deferred. And questions and answers lead us to the brink of the same inevitable abyss. Since we must arrive at it sooner or later, why not approach it straightway? All that happens to us in the meantime has doubtless its effect upon us, but it does not hold us back, since it is not eternal.

So we are now brought face to face with the mystery of universal consciousness.

II.

Though we are not capable of understanding the working of an Infinite which reflects on itself in order to apprehend itself, and consequently define itself and separate itself from other things, this is no sufficient reason for declaring it an impossibility, for if we rejected all those realities and impossibilities which we do not understand there would be nothing left of what constitutes our life. If this consciousness exists under the form which we conceive, it is clear that we shall have our part and place in it. If anywhere there is consciousness, or some thing replacing consciousness, we shall exist in that consciousness or that thing, since we cannot be elsewhere. And since that consciousness or thing in which we shall exist cannot be in a state of misery—for it is impossible that the Infinite exists only to cause its own misery—we also shall not be in a state of misery. Lastly, if the Infinite into which we are to be launched has no consciousness of any kind, nor anything to take its place, it must be because consciousness or its possible equivalent is not indispensable to eternal bliss.

III.

This is, roughly, I think, the assurance that may for the moment be given to the soul, anxious in view of the unfathomable space into which death will soon launch it. Accepting this assurance, it may hope for all that it has dreamt of, it will perhaps be less afraid of what it feared. If it prefers to remain in suspense, to admit no one of the hypotheses I have put forward, to the best of my ability and without partiality, it still seems difficult not to welcome at least the great certainty to be found at the bottom of each, namely, that the Infinite wishes us no ill, seeing that if it were to bring everlasting torment to the least among us it would be bringing torment to something it cannot separate from itself, and consequently to the whole of itself.

IV.

I have added nothing to the sum of human knowledge. I have only attempted to separate the possibly true from the certainly false; for, even if one does not know where truth is to be found, one still learns where it is not. Perhaps, moreover, in our search for this undiscoverable truth, our eyes will have grown accustomed, by gazing upon it, to pierce the terror of that last hour. There are, no doubt, many things left that others will say with more force and more brilliance. Yet let us not hope that on this earth anyone will pronounce the word that will put an end to our questionings. On the contrary, it is highly probable that nobody in this world, nor perhaps in the world to come, will discover the great secret of the Universe. And, if we only reflect, it is well that it should be so.

V.

We have not only to resign ourselves to live in the incomprehensible, but to rejoice at the impossibility of getting beyond it. If there were no more unsolvable problems nor unsearchable riddles, the Infinite would not be infinite; and then we should indeed have to curse bitterly that fate which set us in a Universe proportioned to our understanding. The entire existing world would be nothing more than a prison with no outlet, an irreparable evil and blunder. The unknown and the unknowable are, and possibly always will be, necessary to our happiness. In any case, I would not wish for my worst enemy, were his power of thought a thousand times greater and more lofty than mine, that he should be condemned to dwell for ever in a world of which he had surprised one essential secret, and of which, while still a man, he had begun to have some understanding.—Translated by M. D. Honey.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

"THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH," BY CHARLES READE

THE one great epic of that most fascinating period, the Middle Ages, which our language affords, "The Cloister and the Hearth," stands supreme as the most masterly achievement of Charles Reade, a novelist whose claims to greatness, it has always seemed to me, have never been fully recognised. Swinburne, indeed, gave the palm to that remarkable novel, "Griffith Gaunt"; but then Swinburne, like other supreme poets, was but a poor critic (witness his disparagement of Whitman), and there can be no doubt whatever that the mature judgment of posterity will place the masterpiece we have selected this week as towering above all other works from the same hand. Reade wrote many novels; some that were, if truth be told, a little dull and prosy; many that were brilliant, fascinating, astonishingly clever. In one only did he surpass himself and definitely take his place among the immortals. This he achieved with a work that will last as long as our language itself, and will move generations unborn to laughter, to pitying tears, and to that thrill of breathless excitement which no one could rouse like he. Reade, in a word, succeeded in "The Cloister and the Hearth" in performing that supreme miracle of literary production. He gave the world a work that somehow we feel was greater than its author.

It was in the pages of a long defunct journal called Once a Week, and under the title of "A Good Fight," that the story first appeared, embellished with some wonderful illustrations from the pencil of Charles Keane. According to the legend, the circulation of Once a Week rose 20,000 on its appearance; but differences developed between Reade and the editor, who insisted, among other things, on the usual happy ending, and the author closed the story abruptly, with a pang of suppressed rage that many a lesser serial writer has been made to feel. There was, however, a special reason for Reade's anger, for the story illustrated, though, as we shall see, with a curious difference, the tragedy of his own life, and for that very reason he assented, with the worst grace, to the editorial mandate, which was as foolish from a business as it was impossible from an artistic point of view. Much time elapsed before the novel was developed and perfected into its present form; but, just as the sixteen years that Gray spent over the Elegy were more than justified, so, too, was Charles Reade in devoting months and years of his life to a work that in its complete form has not a rival in the whole realm of our literature.

The writing of "The Cloister and the Hearth" imposed a strain on the author that none of his other works required of him, and he vowed that, once finished, he would never again go outside his own age for material. He had taken the Middle Ages, it has been said, not because he loved, but because he knew them best. Probably, however, the one followed on the other. In any case, there is no doubt that he saturated himself, not only in the literature of that elusive and much-misunderstood period, but he did not rest content till he had mastered almost every phase, every bypath of its wonderfully vivid and extraordinarily arresting life. He captured the very spirit of the Middle Ages, and he made those times live for us again. To read "The Cloister and the Hearth" is to turn your back on the twentieth century, with its drabness, its imperfections, its inefficiency, its mystifying lack of fellowship, which permeates all classes, and to be back in an environment, repulsive indeed, from a thousand points of view, tinged, and more than tinged, with cruelty, lacking things that nine-tenths of us could not do without, but so, as one thinks, in tune with the soul of man, and infinitely resplendent with colour, with the gorgeous pageants of State, with the crowded processions that thronged the roads, with the feasts and the fighting and the triumphs, in all of which the common people shared. With one swift touch does Reade bring them before our eyes. Phillip, Earl of Holland, is entertaining all and sundry in a magnificent style the while he decides in a competition

"for the best specimens of orfèvrerie in two kinds, religious and secular: item, for the best paintings in white of egg, oils, and tempera; these to be on panel, silk, or metal, as the artists chose: item, for the best transparent painting on glass: item, for the best illuminating and border-painting on vellum: item, for the fairest writing on vellum. The burgomasters of the several towns were commanded to aid all the poorer competitors by receiving their specimens, and sending them with due care to Rotterdam at the expense of their several burghs."

Gerard, the hero, is a competitor, and when he goes to enter the gate of the courtyard he finds a young girl and her father, whose cousin is within, refused admission.

"I am a competitor, sir," he says.

"What is your name?" and the man eyed him suspiciously.

"Gerard, the son of Elias."

"The janitor inspected the slip of parchment he held in his hand:

"Gerard Eliassoen can enter."

"With my company, these two?"

"Nay, these are not your company: they came before you."

"What matter? They are my friends, and without them I go not in."

"Stay without, then."

"That I will not."

"That we will see."

"We will, and speedily." And with this, Gerard raised a voice of astounding volume and power, and shouted so that the whole street rang:

"HO! PHILIP, EARL OF HOLLAND!"

"Are you mad?" cried the porter.

"HERE IS ONE OF YOUR VARLETS DEFIES YOU."

"Hush, hush!"

"AND WILL NOT LET YOUR GUESTS PASS IN!"

"Hush, murder! The Duke's there. I'm dead," cried the janitor, quaking.

"Then suddenly trying to overpower Gerard's thunder, he shouted with all his lungs:

"OPEN THE GATE, YE KNAVES! WAY THERE FOR GERARD ELIASSOEN AND HIS COMPANY! (The fiends go with him.)"

Here we have the Middle Ages brought before us in a flash in all their simplicity, directness, and strength. Had the incident occurred to-day, of course, Gerard would have been powerless. He would have had to fill up a form, which would have been referred in turn to a sub-committee, who would have reported, say, six months later. But in those days it sufficed, as we have seen, for a man to lift up his voice to gain his just point. Democracy and the ballot-box have altered all that.

There is another magnificent scene, where the two comrades are trapped in a mill, and on guard in the upper apartment against a band of robbers who are coming on them from below. One they kill, and Gerard, the artist, thus illuminates his face:

"Of the staring eyeballs he made globes of fire; the teeth he left white, for so they were more terrible; but the palate and tongue he tipped with fire, and made one lurid cavern of the red depths the chapfallen jaw revealed; and on the brow he wrote in burning letters 'LA MORT.'"

The corpse they hang up, and it strikes the oncoming band with terror.

At last Gerard reaches Rome, and persuades his comrade to go back to poor Margaret. Denys finds that she is about to be a mother, and that she has had no news of Gerard till he brings her her lover's letter. The story then rapidly develops. I have said that it resembles in some respects the tragedy of Reade's own life, which was that the beautiful and accomplished woman, whom he loved with all his soul, and who lies buried with him, could not become his wife. Gerard's fate was that he could not marry Margaret. While he is away, some of his family convey false news to him—that Margaret is dead. He plunges at once into a sea of dissipation. Recovering from that, he enters a monastery and becomes a monk. This is how he visits his wrath on the family that he has so loved when he learns that he has been deceived. That family are all waiting, as it happens, for Margaret to share their meal with them, when there enters:

"A Dominican friar livid with rage. He was at the table in a moment, threw his tall body over the narrow table, and with two hands hovering over the shrieking heads of Cornelis and Sybrandt (the two brothers who had deceived him), like eagles over a quarry, he cursed them by name, soul and body, in this world and the next. It was an age eloquent in curses; and this curse was so full, so minute, so blighting, blasting, withering, and tremendous, that I am afraid to put all the words on paper. 'Cursed be the lips,' he shrieked, 'which spoke the lie that Margaret was dead; may they rot before the grave and kiss white hot iron in hell thereafter; doubly cursed be the hands that changed those letters, and be they struck off by the hangman's knife and handle hell fire for ever; thrice accursed be the cruel hearts that did conceive that damned lie, to part true love for ever; may they sicken and wither on earth, joyless, loveless, hopeless; and wither to dust before their time; and burn in eternal fire.' He cursed the meat at their mouths, and every atom of their bodies, from their hair to the sole of their feet. Then, turning from the cowering, shuddering pair, he tore a letter out of his bosom and flung it down before his father."

Gerard lives on to forgive the two evil brothers who had altered the letter, and to know his little son, that son who became the great Erasmus; he became himself a great force and a mighty orator in the Church, and saw poor Margaret grow to know something like resignation. Gerard performed the last offices of the Church over her when she died. It is a dreadful story, one of the most poignant that has ever been penned, and in nothing more masterly than that the author makes both hero and heroine live on and achieve, maimed creatures though they are.

But I think the most consummate touch of pathos in the work is the fate that overtakes, not Gerard, but another. The two evil brothers, who ruined his life, always counted on getting the old people's hoard of savings when they died. But the old mother, who had nursed them in their first sleep, tends them in their last, and follows them to the grave. She lives on beyond all her children, to nurse and tend the grandchildren that come after, and, in the exacting daily service that is the lot of woman, she lives to forget much, so that her darling Gerard and his tragic story is as something that has never been.

C. SHERIDAN JONES.

BLUEBELLS

A CARPET of wonderful blue-mauve has been laid in woodland and coppice—a faëry haze that mocks one with a sense of unreality. Everyone must have seen it with a sense of delight and enchantment, for the aerial colour and the dreamy, intoxicating scent of wild hyacinths arrest one like a miracle. We remember once sailing round Carlingford Loch, and at the foot of the Mourne Mountains we saw the distant bluebells as a rich mist. On approaching we witnessed one of the loveliest pictures imaginable by an artist mind—stretches and stretches of bluebells under the tall trees and in the mountain shadows; and, since the green was above the blue, we got a curious impression of a topsy-turvy world, where the sky was down instead of up. At our very feet the bluebells sprang in myriads, and wandered on in countless multitudes, rising and falling with every undulation, lifting suddenly in a bank of mauve mist, and farther away breaking through an undergrowth—a bewitching glimpse of colour, impalpable and entrancing.

Yet our artists and poets have strangely neglected this beauty of the bluebell. It is true that Ruskin praised the garden hyacinth and advised a man to sell his coat to buy one. The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table also proclaimed the blue hyacinth as his favourite flower. But there is one great feature of wild hyacinths which their cultured sisters have lost altogether—a wonderful quality which belongs to no other flower. For bluebells are spoilt by being gathered. Children by the roadside offer us bunched handfuls for a copper, but all their charm has gone. People thus taking the flowers en masse (and generally cramming them into a jam-jar) destroy at once the aery impression, and one gets instead a solid and substantial colour from which all enchantment has fled. Placed loosely and carelessly in a tapering vase, one gets the effect of emerald and sapphire in a fountain of gems. But the real ecstasy of bluebells as they grow in the woods is precisely that feeling of hazy unreality, of misty dreams. There is a suggestion of rapid, swirling movement, a mazy motion; it gives one a sense of dancing, of a flower waltz. No other flower, wild or cultivated, possesses this sensation of glamour, of unsubstantiality, of dizzy speed. It is like a fairy ballroom. But to seize and bunch the flowers together is to rob them of this exquisite and luxurious charm.

Whilst watching their dreamy waltzing beneath the forest trees one can imagine he hears the subtle chimes of innumerable peals of bells—sweet, high-pitched polyphonic music, lighter than the thinnest spray and rhythmic with the cadences of the dance.

J. W. MARRIOTT.

SPRING

LAST evening we gathered hawthorn—the first of the year.

It was beautiful to find its delicate, white, clustered masses; while its fragrance floated around on the wings of dreams, so subtle, so alluring.

We found violets, too, pale, divinely tinted, modest little faces hidden deftly among the willow and star-grass, eluding all but the determined seekers.

The winter has been so dark and dreary; the hedges seemed so long in wakening to the vibrant touch of Spring. But now it is here—they are all smiling beneath the sun's warmth, and the cuckoo's cry, faint and sweetly persistent, sounds musically across the sandhills, and I love it all so much.

DOPOTHY EYRE.

LISELOTTE: A GERMAN PRINCESS AT THE COURT OF LOUIS XIV.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

I.

With characteristic outspokenness, "Madame" admits that "Monsieur" was sorely disappointed on first meeting her. He expected a plain bride, but the reality exceeded his anticipations. "When I reached St. Germain, I felt as if I had dropped from the sky. I put on as pleasant a face as I possibly could. I saw full well that I did not please My Lord and Master, but there was no witchery in that, considering how ugly I am. So I took the resolution to live with him so amicably that he would get accustomed to my ugliness, and put up with me, which, in fact, is what actually happened."

However, the first years of the marriage were not unhappy. "Monsieur," if not affectionate, was deferential. "Madame" was sensible, and indulged her husband's weaknesses. Both agreed to differ. "Madame" received many a pleasant visit from her friends and relatives in Germany. Both her brother, Charles Louis, and her beloved aunt, Sophia of Hanover, came to Versailles, witnessed Liselotte's growing favour, and basked in her popularity. The birth of three children proved a firm bond between a couple who otherwise had nothing in common.

II.

After about six years of married life, relations became gradually strained. But even then "Madame" found ample compensation in the friendship of the King. Louis found pleasure in the sallies of his sister-in-law. He appreciated her outspokenness, her sound judgment and common sense. He relished her quaint language and her strong German accent. He delighted in taking her out hunting, in making her his confidential adviser. On the other hand, "Madame" felt unbounded admiration for his Majesty. If we are to believe the gossip of the Court, as we find it retailed in the Memoirs of the times, in the "Correspondence" of Mme. de Sévigné, and if we read between the lines of "Madame's" Letters, she very soon got to feel something more than friendship and admiration for Louis. It was the King who had fallen in love with the first Duchess of Orleans: now it was the second Duchess who fell in love with the King. There is at least this advantage in Mme. de Sévigné's version, endorsed as it is by the most recent biographer of Liselotte, Mme. Arvede Barine, that, if we accept her view, it becomes much easier to understand the unbounded hatred which Liselotte came to feel for Mme. de Maintenon. That hatred was not due to any incompatibility of temperament, or to wounded vanity, rather did it originate in female jealousy. The "Widow Scarron," the "Sultana," the "witch," had ousted Liselotte from the affections of King Louis.

III.

After the birth of her daughter, in September, 1676, a complete change took place in the relations of "Madame," both to her husband and to her brother-in-law. "Monsieur" fell more and more under the influence of his minions, and subjected his wife to petty humiliations. The King ceased to pay her attentions. He ceased to take out his sister-in-law for drives to Marly and hunting parties in the forest of Fontainebleau.

Liselotte attributes the change to the intrigues of the minions and of the odious "Sultana." The truth is that the cause of the estrangement lay much deeper than mere personal machinations.

In the first place, there were the racial differences between the French character and the character of Liselotte, which was thoroughly German. Unlike most Germans, who so easily merge their national peculiarities, she refused to be assimilated, to adapt herself to the atmosphere of the Court. She retained her idiosyncrasies. With truly German tactlessness and indiscretion, she criticised every French custom and institution. Imbued with an overweening pride of birth, she insisted on her prerogatives. She was intractable in matters of etiquette. She proclaimed the superiority of the ancient German nobility over the upstart French "Noblesse." She even claimed superiority for German sausages and German sauerkraut over the refinements of the French cuisine. She was merciless in her judgments of the leading personages at Court, and, as her letters were periodically opened by the post and copied in the "Black Cabinet," she made herself, in a very short time, countless enemies.

Nor must we forget the fatal effect produced by her outspokenness in matters of religion. "Madame" was a most liberal Christian, and almost a freethinker. She had remained at heart a Protestant, and her religious heresies gave all the more offence and scandal, because since the King's illness and operation the French Court had become more and more devout and more and more orthodox. Louis was already preparing for the systematic expulsion of the Protestant element.

IV.

Until the end of her life she remained convinced that it was Mme. de Maintenon who was, above all, responsible for her estrangement from the King. Her abhorrence for the Sultana, of the "witch," became a fixed idea and obsession. Every trait of her character, every strong feeling and passion combined to inspire her with an ineradicable repulsion. The reserve and discreet manner of the favourite was abhorrent to her impulsive and outspoken disposition. Her pride of birth despised the upstart governess and the widow of a low-class poet and jester. But above all her jealousy could not forgive Madame de Maintenon for having alienated from her the one man she loved and admired.

When we read to-day the "Correspondence" of Liselotte, we receive the impression that "Madame" had only herself to blame, and that Mme. de Maintenon was more sinned against than sinning. It was natural enough that "Madame" should impute the responsibility of all her grievances to the "Widow Scarron." Mme. de Maintenon was supposed to be omnipotent, and therefore it was almost inevitable that she should be made answerable for everything that happened. No doubt themorganatic wife of Louis could not feel any sympathy for the proud German. It would have been too much to expect of her, that she should requite the implacable hatred of "Madame" with kind offices of friendship. But we have no reason to suppose that Mme. de Maintenon went out of her way to do any disservice to the King's sister-in-law. The hatred was all on one side. Secure in the love of the King, Mme. de Maintenon could afford to despise and ignore the passionate outbursts of her implacable and impotent German enemy.

V.

Humiliated and persecuted by her husband, estranged by the King, Liselotte found little consolation in her children. She might have derived some satisfaction from her only daughter, who was dutiful and affectionate, but at eighteen years of age she was married to the Duke of Lorraine, and was lost to her mother. The tyranny of etiquette made it impossible for the one to visit the other, except on conditions which were unacceptable to the King's Majesty.

Her only son, the famous and infamous Regent-~~that~~ was-to-be, although clever, kind-hearted and respectful,

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME

No form of bathing accomplishes such perfect cleanliness as the combined HOT-AIR and VAPOUR BATH. It not only cleanses the outer surface, but also opens the pores, eliminates impure matters, and stimulates a healthful flow of—life's principal—the blood, clears the skin, recuperates the body, quiets the nerves, rests the tired, and creates that delightful feeling of invigorated health and strength.

PHYSICIANS AGREE THAT "FOOT'S" is THE BEST CABINET

and recommend its use for the prevention and cure of Colds, Influenza, Rheumatism, Kidney and Liver Troubles, Skin Diseases, &c. A FOOT'S Cabinet possesses every desirable feature of efficiency, and has several exclusive advantages, including Improved Outside Heat and Vapour Generator, Adjustable Seat, and Heat Regulator. The Bather is not fastened to the Cabinet; Exit is Easy and Immediate; No Assistant required. Can be used in any room, and folds into a small compact space.

Our "Bath Book," No. 20, contains much interesting information not generally known about Thermal Bathing, and illustrates and describes our Cabinets in various qualities. Sent Free on request.

FOOT'S

(Dept. B. 30),

171, New

Bond St., London, W.

PLAYER'S Navy Mixture

Out of the sweetest and ripest leaves of the tobacco plant "pipe perfect" Player's Navy Mixture is made.

Player's Navy Mixture is everything that a tobacco can be.

It is cool and even burning, with a bouquet as distinct and delicate as that of some rare vintage wine.

Then fill your pipe with this best of Mixtures and know all the joy that a perfect tobacco can bring.

IN THREE STRENGTHS:

Mild 5^{D.} per oz. Medium 5^{D.} per oz.

White Label 4^{1/2} D. per oz.

much, so that is as something that grew up to be as vicious, in another way, as his depraved father. Before he was twenty the corruption of a perverse Court had tainted him to the marrow. But what grieved her even more than the misconduct of the Duke de Chartres was the misalliance which he was prevailed upon to enter into with Mlle. de Blois. That the great-grandson of a King of England and the grandson of a King of France should agree to marry the bastard daughter of Mme. de Montespan was the crowning humiliation which embittered the remainder of her days.

VI.

In 1699 "Monsieur" suddenly died of apoplexy, after a violent fit of anger with his Royal brother, followed by a too copious dinner. "Monsieur" had always overtaxed his truly Royal stomach, which was as characteristic of the Bourbons as the eagle nose, and he fell a victim to his intemperance. The death of her husband reduced Liselotte more than ever to the mercy of Louis. The King, as always, proved generous. Liselotte retained most of the pensions which had been granted to the Duke of Orleans, and as her income was henceforth at her own disposal, instead of being squandered on her husband's favourites, she was now much better off than in the lifetime of her lord and master.

But it was one of the conditions of the King's favours that "Madame" should make peace with Mme. de Maintenon. The proud German Princess had to humiliate herself before the ex-governess. The vindictive woman had to forget and to forgive. The outspoken and impulsive character had to dissemble and to restrain her outbursts of temper. The scene of reconciliation, which has been graphically described by Saint Simon, took place with a liberal display of goodwill on the part of Mme. de Maintenon, and, on the part of Liselotte, with abundant outbursts of repentance and promises for the future. But the reconciliation proved only superficial and ephemeral. Outward forms were observed, but the hatred was more unrelenting than ever, having gathered strength from the public humiliation.

VII.

One may wonder, with her biographers, why Liselotte, on the death of "Monsieur," did not retire to Germany, or, as had been provided in her marriage contract, why she did not take advantage of the seclusion and peace of a convent, the favourite retreat and refuge of Royal widows in those religious times. But various reasons made her prefer the solitude of Versailles and St. Cloud. Although not a tender mother, it is possible that she did not want to part from her only son. Moreover, to a heretic like Liselotte, the atmosphere of a convent was uncongenial. Nor did she possess the financial means to keep up her position in Germany, and she was too proud to accept a subordinate place in her native country, after having occupied an exalted position in France. And, finally, she hoped for an imminent change which might bring deliverance from the odious tyranny of the "Sultana." So many ladies had possessed in turn the fickle heart of Louis. Why should not a new favourite arise and take the place of the "Widow Scarron"? Or why should she not herself be restored to the Royal friendship? And thus did pride and prejudice, maternal love and human illusion combine to detain her in France, and thus, until the end of her days, she continued to occupy with her dogs her private apartments at Versailles and her palace at St. Cloud.

VIII.

For fifteen years she had to wait for the great King to disappear from a scene which he had filled for seventy-two years, having ruled longer than any sovereign of modern times! When the change did come it was too late. No doubt she breathed more freely when her detested rival returned to St. Cyr, and took up once more her natural vocation as a governess, after having been for thirty years the uncrowned Queen of France. But Liselotte sincerely regretted the old King. He had been kind to her in her youth, and she had never ceased to love him. Her son had now become Regent of France, and she herself was now the first lady in the realm. And she would have been more than woman if her vanity had not been flattered under the changed circumstances. On the other hand, she less than ever approved of the ways of her family. Her son was addicted to women and gambling. Her granddaughter, the Duchess of Berry, astonished even a corrupt Court with her continuous scandals. Of real political influence Liselotte had none. The Regent, rather than listen to the counsels of his mother, preferred to follow the advice of the infamous Cardinal du Bois, or of the upstart Edinburgh financier and adventurer, John Law, of Lauriston, who, with his Mississippi schemes, eventually ruined half the nobility of Versailles, and turned Paris into a gambling den.

IX.

And even if Liselotte, after her long years of constraint and humiliation, had been disposed to rejoice in her new position, her capacity of enjoyment was rapidly giving way at the approach of age and illness. Her health had been excellent as long as she had been able to take exercise, but during the last years of Louis' reign disfavoured and seclusion, as well as the tyranny of etiquette, had condemned her more and more to a sedentary existence. Her form, which had always been ample, now became every day more massive and unwieldy, and made motion increasingly difficult. Her intellect had lost none of its keenness and activity. Under the freer atmosphere of the Regency, she indulged to the full her natural bent for moralising and speculating. She corresponded with the greatest philosopher of the age, Leibnitz, and with the rising generation of German thinkers. Whilst Louis XIV. had become more and more devout with advancing age and increasing infirmities, Liselotte became more and more a freethinker, and railed more and more against superstition and sacerdotal tyranny. Her undaunted spirit saw the approach of death without terror. Until the end she plied her incisive pen, and continued to entertain her German friends with her interminable epistles. She died at seventy years of age, only preceding her son, the Regent, by one year. She had spent exactly half a century in France. Since she left Heidelberg, in 1672, she had never seen again the smiling hills and vineyards of her native country that she loved so well.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

It is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

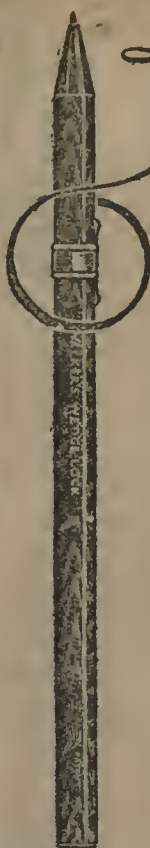

- | | |
|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Compositor. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace,
Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

That little Wedge holds the lead rock steady—always. Just release the wedge and push the lead forward and pull back the ring to grip it firm.

Walker's Wedge-Lock Pencils

have a propelling lead which is as steady as a cedar wood pencil. Handy for the pocket. Made in black vulcanite.

Sold in three sizes by all Stationers.

1/- 1/3 1/6

Write for illustrated leaflet No. 5 and name of nearest dealer to

JOHN WALKER & CO., Ltd.,
Farrington House,
Warwick Lane, E.C.

Let a Canada Life Annuity bring Peace, Comfort and Security to You.

To the man or woman who has passed middle age, a Canada Life Annuity offers unquestionably the most attractive prospect among all forms of investment. It carries with it a high yield and entire freedom from all financial worry. It provides the means for additional comfort and materially helps to prolong life.

OVER 13% WITH COMPLETE SECURITY.

A man of 69 investing £1,000 in a Canada Life Annuity receives a fixed and certain yearly income of £132 16s. for the rest of his life. Rates for other ages are equally attractive.

ESTABLISHED IN 1847, the Canada Life is the oldest Colonial Assurance Office, and occupies a position second to that of no Life Assurance Institution in the world. Its books are periodically inspected by officials of the Canadian Government, and annuitants are protected by the funds of £10,000,000 sterling.

Write for Special Annuity Booklet (post free)

Canada Life Assurance Company

CANADA LIFE BUILDING,

15, King St., Cheapside, London, E.C.

THE MAN WITH THE BRAIN OF GOLD

BY ALPHONSE DAUDET

THERE was once a man who had a brain of gold; yes, a brain all of gold. When he came into the world the doctors thought the child would not live, so heavy was his head and so huge his skull. He survived, however, and flourished in the sun like a beautiful olive-tree: only his great head always embarrassed him. And it was pitiable to see him, when walking, knock his head against the furniture.

He often tumbled. One day he fell from the top of a flight of steps and knocked his forehead against one of them, which was of marble, when his cranium clanged like metal.

It was thought that he was dead, but on lifting him up only a slight wound was found, and surrounding it were two or three specks of gold clotted in his fair hair. It was thus that his parents learnt that the child had a golden brain.

The thing was kept secret, the poor little chap himself suspecting nothing. From time to time he would ask why he was not allowed to play with the boys in the street.

"You would be stolen, my beautiful treasure," replied the mother. At that time the little chap was very much afraid of the idea of being stolen; and so, without saying anything, he returned to play by himself, trailing himself sadly from one room to another.

At the early age of eighteen his parents revealed to him the monstrous gift which destiny had bestowed upon him; and as they had brought him up, and nourished him up to that time, they demanded of him a little of his gold.

The youth did not hesitate. In that same hour—how, by what means, the legend does not tell—he extracted from his skull a nugget of gold, a piece as big as a walnut. This he fiercely flung on his mother's lap; then, dazzled by the riches which he carried in his head, befooled by desires, drunk with his power, he quitted the paternal roof, and went away into the world, squandering his treasure.

From the way in which he lived his life, royally, scattering his gold without counting it, one might have thought that his brain was inexhaustible. In reality, it was becoming used up, and in proportion one could see his eyes grow dim and his cheeks become hollow.

At last, one day on the morning after a foolish debauch, the unhappy man found himself alone among the débris of the feast as the lights were waxing pale. It was then that he discovered the enormous inroad he had already made in his treasure. From that day his was a new existence. The man with the golden brain went away to live in retirement by the work of his hands. He became suspicious and fearful as a miser, fleeing temptation, and trying to forget the fatal riches which he no longer wished to touch.

Poor creature! A friend had followed him into solitude, and this friend knew his secret. One night the unfortunate man was awakened out of his sleep by a pain in his head, a frightful pain.

He dressed himself distractedly, and saw, by the rays of the moon, the friend who, in running away, was hiding something under his cloak. One more piece of brain was being filched from him.

Some time after, the man with the brain of gold fell in love. And this time all was lost. He loved from the bottom of his soul a little blonde, who loved him too, but who also loved ornaments, white plumes, and smart shoes bedecked with dainty bows. In the hands of this darling creature—half-bird, half-doll—his gold pieces stood for all that was pleasurable. She had a thousand caprices, and he could not say no to her. For fear of giving her pain, he hid from her, even to the end, the sad secret of his fortune.

"We are very rich!" she would say.

The poor man would reply, "Ah, yes, very rich!" and he would laugh lovingly at the little blue bird that was innocently pecking at his brain.

Sometimes, however, fear held him, when he resolved to economise. But then the little woman would come running to him and say, "My husband, my very rich husband, buy me something beautiful—and very expensive." And he would buy her something beautiful and very expensive.

This lasted for two years; then one morning the little woman died—no one knew why—like a bird. The treasure was coming to an end. With that which remained to him the widower thought he would provide his beloved with a beautiful funeral. There should be tolling of bells, heavy coaches draped with black, horses adorned with plumes: nothing now appeared to him too costly. What mattered his gold to him now! He gave of it to the Church, to the bearers, to the dealers in artificial flowers. He gave it everywhere without bargaining, so that on leaving the cemetery there remained to him almost nothing of his marvellous brain—in fact, only a few grains clinging to the walls of his skull.

He was seen walking the streets with an abstracted air, his hands before him, stumbling like a drunken man. That evening, when the shops were lighted up, he stopped before a large shop-window, in which a medley of dresses and of finery was displayed in the light, and stayed for a long time looking at a pair of blue satin shoes, trimmed with swan's-down.

"I know someone whom these shoes will please," he smilingly remarked, remembering no longer that the little woman was dead.

He entered for the purpose of buying them. From the back of her shop the shopkeeper heard a bitter cry, and ran forward, but drew back in fear upon seeing a man leaning against the counter, regarding it dolefully, with a stupefied air. He held in one hand the blue shoes bordered with swan's-down, and presented the other, all bloody, but with scrapings of gold clinging to the nails. This is the legend of the man with the brain of gold.

LITERARY COMPETITION

The Editor of EVERYMAN offers a prize of Two Guineas for the Best Essay on "The Working of the Medical Insurance Act: Criticisms and Suggestions," the essay not to exceed 1,800 words. All entries for this competition should be addressed to the

COMPETITION EDITOR,

21, Royal Terrace,

Edinburgh,

and must reach him not later than June 1st. It is recommended that the essays be typewritten.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

BY LOUIS ADOLPHE THIERS

La Mort de Napoléon.

ENFIN s'ouvrit cette année 1821, qui devait être pour Napoléon la dernière de sa grande existence. Au commencement de janvier il éprouva une amélioration de quelques jours, mais qui ne se soutint pas. "C'est un répit d'une semaine ou deux, dit-il, après quoi la maladie reprendra son cours."

Il dicta encore à Marchand quelques pages sur César, et ce furent les dernières. A peu près à cette époque on apprit par les journaux la mort de sa sœur Elisa. Il y fut très-sensible. C'était la première personne de sa famille qui mourait depuis qu'il avait l'âge de raison. "Allons, dit-il, elle me montre le chemin; il faut la suivre." Bientôt les symptômes qui s'étaient déjà produits reparurent avec toute leur force. Napoléon avait le teint livide, le regard toujours puissant, mais les yeux caves, les jambes enflées, les extrémités froides, l'estomac d'une susceptibilité telle qu'il rejetait tous les aliments avec accompagnement de matières noirâtres. Le mois de février s'écoula ainsi sans aucune amélioration, et en amenant au contraire des symptômes plus graves. Ne digérant aucun aliment, l'auguste malade s'affaiblissait chaque jour. Une soif ardente commençait à le tourmenter; son pouls si lent s'anima et devenait fébrile. Il aurait voulu de l'air, et il ne pouvait en supporter l'impression. La lumière le fatiguait; il ne quittait plus les deux petites chambres où étaient tendus ses deux lits de campagne, et se faisait transporter de l'un à l'autre. Il ne dictait plus, mais il se faisait lire Homère et les guerres d'Annibal dans Tite-Live, ne pouvant se les faire lire dans Lolybe qu'il n'avait pu se procurer.

Le mois de mars amena un état plus grave encore, et le 17, désirant respirer librement, il se fit mettre en voiture, mais à peine en plein air il faillit s'évanouir, et fut replacé dans le lit où il devait expirer. "Je ne suis plus, dit-il, ce fier Napoléon que le monde à tant vu à cheval. Les monarques qui me persécutent peuvent se rassurer, je leur rendrai bientôt la sécurité." . . . Les fidèles serviteurs de Napoléon ne le quittaient pas. Marchand et Montholon veillaient jour et nuit à son chevet, et il leur en témoignait une extrême gratitude. Le grand maréchal demandant pour sa femme la permission de le visiter: "Je ne suis pas bon à voir, avait-il répondu. Je recevrai madame Bertrand quand je serai mieux. Dites-lui que je la remercie du dévouement qui l'a retenue six années dans ce desert."

Il était ainsi arrivé aux derniers jours d'avril, n'ayant aucune espérance, n'en cherchant aucune, et regardant sa fin comme très-prochaine. Il résolut alors de faire son testament.

Il consacra plusieurs jours à arrêter ces dispositions, puis à les écrire, et s'interrompit à diverses reprises, vaincu par la fatigue et les souffrances. Enfin il en vint à bout, et, fidèle à son esprit d'ordre, il fit rédiger un procès verbal de la remise à ses exécuteurs testamentaires de son testament et de tout ce qu'il possédait, afin qu'aucune contestation ne pût s'élever après sa mort. Il recommanda qu'on observât à ses funérailles les rites du culte catholique, et que sa salle à manger, dans laquelle on lui disait la messe, fût convertie en chapelle ardente. Le docteur Antomarchi, écoutant ces prescriptions adressées à l'abbé Vignale, ne put se défendre d'un sourire. Napoléon trouva que c'était manquer de respect à son autorité, à son génie, à sa mort. "Jeune homme, lui dit-il d'un ton sévère, vous avez peut-être trop d'esprit pour croire en Dieu: je n'en suis pas là. . . N'est pas athée qui veut." Cette leçon sévère donnée en des termes dignes du grand homme expirant, rempli d'embarras le jeune médecin, qui se confondit en excuses, et fit profession des croyances morales les plus saines.

The Death of Napoleon.

THE year 1821 came at last, that year that was to terminate the wondrous career of Napoleon. At the commencement of January his health improved, but only for a few days. "It is a respite," he said, "of a week or two, and then the disease will resume its course."

He then dictated a few pages touching Cæsar to Marchand; they were the last he wrote. About the same time he saw the death of his sister Eliza announced in the papers. It pained him deeply. She was the first person of his family that had died since he had attained the use of reason. "She has shown me the way," he said; "I must follow." The symptoms of his disease returned now with greater violence than ever. Napoleon's complexion became livid, his glance was expressive of as much power as ever, but his eyes were sunken, his legs swelled, his extremities became cold, and his stomach rejected every species of food, and these ejections were accompanied by a discharge of blackish matter. February brought no other change than an increased intensity of the symptoms. Not being able to digest any food, the august invalid became weaker every day. He was tormented by intense thirst, and his pulse, once so slow, beat with feverish rapidity. He wished for air, though he could not endure it when admitted. The light pained him, and he now never left his rooms, in which were his two camp-beds, being removed occasionally from one to the other. He did not dictate any more, but had Homer read to him, and the account of Hannibal's war in Livy, not having been able to procure Polybius.

His health became still worse in March, and on the 17th, thinking that during a short drive he could breathe more freely, he was put into a carriage; but when brought into the air he very nearly fainted, and was borne back to the bed in which he was to die. "I am no longer," he said, "that proud Napoleon whom the world has so often seen on horseback. The monarchs who persecute me may set their minds at rest; I shall soon remove every cause of fear." Napoleon's faithful servants never left him. Montholon and Marchand remained day and night by his bedside, an attention for which he showed himself profoundly grateful. The great marshal asking permission for his wife to visit him; "I am not fit to be seen," he said; "I shall receive Madame Bertrand when I am better. Tell her that I thank her for the devotion that has kept her for six years in this desert."

Having now reached the last days of April without any renewal of hope, or wishing for it, and considering his end as very near, he determined to make his will.

Napoleon devoted several days to making these arrangements and committing them to writing. His labour suffered frequent interruptions from pain and weariness. All was arranged at length, and, with his usual love of order, he had a legal document drawn up of the transfer of his will, and all that he possessed,

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

2nd Edition brought up to date.

WITH THE TURKS IN THRACE.

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT. Illustrated. Map.
Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

By A. FILON. Royal 8vo. With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 15s. net.

DAUBER.

By JOHN MASEFIELD. 3s. 6d. net.

RUE AND ROSES.

By ANGELA LANGER. Introduction by W. L. COURTNEY. 5s. net.

THE PLAYS OF OLD JAPAN

(The Nô). By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc., Ph.D. With translations of four of the plays. Preface by Baron Kato, the Japanese Ambassador. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

Mr. Heinemann begs to announce the publication of ELEANOR MORDAUNT'S new novel, LU OF THE RANGES.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

| | | |
|-----------------------------------|----------------------------------|---------------------|
| LU OF THE RANGES | - - - | Eleanor Mordaunt |
| VIRGINIA | - - - | Ellen Glasgow |
| GOSLINGS | - - - | J. D. Beresford |
| THE AMBASSADDRESS | - | William Wriothesley |
| THE LIFE MASK | By the Author of "He Who Passed" | |
| THE WEAKER VESSEL | - - | E. F. Benson |
| WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO...? | (2nd Imp.) | E. Robins |
| GROWING PAINS | - - - | Ivy Low |

Heinemann's Shilling and Sevenpenny Novels are the best.
Write for List.

THE ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN

EDITED BY C. H. COLLINS-BAKER

1/- NET
MONTHLY

1/- NET
MONTHLY

A SERIES DESIGNED WITH A VIEW TO PROVIDING THE ART-LOVER WITH A REPRESENTATIVE COLLECTION OF BEAUTIFUL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN. EACH PLATE IS ACCOMPANIED BY A DESCRIPTIVE, CRITICAL NOTE BY THE EDITOR.

CONTENTS OF PART 4.

| | | |
|---------------------------------------|-------|------------------|
| Hercules | - - - | Scopas |
| The Blood of the Redeemer | - - - | Giovanni Bellini |
| Portrait of a Lady | - - - | Goya Lucientes |
| Moonrise on the Marshes of the Yare | - - - | John Crome |
| A Music Lesson | - - - | Frank Potter |
| The Holy Family | - - - | Michelangelo |
| The Music Lesson (Chelsea Porcelain). | | |

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.,
137, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

to his testamentary executors, that there might be no cause of dispute after his death. He desired that the rites of the Catholic faith should be observed at his burial, and that the dining-room in which he was accustomed to hear mass should be converted into a chappelle ardente. Dr. Antomarchi could not help smiling as he heard these orders given to the Abbé Vignale. Napoleon considered this as a want of respect to his authority, his genius, and his death. "Young man," he said in a severe tone, "perhaps you are too clever to believe in God; I am not in that position—a man cannot become an atheist merely by wishing it." This severe lesson, spoken in terms worthy of a great man at the point of death, overwhelmed the young doctor with confusion; he made a thousand excuses, and made profession of the most satisfactory moral principles.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. W. A. Finch asks for a "reasoned statement" of the issues between Socialism and the present system as regards business.

Clearly, Socialism has more to do with business than what its name might seem to imply, society.

Well, the answer to Mr. Finch comes in the very number of EVERYMAN in which he puts his request.

The "business principle" of the present time is that of "seeing a net profit when the transaction is completed; not necessarily a profit of increased wealth in all cases, but increased wealth is no doubt a compelling object."

This is in a letter from Mr. S. T. Nicholson.

It is exactly on this point of the need of "seeing a net profit" being the compelling force of enterprise which the Socialists do not or will not admit, and yet fail to show why not, and also entirely fail to provide any efficient substitute for it in their system if they admit its need.

The nearest thing to a substitute I can find in Socialist writings is a dependence upon the natural animal liking for enterprise which exists in human beings. But I should like to ask any Socialists who depend upon this, which of the animals ever continued to have efficient enterprise, or did not degenerate in a few generations, if they had no compulsion and difficulty in providing food for themselves and their families?

The domestic animals form no subject for an answer to this question, for they have compulsions alternative to those necessary to provide food, or, if they have not, they degenerate, as in the case of every spoiled pet dog.

The Socialists have failed so far to show that their system is not degenerate, while the present system of business has not yet been shown to be degenerate.—I am, sir, etc.,

ERNEST LOXLEY.

London, E.C.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In response to his request for explanations, perhaps a very few words by way of supplement to my recent letter may serve to make my position clear and, at the same time, to mollify Mr. Doody.

Instead of being, as he assumes, "very much concerned about those people who are wavering, as it were, on the brink of Socialism, and who must be saved at any cost," it happens that I have for some time past ranged myself among those who, "though not yet sufficiently informed to reach a decision, are strongly influenced, and, unless speedily shown where lie its sophistries and fallacies, will soon abandon their present state of suspended judgment, throw in their lot with the party of revolution, and do what they can," as Mr. Doody and my young friend, Mr. Greenwood, are already doing—"to make its principles and policy prevail." Hence my appeal, for such it was.

I may be reminded, of course, that already in EVERYMAN, at the hands of such an eminent littérateur as Mr. Belloc, the fundamental misconceptions of the Socialists have been exposed. Now, Mr. Belloc's fine phrase, "the Servile State," and his indignation against the unnatural crime of dispossessing the already dispossessed, and handing over the land to the politicians, might vastly gratify those on the look-out for catch words. But if one proceeds to inquire how far the masses are to-day from the Servile State, or to what extent the ordinary politician meddles with Post Office administration or State Education, it becomes clear that Mr. Belloc has himself erected the windmills against which he tilts.

I therefore still await, and trust that EVERYMAN may yet secure, a clear statement of the case for the opponents of Socialism, for "if serious argument in favour of the capitalist position exists, it certainly is not greatly in evidence."—I am, sir, etc.,

Leeds, May 12th, 1913.

W. A. FINCH.

[This correspondence is now closed.—EDITOR.]

GEORGE BORROW.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—E. Hermann's sketch of Borrow is very interesting, and one or two of the phrases are clear-cut gems, yet it does not appear to me to have placed Borrow in the right light, especially in his relation to Isopel Berners; she, as well as he, realised the inevitability of parting, and wherever she went I should think she was quite capable of taking care of herself.

Rather than counting her love as water spilt upon the ground, I think it showed a strength of character in him far beyond the average man, for if ever a man craved for love and sympathy I should think it was Borrow, but, weighing it up in those dark, wind-swept silences, he realised his position as a nomadic wanderer, yet with forces working within him that would one day cause him to alter the whole routine of his life; and can anyone fancy Isopel Berners settling down into the conventional life of an early Victorian home? Again, E. Hermann says nothing about that wonderful book, "Wild Wales, its People and Language." In it we get not only a fine description of his experiences in Wales, but also an insight to his comparatively happy home-life, so that I think E. Hermann's description is not only inadequate, but tails off very flat; but perhaps he was only allowed a page, and could not give fuller details; if so, I am sorry, and should like to read more about Borrow in your most excellent paper.—I am, sir, etc.,

Norwich, May 5th.

JOHN PACKER.

COBBETT'S "HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was rather amused to read in the appreciation of William Cobbett last week by Mr. F. E. Green, the statement that while two of Cobbett's "live"

An EDITION DE LUXE at the price of an ordinary edition.

The Handsome Surrey Library Edition

OF THE

Works of George Meredith

Bound in Pale Blue Cloth, gilt top edge

PUBLISHED AT £8 NET

is now offered by

The Times Book Club

376 to 384, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

AT THE GREATLY REDUCED CASH PRICE OF

5 : 10 : 0 FOR THE 24 VOLS.

CARRIAGE PAID, OR

Six monthly payments of £1.

This provides, at a cost equal to 4s. 7d. per volume—the price of an ordinary edition not comparable with this in typography, paper, or binding—a sumptuous Edition de Luxe of the works of this great writer.

Prospectus, with Specimen Page and Illustrations of the Bindings, sent on receipt of postcard mentioning "Everyman."

JUST PUBLISHED.

FELLOWSHIP BOOKS

A new contribution by various writers toward the expression of the Human Ideal and Artistic Faith of our own day.

The first Six Volumes are:

| | |
|------------------------|----------------|
| FRIENDSHIP | Clifford Bax |
| THE JOY OF THE THEATRE | Gilbert Cannan |
| DIVINE DISCONTENT | James Guthrie |
| THE QUEST OF THE IDEAL | Grace Rhys |
| SPRINGTIME | C. J. Tait |
| THE COUNTRY | Edward Thomas |

Price 2/- net each. The Volumes are small 8vo (6½ × 4½), tastefully bound in cloth gilt, with silk bookmark.

The aims of the Series are to recall the elemental truths whence springs all that makes life worth living, the factors that increase our common enjoyment of nature, poetry and art. The main intention is constructive, not destructive, and neither theological nor political.

Each Author has been given free choice of subject, and no one has been asked to contribute who was not in sympathy with the scheme, the result being that the writers give of their best, and express in the spirit of fellowship their thoughts on the themes they select.

The question of the Format has received the fullest consideration. It has been the Publisher's aim to make the books show from cover to cover every right quality usually associated—often erroneously—with high-priced volumes issued by private presses.

A full Prospectus, with Notes on the Authors, will be sent on application.

B. T. BATSFORD, Publisher,
94, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

3 IMPORTANT BOOKS.

THE HISTORY OF ORATORY IN PARLIAMENT. Robert Craig, M.A., D.D. 10/6 net.

"The author has produced a very readable book."—Outlook.
"A very interesting and most suggestive book."—Globe.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF NIETZSCHE.

G. Chatterton-Hill, Ph.D. 7/6 net.

"Really excellent."—Everyman. "An able exposition."—Times.
"A plain, straightforward exposition."—Bystander.

THE ENGLISH STAGE. (Second Edition.)

D. E. Oliver. 1/6 net.

The Athenæum, in a two-column review, says:—"May be commended as a model; . . . told correctly and succinctly."

HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY, 6, Fleet Lane, London.

TO AUTHORS.—MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG & Co. (Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net. Ninth Edition) are prepared to consider MSS. in all Departments of Literature with a view to publication in Volume Form.—Address 16, Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY
AND

INEX-PENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR CARDS.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, almost dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

books are still circulated by publishers, "at second-hand bookstalls you can still pick up copies of Cobbett's . . . trenchant 'History of the Protestant Reformation' (1824)."

If this means that it is only in such places one can get it, Mr. F. E. Green must be unaware of the fact that this work of Cobbett's is in circulation at first-hand by the thousand and tens of thousands; in fact, it is immensely popular, and, I should say, is far more widely known and read than any of his other books. Abbot Gasquet has edited and prefaced an edition (Washbourne's), and the copy I have is among the fifteenth thousand. As for the sixpenny edition (Duffy's), the latest impression bears on its title-page the words 60th thousand.

I am speaking of what I know of its popularity in Catholic circles; naturally, it does not commend itself to "the other side"—for obvious reasons.—I am, sir, etc.,

HENRY GREY GRAHAM.

Motherwell, May 5th.

CONSCRIPTION AND THE WORKERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Commenting on the notion that conscription would be "a great levelling force, and indeed the only remedy for the curse of caste," you say in a recent issue: "It would be interesting to trace this levelling influence in countries that have conscription—and more interesting than easy, one imagines." Now, I happen to have made a special study (partly on the spot) of conscription in Australia and New Zealand, and I write to assure you that, although in those countries the system of forced enlistment has taken a far less exacting form than its advocates propose for this country, and applies only to youths under twenty-one, it has during the short time it has been in force caused a great accentuation of class distinctions, and has pressed much more hardly upon the workers than upon the more fortunate classes.

This has been strikingly evident in the case of the senior cadet training in Australia. Youths attending secondary schools, most of whom belong to the upper and middle classes, take their statutory drill in the school cadet corps as part of the curriculum. Working lads, on the other hand, are obliged to go to parade after the close of their day's work, and sometimes to sacrifice time which they would otherwise devote to the care and support of a widowed mother, or other dependent relatives. Others, whose work is partly done in evenings, must lose wages. This unequal treatment, though not designed—it is from the Government's point of view merely a matter of official convenience—is bitterly resented by those who suffer from it, and by workers' organisations.

It might have been expected that a system which a Labour Government had a hand in framing would have been genuinely democratic. Yet we find the Sydney Worker, though a supporter of the Government, writing that "the devil of caste distinctions has already got into it"—the "citizen" army—"and the relations of subordination and authority are beginning to manifest themselves in acts of a disgusting tyranny."

Labour organisations in different parts of the Commonwealth have expressed their dissatisfaction with the Act, and at the recent annual conference of the Queensland section of the Australian Workers' Union it was resolved:—

"That this conference emphatically recommends to the Federal Government the immediate alteration of the Federal Defence Act by an amending clause that will absolutely prohibit at any time the employment of the Federal military forces, arms, or accoutrements, against the citizens of the Commonwealth during strikes or internal disturbances.

Furthermore, that unless such amending clause be forthwith enacted, this conference shall use its utmost endeavours to effect a repeal of the Federal Defence Act."

In New Zealand the workers are even more strongly and unitedly against the system. The national conference which lately effected a combination of the two wings of the Labour party unanimously declared that "militarism has always been against the interests of the workers," and therefore demanded the immediate repeal of the Act. The Passive Resisters' Union, which consists of youths who are pledged to resist compulsion to the uttermost, and many of whose members have already been imprisoned for obeying their consciences rather than the law, is almost entirely a working-class organisation. If a youth is fined for refusing to serve, the fine may be recovered by attachment of his wages—a special punitive measure which obviously can only be applied to wage-earners. The Passive Resisters' Union is meeting this trouble by encouraging those so penalised to cease work, and by allowing them strike pay.

In New Zealand also, as in Australia, there is no legislative safeguard against the conscript forces being used in industrial disputes. In both countries the great majority of those punished for non-compliance belong to the working classes, and in both countries it has become evident in different ways that freedom of speech—that great safeguard of the masses against oppression—is seriously menaced by military power.—I am, sir, etc.,

S. V. BRACHER.

Upper Bedford Place, W.C.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The least that could be expected in an article under the above heading is that some argument in support of the theory advanced would be produced, that this argument would have been supported by evidence of the strongest type, and that the conclusions from the data furnished would have been incontrovertible. The question has, however, been answered in the affirmative, and the evidence is frankly admitted to be non-existent. There has never yet been a true statement that lacked proof of its truth.

The principal premise in the article is that self-preservation causes mental development. There is instanced the primitive man who invents weapons and thus develops an additional brain convolution. If brain power is gained that way, intellectual progress to-day is very rapid. The whole point is how long did primitive man take to do these things; what time elapsed from the moment he sat on a rock to the moment he constructed a chair? Æons or afternoons?

This is the greatest inventive age the world has ever seen, and the difference between this and all former ages in this particular is that inventions of to-day are of the creative and not of the consecutive order. The affirmative argument does not succeed on this ground.

It is also argued that the possession of brain power is evidenced in primeval man in his ability to kill his fellows. The first man who realised it was not necessary to kill to live made a gigantic intellectual stride. Think of it—a reversion of all preconceived thought. Yet it is at this precise moment that the writer sees the first mental retrogression. Presumably a further deterioration of brain power coincided with the enunciation of the Sinaitic law, with the institution of Christianity, with the promulgation of the doctrines of Socialism, with the founding of the first hospital.

Swift Sure

So long as your suit is not in holes or hopelessly frayed, we can make it look like new.

It may be soiled or out of shape, but it can be cleaned and tailor-pressed by our methods so well that you will be proud to wear it again.

Just let us have your suit, and in four days, at a cost of 3/9, you'll have it back looking, as we have said, like a new one.

Write for new book, "Modern Beau Brummels." The cover is reproduced from a fine water-colour by WILL HOUGHTON, and the letterpress is illustrated with clever pen and ink sketches by "THORPE." The book contains much useful information in an interesting form and is well worth keeping.

A postcard brings it.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

44

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crockmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

"MEMORY WITHOUT MNEMONICS" teaches a new method of evoking subconscious forces for the deepening of mental powers and secret of mental work without feeling tired. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

PLAYS WANTED!—We are being constantly asked, by Managers and Producers, for good Plays and Sketches of every description. Let us submit YOURS. Honourable dealing and lowest fees. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, Strand, W.C.

WIENER LITERARY AGENCY.

MSS.—64, Strand, London (next to Tivoli), 1st, 2nd and 3rd floors. Special facilities for placing literary and dramatic works, drawings, etc. Advice on and revision of MSS. undertaken. Particulars post free. There 369 Central. Wires and cables, "O" or "General, London."

The Business Pen

The W.H.S. Pen is instantly responsive, has a delightful touch, and is self-filling. It fills in five seconds without a filler. It saves time, trouble, and mess. For the business of writing you need The W.H.S. Pen.

There are twelve styles of nibs to choose from. Every kind of handwriting can be suited. The nib is of genuine 14-carat gold, tipped with costly iridium. Every pen guaranteed for two years.

A New Model

Ask to see the latest design, Model No. 2. The tapering holder and slide-grip cap will appeal to every pen user. Its graceful proportions and excellent quality will prove a revelation to those who have thought a high price essential.

BUY ONE TO-DAY 3/9

THE WHS PEN

W. H. Smith & Son, Manufacturing Stationers, Keao St., Kingsway, W.C.

THE ROTARY CYCLOSTYLE

Gestetner's Patent.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEPARTURE
IN DUPLICATING MACHINES.

2,000 Copies from One Original.

HANDWRITING—TYPEWRITING—DRAWING—MUSIC.

THE DUPLICATOR FOR FINEST WORK.
SPEED, CLEANLINESS, AND RELIABILITY.

Full particulars on application to—

The CYCLOSTYLE CO.,
50, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Telephone 5154 Gerrard.

Wholesale & Export: TOTTENHAM HALE, LONDON, N.

The argument that "there is no struggle for life, no struggle which secures life to the cleverer and denies it to the more foolish," is also unsound, if the primitive view of life as mere existence is abandoned. The savage removed an opponent to the grave; the civilised man removes him to the workhouse or the gutter. In both cases the opposition ceases. (It should be noted that the savage certainly did not kill all his enemies.) The battle is one of brains instead of beef. A further intellectual advance will be made when every child commences life with an equal chance, and when it will be impossible for a tramp and a millionaire to be found, to exist even, in the same world.

Of course, we are told mental deterioration is to be stopped by a process of selection. We are to believe that the union of clever parents will produce clever children. Is this so? The past does not prove it. Can it be that all the clever men of history married very inferior wives? In India the people are divided into castes, intermarriage is unknown; yet one caste is not mentally superior, as it ought to be, to those beneath it. It appears true that certain physical properties can be bred, but that mental qualities are of too elusive a nature to submit to a similar process.

Finally, just as the desire to kill has gone, so the desire that exists to-day to get wealth, or the fuller means of life as most apprehend them at present, will go, and in its place will be the desire to ameliorate for all the conditions of life. Brains will concentrate on this highest work to bring to all people a time when pain and sorrow and sighing shall be unknown.—I am, sir, etc.,

S. W. NICHOLSON.

Baldock.

THE TYPIST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is interesting to find a discussion going on in EVERYMAN on the subject of typing as a profession, for, while there are many people who will take an interest in chain-makers or teachers, they seem hardly to realise that there are such people as typists.

The question has been raised as to whether the typist's work is "mechanical" or not. Without pretending to solve this problem, which appears to need tactful treatment, I should like to put forward a few considerations, based on actual experience.

If we consider all work as divided into two classes: (1) the original, artistic, individual; (2) the mechanical, routine, impersonal, I think we shall be obliged to put typing, like all other office work, into the second category. In any employment that needs an "original" worker—for instance, sick-nursing or teaching—the differences between one personality and another enter into the work, are essential to it. But in a "mechanical" occupation, such as tending a box-making machine or adding up accounts, the work can be passed from one person to another without any bad result. In an office the men who dictate the letters are doing more or less original work; the girls who "take down" the letters and type them out are doing mechanical work.

When the first factory workers tried to persuade the millowners to make their day's work a little less long, they were sometimes met with the answer that the machines needed no rest, and why should the workers? Now, that shows up one of the weaknesses of the industrial revolution, and we typists are a result of that movement, and come under its curse as well as its blessing.

Many employers look upon a typist simply as part of her machine—with a file inside her head. This accounts for the long hours often worked by typists, and the strain to which we are often subjected by being made to work in a hurry. I think that people who have never worked a typewriter have, as a rule, very little idea of the effort, physical and mental, which is involved in typing letters at full speed all day long.

Personally, I should never encourage a girl to enter this profession, not only on account of the long hours and nervous strain, but because the rate of remuneration is so low. If I may be allowed to quote my own case, I may say that, with a University education, good training, and two languages, I cannot earn more than 35s. a week, and this is considered an extremely handsome salary.

The only remedy for these grievances, as far as I can see, is a kind of Malthusian one. At present the profession is so overcrowded that a Trade Union would not do much good, for employers could always, I believe, get plenty of blackleg labour. The enormous number of typists makes competition for posts very keen and tends to bring down wages. It is possible, of course, that an extension of the Trade Boards Act to typing might give us a minimum wage, which need not mean a uniform rate over the whole profession, but which might do some good. Failing a decrease in numbers or the establishment of a minimum wage, I can only look to the invention of a machine that will type.

This is a subject on which I could write volumes, but this is probably already more than enough.—I am, sir, etc.,
Y. M. A.

THE ABOLITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Chiozza Money's second article appears a little disappointing after his first able and interesting one. He started with a great problem, which one anticipated he would have solved somewhat differently—that some 25,000,000, the greater part of whom are soft-handed, as he suggestively puts it, leave some 10,000,000 horny hands of toil, or "the working classes," so called. To abolish these last would appear to be a simple sum in proportion. If such a vast number of the soft-handed have been created, why should not the remainder be likewise created by the same process or means? What have been those means that have already brought about such a remarkable result? It seems to come almost under one answer, mechanism. But for this most of those who now have a physically easy time would still be strenuous toilers; the majority of us would still be "the working classes." Mr. Chiozza Money's remedy would be to shorten the working day. This will undoubtedly come about once the wants of the working classes are increased sufficiently, and this, as Buckle, the historian, so illuminatingly put it, can only be brought about by education. It is education which increases human wants, and, still more, it increases also the supply of wants, and so will ultimately abolish the physically "working classes."

One wonders if the ever-increasing soft-handed masses realise these causes that are at work to-day and ever have been since the common cart-wheel was invented, reducing physical labour more and more into intellectual labour, perhaps the hardest of all labour.

One wonders if the working and soft-handed classes realise how physical labour all round would be increased by a sudden cessation of all mechanism.

The commonest want, food that comes to our mouths, came by the plough and the sickle, long antecedent to the knife and fork; but the amount of

WHY BE CONTENT WITH

4%

when you can obtain, with greater security, 6%, 8%, 10%, 15%, or even 20%?

The cost of living is rising; incomes derived from investments are, in many cases, falling. What is to be done? The prudent investor is turning his attention to "Sun Life of Canada" Annuities. This Company, one of the soundest concerns in the World, deals with the whole problem of Annuity Insurance on progressive and comprehensive lines. Its attractive forms of Annuities do not only appeal to those who have already reached the evening of life. Middle-aged men and women with small and large capitals, even young men and women with no capital at all, but with incomes that leave a margin for saving—all find investment advantages in the "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity Insurances not to be gained elsewhere.

BUY AN ANNUITY.

You can buy an Annuity out and out, or you can buy a deferred Annuity and pay for it out of your income—so much per year until the annuity becomes due. You can buy joint Annuities for yourself and your wife; you can buy educational Annuities for your children; you can buy Annuities with the whole return of your Capital guaranteed. And these are but a few of the various forms of Annuities purchasable. Investigate! Your inquiry may mean, probably will mean, the doubling or quadrupling of your present income. You will gain in every way by taking out a "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity. Your income will be larger and more amply secured. If you happen to be in indifferent health when the arrangement is made you will have still better terms offered.

The "Sun Life of Canada" has assets of £10,000,000 invested under the strict supervision of the Canadian Government. A present undivided surplus of £1,000,000 over all liabilities makes Assurance with "Sun Life of Canada" doubly sure.

To J. F. JUNKIN (Manager),
SUN LIFE OF CANADA,
94, CANADA HOUSE, NORFOLK ST., LONDON, W.C.

Please send me particulars, explanatory booklets, etc., of your various forms of Annuity Insurance.
(Enquirer should state age, particulars of Annuity required, etc., the communication being regarded as confidential.)

NAME

ADDRESS

DATE OF BIRTH

mechanism in use to-day to bring each of us the commonest commodity or the rarest is almost unthinkable. Every increase in such processes will ultimately abolish the so-called "working classes."—I am, sir, etc.,

London, S.W.

T. R. BRIDGWATER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am glad that my articles under the above heading produced so many interesting and valuable letters. It is, of course, impossible for me to reply to all of them, and I will confine myself to the chief point which, as it appears to me, escapes the attention of some of your correspondents. It is this: that so-called "mental" work usually calls for much less mental effort than commonly so-called "manual" work. I do not, of course, refer to the high qualities demanded by some kinds of direction, or by design, or artistry, or engineering in its broadest sense. I refer to the routine work performed by "brain" workers, such as clerks, agents, travellers, traders, etc. A little reflection will show your correspondents that it requires far more brain work (1) to build a good brick wall in English bond than to make entries in a ledger; (2) to make a piece of framed joinery than to sell goods on commission; (3) to do the electric wiring of an ordinary house than to buy goods at wholesale prices and to sell them over the counter at retail prices. Indeed, I might go further, and point out that the "manual" operations I have just named call not only for more mental effort, but for a higher order of mental effort, than the alleged brainworks with which I have contrasted them.

For the rest, may I be permitted to refer your readers who desire to follow up the subject at greater length, to the essay entitled "Work in the Great State," which I contributed to the volume entitled "The Great State," edited by Mr. H. G. Wells?—I am, sir, etc.,

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY.

PACIFISM AND IMPERIALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your contributor, Signor Enrico Corradini, in his attempt to prove the necessity of war, makes two groundless assumptions.

1. "All living things," he says, "tend to decay and die, and are kept alive by a force which is constantly renewing them." So far, so good. That renewing force in social organisms he declares to be war; but he does not attempt to prove it, he merely contents himself with giving two illustrations in support of his theory. In fact, he himself furnishes his readers, in the very same paragraph, with a refutation of his unwarranted assumption. "Wars of conquest pour new life into a country, in so far as they drive out those who, in view of this ethical relationship between a country and its people, are usurpers, and establish in their place a productive race." War, then, he admits in these words, does not put new life into a moribund people, but merely drives them out of their land to go elsewhere, and pursue the self-same policy.

2. Signor Corradini also assumes that the aggressors in any war are a live people, that the defenders are "usurpers" of the land in which they live, and that the former, when victorious, after dispossessing their victims of their land, turn that land to productive uses. Is this so? I think not. Take the case of the Norman Conquest of England. William the Conqueror, to achieve his purpose—the conquest of England—devastated the part of the country between York and the Tees. Town and village were burnt; cattle and implements of industry were destroyed. "The famine which followed," says

Green, "is said to have swept off more than a hundred thousand victims." Were the people thus maltreated usurpers of the land in which they lived? Were they driven off that a productive race might take their place? Half a century later," the same writer goes on to say, "the land still lay bare of culture and deserted of men for sixty miles northward of York."

Was the American Civil War of 1861-65 a force to revive any social organism? Did it drive any unproductive people from their land to be replaced by a productive one? Did the Crimean War drive out any "usurpers and establish in their place a productive race?"

Examples like these may be given freely to show that, comparatively speaking, seldom has any war achieved what your contributor believes to be the purpose of war.

War, he also says, is one of the "laws to which human society, nations, and peoples are subject." If he means that we are prone to war, I admit that there is some truth in his statement. But if he means—as I understand him to mean—that we are under the power of war, just as the English nation, for instance, is under the power of its Parliament, then I think that he is quite mistaken. For we are not compelled to wage war any more than we are compelled to assault the first person we meet on going out of the house.

Does Signor Enrico Corradini really believe that Providence, in its superintendence of mankind, decides when and between whom there shall be war? Does he entirely disbelieve in free will? One or two sentences of his article lead us to believe that he does.—I am, sir, etc.,

WM. ARNOLD HAWKINS.

Staffs.

PAGANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I be allowed to offer a few remarks on the letter of Mr. A. Hilliard Atteridge in your issue of May 2nd?

In order to point out one of the factors on which the writer considers the superiority of present-day civilisation is based, he says that "the citizens were a small class, whose leisure and opportunities for cultured enjoyment depended on the existence of a large slave population. In the great days of the Athenian State there were probably three slaves to every free citizen." The aim of the writer is evidently to prove that at the present day slavery does not exist, and that every man—and woman—has the opportunity of developing his capacities to the utmost, and, therefore, the actual state of society is intellectually and morally far beyond that of the Greeks.

Now, sir, this asserted condition of freedom does not exist at the present day. It is true that no man is legally the property of another, but, to all intents and purposes, the great majority of members of the community belong, body and soul, to the comparatively few of a privileged class. They work long hours in order to earn their daily bread—in many cases a bare pittance—and when they are no longer fit to do this they are left to a doled-out charity or—to starve. It is bare-faced hypocrisy to maintain that their state is any better than that of the Greek slaves—in many cases it is worse, for the ancient slave was always of a certain value to his master, and it was in the interest of the latter to see that this value did not decrease. What does it matter to the capitalist of the present day whether the value of his hands goes down or not, he can generally get a further supply without much difficulty.

(Continued on page 154.)

T.P.'s Great Offer

The World-Famous Pelman Course of Mind and Memory Training at 40% Reduction in Cost.

WRITE FOR FREE PARTICULARS AND PROSPECTUS TO-DAY, BEFORE ALL THE COURSES ARE ALLOTTED.

A MAGNIFICENT offer is made to-day by Mr. T. P. O'Connor's well-known journal, T.P.'s Weekly.

The Pelman Course of Mind Training is undoubtedly the surest means that can be offered to any man or woman of attaining success in any business or profession.

Over 200,000 men and women have already improved their positions in life by means of the mental faculties and powers developed by this wonderful system.

It is this very same Course that has been secured by T.P.'s Weekly at a reduction of 40 per cent. on the fees charged by the Pelman School of Mind itself.

A prospectus has been prepared giving full particulars of this unique arrangement. Readers of EVERYMAN are advised to write at once for this prospectus of particulars to the Manager, T.P.'s Weekly, 29, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. It will be sent gratis and post free to any address. But write at once before the number of Courses have all been allotted.

Over 200,000 Men and Women Trained for Success.

For some long period it has been the ambition of the management of T.P.'s Weekly to add a Mind and Memory Training Course to the several courses already established under the auspices of this Journal.

The Pelman Course holds the field unchallenged as far as Mind Training is concerned.

The 200,000 and over Pelman students testify to this, so do the leading journals and newspapers who have investigated the system, so do such famous and successful men as

- Sir Hiram Maxim,
- Mr. A. W. Gamage,
- Mr. H. Gordon Selfridge,
- Mr. John Sinclair, M.A.,
Director of Education, London Central Y.M.C.A.,
- Dr. Chas. H. Heydemann, Ph.D.,
- Mr. F. W. Kaiser,
Manager of the Hotel Cecil,

and many others.

"I have very little doubt in my mind," says Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., "that not one person in a thousand who takes the Course but will find it a distinct benefit, as many thousands have done before him. The Pelman System is not only unique in itself, but deserves well of the country and of the world."

REDUCED TERMS only obtainable through "T.P.'s."

It was therefore decided to negotiate with the Principal of the Pelman School with a view to obtaining concessions which would allow readers of T.P.'s Weekly and their friends—indeed anyone who makes application through T.P.'s Weekly—to take the famous Pelman Course on exceptionally favourable terms.

These negotiations have resulted in the remarkable enterprise announced above.

That is to say, T.P.'s Weekly are now enabled to offer the newly revised and enlarged Pelman Course of Mind and Memory Training at specially reduced terms.

These terms can only be obtained through T.P.'s Weekly. They are not obtainable from the Pelman School. To participate in the benefit of this arrangement you must apply direct to the address given in the next column.

VALUABLE BENEFITS YOU WILL GAIN.

What does the Pelman Course do for you?

It develops in your mind latent energies and powers that carry those who have developed them straight and unswervingly to success.

It strengthens in your mind the qualities of—

- Observation.
- Concentration.
- Perception.
- Ambition.
- Organising Power.
- Forcefulness.
- Creative Power.
- A Never Forgetting Memory.
- Original Ideation.
- Sound Judgment.
- Swift Decision.
- Personal Magnetism.
- Self-Confidence.
- Persuasive Speech.
- Driving Power.
- Business Tact.

Thus it is that amongst those who have taken the Pelman Course are many who hold most responsible and highly remunerated posts. They have risen from quite humble and subordinate positions. The qualities developed by the Pelman Course have enabled them to rise from one higher position to another, and to gain and hold their present important posts. Many of these successful men have written attributing the great advance they have made mainly to the mental training gained from a Course of Pelman. The Pelman System trains you to think most efficiently and forcefully; it doubles and even trebles the income-earning power of your mind; it gives you that initiative and dynamic power that achieves everything that is worth achieving; it concentrates and directs your faculties, energies, and powers along the line that brings to you the most profitable results. It gets you out of the rut and starts you along the high road that leads straight to successful achievement.

IMPROVES YOUR POSITION IN LIFE.

Whatever your present position in life, the Pelman Course will enable you to improve it, and the magnificent offer of T.P.'s Weekly gives you the opportunity of taking this Course at much less than the usual cost.

Under the arrangement made by T.P.'s Weekly the Pelman School will give every student enrolled the full 12-lesson Course in the same manner as though the usual fee had been paid. The following facts should be noted as proving the enormous value of T.P.'s great offer.

- (1) The 12 Pelman lessons are fascinating to follow and practically profitable in their results. They are founded on 20 years' working experience in remedying weakness in concentration, memory, will power, and other mental qualities.
- (2) Most striking letters are printed by permission in the prospectus of particulars sent you free on application to-day to the following address. These letters are from men and women who have taken the Course and found it of inestimable value. These letters should be read by every reader desiring greater success.
- (3) The Directors and Staff of the Pelman School are personally known to the management of T.P.'s Weekly. Their experience in training the mind for greater power and efficiency is unequalled in the world.
- (4) An hour or so of your spare time spent every week in training your mind on the Pelman plan will produce marvellous results. Whatever your age or position you will find this Course of value and use beyond all estimation.

Post this Coupon To-day.

Write for particulars to-day of T.P.'s great offer. Write at once before all the Courses have been allotted. Fill in this Coupon and post now to the Manager of T.P.'s Weekly, 29, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. By return you will receive, gratis and post free, full particulars of this magnificent offer, enabling you to increase the efficiency of your mind, and to multiply the income-earning value of your brain.

T.P.'s Great Offer Free Coupon.

To the Manager,
T.P.'s Weekly,
29, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send to the following address, gratis and post free, full particulars of T.P.'s Weekly offer of the Pelman Course of Mind and Memory Training on specially reduced terms, together with form of application for my use should I decide to take the Course

Name

Address

[E.M.16/5/13]

Occupation

The signing and sending of this coupon to the offices of "T.P.'s Weekly" enables you, without obligation on your part, to receive the complete Pelman Course at specially reduced fees should you decide to take a Course after reading the particulars.

You can test our NEW POSTAL LESSONS in RUSSIAN,
 FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, LATIN or GREEK
 for the modest sum of ONE SHILLING.
 Write: Director, EVFRSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

CORRECT SPEECH, WRITING, AND GENERAL KNOWLEDGE can be the possession of all suffering from neglected education. We teach by post. Splendid results. Send stamp for booklet 126—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and General MSS., 3d. per 1,000 words. Plays, 1s. per 1,000 words. Carbon-copies, 1d. extra per 1,000 words.—C. A. GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

Shaving with a
"CLEMAK" is
 Simple as 'A.B.C.'

No "learning how"—you feel at home with the "Clemak" at once. Never a cut, never a scratch—just a close, quick, smooth shave and skin-comfort afterwards. Acquire the "Clemak" habit—and add a new pleasure to your life.

The British-made "Clemak" is simplicity itself. There are no screws, bars or plates to bother about and nothing to remove when cleaning. The "Clemak" is self-adjusting, and, with the patent "Clemak" strop, self-stropping.

The blades are made of the best quality Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by electric process. They retain a fine shaving edge, and can be stropped over and over again. The razor itself lasts a lifetime.

CLEMAK Safety Razor

Made as well and shaves as well as any guinea razor. Remember, it's a "Clemak" you want.

Obtainable from all Cutlers, Ironmongers, Stores, &c., or post free from the Clemak Razor Co., 17, Billiter St., London, E.C. [Works, Sheffield.]

FREE A copy of Amusing and Instructive Booklet, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

Send Coupon To-day Or a postcard will do, on mentioning this journal.

Clemak Razor and Seven Blades ... 5/-
 Combination Outfit, Stropping Machine, Slide Strop, with Clemak and Twelve Blades ... 10/6

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.

To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
 17, Billiter St., London, E.C.

Send me gratis and post free a copy of "His First Shave" which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Mr. Atteridge further goes on to state that the Greeks trusted the defence of their cities to slaves and mercenaries, and attributes to this a share in the downfall of the race. This may possibly be true; but, if it is, then one can only remark that the same fate will overtake England, for to whom is the defence of the country entrusted if not to paid soldiers, which is a euphemistic name for mercenaries. What an outcry is made by the parties representing the so-called moral forces of the nation when the word "conscription"—which, after all, means democratic national defence—is uttered!—I am, sir, etc.,
 C. J. ADAMS.

Croydon.

[This correspondence is now closed.—EDITOR.]

THE DAPPLED PADDOCK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am pained that your reviewer of my book, "The Quiet Spirit," in your issue of May 2nd, should have been led by what he not incorrectly calls his ignorance into ascribing to me an addiction to "Futurism" (whatever that may be).

Although he says it would be unkind to ask me to explain the word "paddock," I really think it would be an act of kindness to him to do so. "Paddock," in English, means "toad" or "frog."

"For who that's but a queen, fair, sober, wise,
 Would from a paddock, from a bat, a gib,
 Such dear discernings hide?"

—Hamlet, Act III., Scene IV., line 190.

"Paddock calls."

—Macbeth, Act I., Scene I., line 9.

"Here, a little child, I stand,
 Heaving up my either hand,
 Cold as paddocks tho' they be."

—Herrick, "A Child's Grace."

"O thae paddock pies!"

—Bon Gualtier, "The Queen in France."

I give the first few literary examples that occur to me. Every schoolboy, at least north of the Tweed, knows what a "paddock" is.

As it appears that your reviewer, having hit upon the incongruity of a racecourse paddock loping by on the second page of my book, has read no further, and on this somewhat slender acquaintance has proceeded to condemn the whole, I think, in fairness, I may ask you to publish this letter.—I am, sir, etc.,

Glasgow, May 8th, 1913.

J. S. MUIRHEAD.

THE USE OF BOOKS TO WORKING MEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have just read a letter from D. M. T. re article on above subject by J. R. Clynes, M.P., which appeared in your issue of April 18th. How D. M. T. can construe the meaning he does from such an article I cannot imagine.

He asks: "Does Mr. Clynes really think that for a working man, when really tired of work, to sit and secure the delights of a 'Path to Rome' would solace that man for the hours of sweated slavery, his blood pittance of perhaps 12s. a week on which to keep a wife and dozen little ones?" Certainly not! How can the writer think this when Mr. Clynes declares that he "would not have books intended to make men content with evil conditions or submissive to them. The more men read usefully and well the less well they yield . . . to under-payment in the matter of reward for their work."

Again, does D. M. T. suggest that when a "man is really tired with work, that such a man has necessarily been a victim of the sweating system? Many a man has been "tired of work," but at the same time has received adequate remuneration for such work. Also does not D. M. T. let his imagination run riot when he pictures a man and wife with a "dozen little ones"? If such a couple had a dozen children, some of them would be anything but "little."

How does D. M. T. reconcile the sentence in his letter, "that labour unrest would be increased," with the one in Mr. Clynes' article, namely, "Labour unrest would be increased, though better expressed and more scientifically directed if workmen used to greater extent the intellectual levers of Ruskin," etc. I see nothing here to suggest that Mr. Clynes disapproves of labour unrest.

I quite agree with D. M. T. when he says that "the intellectual powers lie low when the body is half clad and half starved," but this is no reason why such powers, small though they be, should not be utilised to the best advantage.

Let D. M. T. read the article again carefully, and he will see that the writer does not for one moment suggest that the reading of books compensate a man for any loss of physical force, but only help to improve and brighten many a life which would otherwise be monotonous, dull, and irksome.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. WAINWRIGHT FFOULKES.

May 3, 1913.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE authors of THE DANCING CHILD (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) have followed the popular craze for a heroine of the music-halls. As a rule, the child dances into the notice of the reader to the strains of a piano organ, her performance is witnessed by a passing impresario, who there and then trains her, and launches her on the stream of success, whereon she sails to an ultimate marriage with a member of the aristocracy. The latest novel of this kind opens with a new gambit. Katie, the small person in question, is Irish, and her dances are light and airy as the summer breeze. She is discovered by Mrs. Chapman, an unutterably selfish woman, who, disliking work herself, decides that Katie shall work for her. She has left her husband, disgusted with his poverty, and has taken a situation in Ireland. The characterisation of this woman is distinctly clever. She is introduced to us as a spectator in the gallery of a theatre watching the performance of a child genius who does wonderful things in the dancing line. Then and there she forms a resolution of finding and training a similar genius, and Fortune throws Katie in her way. Utterly alone in the world, the child accepts the fact of Ethel's adoption without question or complaint; the secret of the woman's influence marks a departure from the ordinary conventional novel. Katie is managed through her love for the fairies, Mrs. Chapman inspiring the child with the belief that the "little people" have adopted her as their instrument. There is a strain of fantasy throughout the story that redeems it from the commonplace. The style is fresh and original, and on the whole the authors are to be congratulated on their success.

• • •

Agnes and Egerton Castle are notable for distinction of phrase and a quiet reserve of style. CHANCE THE PIPER (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) exhibits the characteristics of these authors, and the collection of short stories published under the above title are eminently readable and occasionally subtle. The most dramatic is entitled "Moon's Gibbet." This is a

A Remarkable Letter from an Eminent Anatomist.

43, Russell Square, London.

Dear Mr. Cox.—Your lessons, or, rather, the explanation of your ideas as to the training of the power of memory, have given me the most intense pleasure, and I KNOW that you have got down to rockbottom truth in your ideas, and that you have developed the ONE correct plan to which to work for the purpose of memory training. You need have no fear with regard to the correctness of your physiology, which is correct in every detail, and your system is, I am sure, the correct method of thoroughly impinging upon the brain cells and causing them to react in response to the impulses sent to them. You see that you call into play the work of the nerve endings in the cells by force of will in the same manner in which they would be called into play by the senses through the organs of the eyes, ears, and fingers, and the impulse stops in the brain without being sent out again and dissipated in the use of those organs, which is naturally more or less of a drain upon the body.

Your system also compels concentration in three or perhaps more distinct ways, and I have always been of opinion that the reason of all poor memory was the inability to concentrate, and you have been able to explain in a very few words a threefold means of concentration which must be more than threefold more valuable than a single means.

I am quite sure that your system pursued will result in a strengthening of the nerve tissues involved in the act of storing impressions in the brain, and as use develops any tissue, so it will develop brain tissue also.

In each of us is the power of memory. It is only atrophied for want of exercise. It is a physiological law that what is not used begins immediately to atrophy, and we have allowed many of our powers to atrophy by lack of use, particularly the power of storing impressions.

I am quite sure also that your system will be of the very greatest assistance in maintaining and even in restoring the health of the physical tissues.—Yours sincerely, J. J. MAY.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright)

evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required.

All Subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift. Recommended by Physicians, Doctors, Clergymen, University Examiners and others. EVERY Musician can play from MEMORY.

EVERYONE can strengthen GENERAL MEMORY by this system.

All who need memory should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhill College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhill Road, Wolverhampton. Prospectus and full particulars free on application.

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

WHY RENT A HOUSE? You would not rent anything else in everyday use. You would buy it outright, and you can buy your house whether you have capital or not. Send for "Every Man his own Landlord" post free on application to Managers, 246, Bishopsgate, E.C. Mention Everyman.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course" (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 3/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready. Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost. Gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, Flich Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatinics, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size.

Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

Money refunded if not satisfactory.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

A THOROUGH SCIENTIFIC SURVEY OF THE PRINCIPLES OF MENTAL ACTIVITY

AND HOW TO STRENGTHEN AND APPLY THESE TO Professional Life, Business Life, and the thousand and one things that constitute our daily activities, is given in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration." It teaches you the laws of Attention, Observation, Memory, Fatigue, Habit and Will-Power, and Thought-Control, and shows you how to develop and apply these to your daily requirements. "Scientific Concentration" makes you attentive, makes you observe and remember, develops your Will-Power, Self-Reliance, and Thought-Control to an enormous extent. It banishes Self-Consciousness, eliminates Worry, helps you to conquer Bad Habits, and is an invaluable guide to success in any pursuit. "Scientific Concentration" is practised by a large body of students of every class, in every part of the civilised world; and is recommended by the Editors of the following well-known Journals:—"Public Opinion," "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Review of Reviews," "Great Thoughts," "John Bull." Learn what "Scientific Concentration" will do for you. Send to-day for Free Booklet to the

CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS,
WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

Insist! Insist!! Insist!!!

on having a RENOLD Chain fitted on your cycle.

Don't be persuaded that there is a chain just-as-good and cheaper than the

Renold Chain

Lower priced chains there may be, but just-as-good—there is no chain just-as-good as the Renold. Made by skilled and experienced labour from the finest material procurable, strenuously tested, and microscopically accurate (no part of the chain varying from absolute correctness by more than $\frac{1}{1000}$ part of an inch).

It is acknowledged by all authorities the World's pre-eminent cycle chain.

Of all Dealers—One Quality—5/6
(Fitting and postage extra.)

Cycle chain booklet containing useful hints, free.

HANS RENOLD Ltd., Dept. 14, MANCHESTER.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

STAMMERING AND ALL DEFECTS IN SPEECH effectually CURED by correspondence or personally. The "Practical Guide" is lent to inquirers, post free.—N. H. Mason, 30, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Every owner, or prospective owner of a gramophone, should read

HINTS ABOUT THE GRAMOPHONE

Considered as a Musical Instrument.

Cr. 8vo, 68 pp.
ROWELL and SONS,

62-68, Rosebery Avenue, London, E.C.

PRICE 1/6 POST FREE.

(Mention this paper.)

TO NEW WRITERS. Novels, etc., promptly placed with London Publishers at best possible terms. Prospectus and Testimonials free.—The Surrey Literary Agency, Strathmore, Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey.

SHORTHAND.—IRISH CANADIAN'S STATEMENT: "I have come home from Canada for a few weeks' holiday, during which I have learnt Sloan-Duployan shorthand, and gained a diploma for 110 words a minute. Sloan-Duployan will always find me advocating the many advantages it possesses over other systems. It may interest you to know that Sloan-Duployan is the premier system in Canada and U.S.A."—From Mr. Cornelius O'Leary, St. Luke's P.O., Cork. SLOAN-DUPOLOYAN shorthand is acquired in a few weeks and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for free illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Rainsgate.

TO PLAY-WRITERS.—Manuscript Plays wanted for publication in book form. No fees. Send MS. to Publisher, 34, Maiden Lane, Strand, W.C.

WESTBOURNE PARK BUILDING SOCIETY.

ABSOLUTE SECURITY FOR SAVINGS.

INTEREST.—3 to 5 per cent, according to class of investment—Paid Half-yearly—free from Income Tax Deduction.

Prospectus, etc., of—C. JOHNSTON BURT, F.C.I.S., Sec.

Office: 136, WESTBOURNE TERRACE, LONDON, W.

tale that contains the shuddering suggestion of horror necessary to your true ghost story. It treats of a man already hanged who was rescued from the gallows swinging in chains that creaked with every motion of the midnight air. To the gallows comes his father, where he chances on the teller of the tale, a young surveyor who is making observations on the moor. Together the two men cut down the murderer, and with frantic haste revive the spark of life not yet extinct within him. Urged by the force of the old man's will, the surveyor carries home the victim of the gallows and assists in his further recovery. Their efforts are interrupted by a knocking at the door, the surveyor is hustled into another room, and a stormy interview ensues. At the conclusion of the conversation the surveyor discovers the caller has disappeared; the son, once more attired in the ghastly dress of the gallows, his head and face covered with the black cap, his limbs fettered with chains, is stretched upon the bed. He is dead, the old man explains, and together they return with their burden to Moon's Gibbet. The surveyor goes back to the cottage for his instruments, and there, seated before the fire, he finds the son of the old man—alive! And he knows he has assisted, all unwitting, in a murder. There is much, as we have said, that is dramatic in this volume, but we miss the touch of romance and the flutter of fancy that distinguish Mr. Castle's earlier work, and while appreciating the stories of his more recent manner, we would gladly welcome one of his old-time tales.

THE DESTROYING ANGEL (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a lurid novel, centring round a beautiful and tragic adventuress. We have met the type many times before; it is eternal, and we suppose will outlast the most original and individual creations of fiction. The hero, by name Whitaker, discovers the lady in the act of swallowing oxalic acid. He rescues her, in the usual approved fashion, and is obliging enough to marry her that she may suffer no inconvenience from the lack of a duly respectable name. Meanwhile Whitaker has been condemned to death by a doctor. He suffers from those mysterious diseases known only to fictionists, and attains a marvellous cure, which permits him to perform feats of herculean strength. He goes into the wilds in pursuit of his health, and returns to find Mary a famous actress! The end of this amazing book is of a wild and whirling description. Mary, who is playing the leading part in a drama, finds herself faced by a theatrical manager who, desperate with love for her, aims a pistol at her heart. She is rescued by the frantic leap of Whitaker's friend Ember from a box to the stage.

Mrs. Henry de la Pasture is invariably successful in depicting scenes of domestic life. There is a freshness and charm about her work that intrigues the interest, and is restful to the reader of many mediocre novels. In MICHAEL FERRYS (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) she has departed from her usual methods. The story is practically a prolonged discussion on religion, and lengthy philosophical arguments impede the action of the drama and block the stage. It is only those fortunate persons with assured incomes and plenty of leisure that are able to devote such a very long time to the dissection of motive, and the analysis of souls. Now and again the author harks back to her earlier manner, and we get a touch of the breezy humour of "Deborah." We are grateful for this relief, but most ardently hope that Mrs. de la Pasture will not again essay a treatise on theology.

The heroine of RUE AND ROSES (Heinemann, 5s.) is pre-eminently a Puritan. She has an innate shrinking from the physical side of life, and realises material facts with a shock that for the time seems to paralyse her capacity for discrimination. In an eloquent introduction, Mr. W. L. Courtney describes Anna as "doomed to be the Eternal Virgin, the predestinate Spinster. In a world in which the feminine race largely predominates there are not lovers and husbands enough to go round, and she must remain outside that charmed circle—the leaping flames of love and passion, which seem to embrace all the world except herself." We do not agree with this estimate of the character of the girl with the "strange wonderful smile." Renunciation, we are told, becomes Anna's ideal, and renunciation carried to the point of mutilation is not the ideal of a virgin, but of the Calvinist predestined to a fierce immolation that stings and sears the beholders. The book is interesting and intensely provocative of thought. Miss Angela Langer writes with a charm attenuated but fragrant, and her simplicity of phrasing creates an effect in harmony with the personality of the heroine. Anna is not a success as a sweetheart—that goes without saying—and one feels that the letter from her lover, in which he finally sets her in a world apart, is the only possible solution of the matter. Anna, with her intense capacity for self-deception, her almost morbid powers of introspection, would break the heart of any man. She suffers from anæmia of the emotions, and the fierce virginal flame that Mr. Courtney claims for her could never have burnt in so pallid a spirit. Renunciation is the gospel she preaches, but it is a renunciation of one who has never possessed what she lays down.

Messrs. Murray and Evenden, Ltd., have just published another military novel from the pen of Mr. Stephen Knott, ONCE ROUND (6s.). The scene is laid in the Midlands, where the hero's regiment is quartered. Mr. Knott gives a vivid and amusing insight into the lives of the subalterns in His Majesty's Army, both in and out of barracks, and the book contains many entertaining yarns of soldier life. The love story of Toby and Sylvia is rather tangled, but it eventually smoothes itself out and ends happily for everyone concerned, including the various ladies to whom the incorrigible Toby has "engaged" himself provisionally with such commendable courage. We cannot help feeling that Mr. Knott is rather hard on the "self-made" man, and venture to suggest that there are other and more amiable sides to the character of such men than he would lead us to believe, but, apart from this, the book is well deserving of praise. The "ragging" scene is cleverly written, and we can assure the author that we thoroughly sympathise with the "scoundrelly Courtier," and feel that if we had been placed in his position we should have done exactly the same, with the reservation that we should have probably been rather more violent in our treatment of Mullin, the outsider. Mr. Knott prefaces his book with a quotation from the "Knife-grinder"—"Story? Lord bless you! I have none to tell, sir." With this we venture to disagree. Mr. Knott has a story, and he tells it very well.

A story of blackmail and intrigue, melodramatic happenings and sensational incidents, told in a notably restrained style, with touches of real literary excellence. Such is PATCHWORK COMEDY (G. P. Putnam Sons, 6s.). Mr. Humfrey Jordan has a gift of characterisation. His sketches of the Carfew Father and Son are admirably executed; we almost believe

PROBLEMS OF PROGRESS.

By H. VINCENT.

The road to Prosperity is, as everybody knows, not the straight, smooth, long road of our desires; it is a devious, rough, and sometimes difficult road to follow.

Yet I venture to think that the majority of "side tracked" wayfarers upon that road have something other than the road to blame; often, I think, themselves.

Nothing is more piteous than the man—or the woman—who is "in the rut," a-rusting upon some dismal byway of commerce; yet being more the result of fault than of opportunities.

It cannot be too often said that there are as many opportunities in the world to-day as at any stage of the world's history; even more, the busy business world is full of chances to "get on"; full of the beginnings which, rightly used, end in prosperity.

Every year extends the sphere of business; every year adds to its activities, and every extension brings a fresh crowd of chances to the men and women who want to "get on."

Advertising is one of the most notable recent examples of a new plan of business-creating occupation, and good opportunities for thousands.

Ten or twelve years ago, advertising was, to a great extent, in its infancy in this country; we were only on the verge of those developments which to-day afford a lucrative occupation for many workers.

It is to such professions as these, that the man or woman "in a rut" should turn in search of progress; for then progress is possible.

An easy and safe avenue of approach is supplied by the excellent and practical course of correspondence instruction in advertisement-writing and designing which the Practical Correspondence College offers. The Practical Correspondence College is an institution which has already proved of immense value to men and women all over the country, who, refusing to "rust" in the by-way of business, at a starvation wage, have sought a field where their brains could be used to profitable account.

I know one young fellow—a shop assistant in the provinces some six years ago—now occupies a manager's position in one of the biggest and most successful advertising firms.

He was trained to success by the P.C.C.

I know another who not four years ago was working very hard in uncongenial employment at a very small salary. To-day he is acting as advertising representative for a thriving newspaper.

He also was trained to success by the P.C.C.

I could multiply these cases a hundredfold, and not exhaust one half of the remarkable instances of how a P.C.C. training can lift a man up from obscurity and poverty to a good position and a lucrative income.

To the man or woman, then, with the ambition to prosper and the energy to devote a little spare time to preparing themselves for betterment I can indicate no better course of action than to write to the Secretary of the Practical Correspondence College for a copy of "Brains and Ink," an illustrated and thoroughly interesting booklet on the possibilities of the advertising profession and the means which the P.C.C. place at its students' disposal to aid them in qualifying for a well-paid position in that well-paid profession.

"Brains and Ink" will be sent post free upon request. Address, the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

in their existence, and are inclined to regard the scenes of wild and whirling sensation through which they pass as aberrations of these otherwise entirely agreeable gentlemen. We cannot take the plot seriously; the notion that two hard-headed men would strip themselves to the extent portrayed in the novel, in order to appease the ferocious demands of an extortionate blackmailer, does not hold water for a moment. We prefer to look on "Patchwork" as a fantasy, in which the figures play their parts with provocative charm. We wish an author of such attainments would choose a less trite background on which to embroider his fantastic creations.

THE BLACK BEAN (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley, 6s.) is a story of love and racing. The story goes at a quick pace, and carries the reader along. There are certain touches of descriptive that show a quick eye for detail and a capacity for visualising certain scenes and bringing them vividly before the reader. No one ever tires of hearing how the favourite lost the great race, snatched within sight of the winning-post by the dark horse of the hero; and those who like the rush and stir of the racecourse in fiction will find plenty to amuse and interest them in "Thormanby's" last book.

LONDON VOICES (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) recalls the twang of the gramophone rather than the real, right thing. Mr. Keble Howard never comes within a mile of your true Cockney. His men and women are marionettes, who dance—not to the strains of the street organ, but to an electric piano. Clever but never convincing, the reader feels he is the spectator of a peep-show, a peep-show that suggests a play, and has no resemblance to the drama of real life. Eternally mechanical, you have only to test the reality of the street loafers by a walk down Hoxton Street; you will hear many amusing things, swift flashes of humour, brutality of expression, unadulterated vulgarity, but never so much as the faintest echo of what the author calls "London Voices."

Stories of violinists are perennially popular and occasionally suggestive. Miss Ethel Sidgwick has given us a clever study of temperament in SUCCESSION (Sidgwick and Jackson, 6s.). The hero is neither neurotic nor saccharine. He possesses indeed the essential qualities of the healthy human boy, and is by way of hiding his talent rather than burning with desire to exploit it. This is the note the author strikes throughout. Life is the drama; that Antoine is a musical genius is but one of the strands of the plot. And by doing this Miss Sidgwick avoids one of the pitfalls into which the musical novelist is so often betrayed. The red-haired heroine of "Illumination," Harold Frederic's clever book, who plays the soul out of the young clergyman and weaves her spells about him through the witchery of her touch on the piano, is never a human reality. She is a piano-player, and life, we feel, to her—and to the author—is subordinate to the movement of a sonata or the rhythm of a polonaise. The same holds good of Marion Crawford's "Soprano." Brilliant in dialogue and characterisation, the prima donna is inevitably the operatic singer, never the woman; and though the atmosphere of the stage and of the concert-room is permissible and desirable in dealing with events and persons purely of the dramatic, the theatric note is always struck. But these things are but the background for the essential human drama of Miss Sidgwick's novel, and the ultimate tragedy which releases the hero from his martyrdom to music is the culmination of the subtle but unceasing struggle portrayed throughout the book—the struggle as to whether Antoine, the child of many fears and hopes, shall justify his genius and the ambitions of his relatives, and set the world afire with his fame and live the life of a normal individual. M. Lemaure, the grandfather, who manages the boy with such consummate tact, is carefully thought out, with deft touches that make the portrait live. "M. Lemaure, who had hardly noticed Antoine in his distraction, presently caught sight of him, and, with a barely visible sign, brought him to his side. Having him there, he used him to rest a hand upon, and the boy knew, by the hand's weight, he was tired. Once, when Antoine glanced upon something in the dialogue, he caught his eye. The look was one of understanding, though he did not smile. Thereupon, the first ray of reality pierced Antoine's nightmare. He had been longing for weeks for this one person; now he felt that, somewhere in the distance, a grandfather might exist."

Poor child, oppressed by that nightmare! We owe the author a debt of gratitude when, at the last, she lets Antoine break through.

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Benson, Robert Hugh. "Confessions of a Convert." (Longmans, 3s. 6d.)
 Bentley, E. C. "Trent's Last Case." (Nelson, 2s.)
 Cogswell, K. E. "Three Black Stones." (Relfe Bros., 2s.)
 Colum, Padraic. "Oliver Goldsmith." (Herbert and Daniel, 2s. 6d.)
 Cullum, Ridgewell. "The Brooding Wild." (Chapman and Hall, 2s.)
 Fox, S. M. "This Generation." (Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d.)
 Grantham, F. "Life, Ideals, and Death." (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.)
 James, J. G. "The Prayer Life." (Rev. F. B. Meyer, 2s. 6d.)
 Parents' Book. (Jack, 3s. 6d.)
 Perrycoste, F. H. "On the Influence of Religion on Truthfulness." (Watts, 4s.)
 Piers Plowman. "Histories" (Junior Books 1 to 5). (Heffer, 2s.)
 " " " " (Senior Book 1). (Heffer, 2s.)
 Rubin, Alexandre. "Les Roumains de Macédonie." (Imprimerie Professionnelle Dém. C. Jonesco, 5 fr.)
 Schloesser, H. H. "Trade Unionism." (Methuen, 2s. 6d.)
 Wallace, Alfred Russel. "Social Environment and Social Progress." (Cassell, 3s. 6d.)
 Wallace, Helen. "Morning Glory." (Cassell, 6s.)
 Watson, William. "The Muse in Exile." (Jenkins, 3s. 6d.)
 Whyte, Adam Gowans. "The Religion of the Open Mind." (Watts, 2s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.

GENERAL

SWINBURNE: An Estimate

By JOHN DRINKWATER

Small Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

Morning Post.—"From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

RAVENNA. By EDWARD HUTTON

With Illustrations in Line and Colour by Harald Sund. 10s. 6d. net.

Daily Express.—"I have found 'Ravenna' absorbingly interesting, and I most heartily commend it to the reader who cares for drama and romance—this is to say, who cares for history."

DREAMS AND THE WAY OF DREAMS.

By R. L. HINE

Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Manchester Courier.—"Mr. Hine has accomplished his object and written a book of real literary merit. Every reader with imagination will find something to give him pleasure in these pages."

LONDON'S UNDERWORLD

By THOMAS HOLMES

New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo.
2s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"It is good that rare men like Mr. Holmes exist, for there are not many of us who could spend a long lifetime amongst the human wrecks of the underworld and still retain any confidence or hope in human nature. This is a book that will make people think, and, in a way, it ought to make us hopeful."

BROWNING'S SORDELLO

Being the Text of the Poem, with Introductions, Notes and Index by the Rev. ARTHUR JAMES WHYTE, M.A., Clough Memorial Prizeman, Gold Medallist and Senior Moderator in History in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo. 7s. net.

(IN PREPARATION.)

3 GOOD NOVELS

DAISY DARLEY

6s.

By W. P. RYAN

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

THE LOST MAMELUKE

6s.

By DAVID M. BEDDOE

An absorbing story of Egypt in the closing years of the Mameluke ascendancy

THE CHARMING of ESTERCEL

By GRACE RHYS

6s.

The real hero in this story is not a man but a horse—quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted.

MYSTICAL BOOKS

THE MYSTIC WAY

By EVELYN UNDERHILL

Square Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"Miss Underhill's book is a triumph in erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS

By EDMUND G. GARDNER

Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"A deep and sympathetic student of Dante and of the mediæval mystics, he brings to this inquiry the rare combination of qualities that it demands, vision and scholarship, and that extreme delicacy of touch which makes possible an orderly marshalling and presentation of almost intangible things."

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED

Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

The book aims at giving the student a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the "Comedy," and therefore a keen appreciation of those distinctive features in which Dante's own personality more especially reveals itself.

DANTE'S THE DIVINE COMEDY.

Newly Translated by C. E. WHEELER. In three volumes, with Photogravure Frontispiece to each. Square Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net per volume.

1. HELL; 2. PURGATORY; 3. PARADISE.

Spectator.—"Mr. Wheeler's version is admirable for its conscientious workmanship."

Pail Mail.—"It is quite indispensable to English students of Dante."

THE MEDIAEVAL TOWN SERIES

JUST ISSUED.

COVENTRY

By MARY DORMER HARRIS

JERUSALEM

By Col. Sir C. M. WATSON, K.C.M.G.

LUCCA

By JANET ROSS and NELLY ERICHSEN and Illustrated by Nellie Erichsen

SANTIAGO

By C. GASCOIGNE HARTLEY

A full list of titles will be sent upon application.

Sphere.—"Who can travel throughout Europe to-day, or for that matter throughout England, without one or another volume of this delightful series?"

F'cap 8vo. In two styles of binding:

Cloth: 3s. 6d.—4s. 6d. net;

Leather: 4s. 6d.—

5s. 6d. net.

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUSES.

137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

THE STORY OF TWO "SWANS" which cost their respective owners half a guinea each

I am just an ordinary ten-and-sixpenny "Swan" Fountain Pen. My master was a school-boy when he bought me. I have lived in his waistcoat pocket for almost sixteen years; have passed all his examinations for him; have travelled thousands of miles with him; and have even been with him to the Arctic. I have been pulled out of my warm pocket to make notes in a snow hut, as we rested on one of our sledge journeys; and once I fell out and lay for a whole night on the ice and thought I was lost; but an Eskimo picked me up in the morning. He wiped the snow off me, and looked at me very carefully; then he said something to himself which I recognised as "the little something that writes," and marched me straight home to my master.

And so we have lived together, my master and I, like bosom friends.

This morning we were working together when he dropped me, and before he knew it he had trodden on me. So here I am, laid on the shelf, within ten days of my sixteenth birthday. I hope to be at work again soon, for I heard my master say something about fitting me with a new barrel, for my nib is as good as ever.—Yours truly, "3012."

P.S.—My diet always consists of "SWAN" ink and "SWAN" ink only.

Dear Brother "3012,"

I see that you have been writing a fine letter about your achievements—now let me have a turn. You can brag about your adventures, but, although I'm only a "man in the street," or, rather, "on the road," I am just as much a 10/6 "Swan" as you are.

For twelve years I have worked. At the office, hard at it the whole day long, only stopping for meals (I, too, need "filling" you know), a slave myself though making things run ever so smoothly for my master. I have done military duty at camp under all sorts of hard conditions, and the more peaceful one of "taking down" sermons at church. I have written much sweet music and things still sweeter in the shape of missives to "his girl" (oh! but I was very nearly sacrificed once when these two dear people embraced at parting—they forgot I was in between).

In a hot boiler house, amidst clouds of steam, I have made records, and then gone out in the snow and made more. In tram, motor-bus, train, and even on a cycle I have done my duty, and not failed on the top of Skiddaw or at the bottom of a coal mine. Not bad for this old nib, is it? And there's life in the old dog yet, I can tell you.

I feed on "SWAN" ink, of course—have done ever since I got sense—and I reckon that if you or I don't get under the garden roller or drop from a first-floor window on to the pavement, a "jubilee" of service will in due course be celebrated by yourself and (Signed) Your brother "3012."

IS NOT SERVICE SUCH AS THIS WORTH YOUR WHILE?

Prices
10/6
upwards

"SWAN"

Sold by Stationers
and Jewellers.

Catalogue free from: MABIE, TODD & CO., 79 and 80, High Holborn, London, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 32. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MAY 23, 1913

One Penny.

RW.
1861

RICHARD WAGNER, NATUS 1813,
OBIIT 1883

For Character Sketch, see page 169.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Portrait of Richard Wagner | 161 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 162 |
| Irish Protestants and Home Rule—By J. M. Hone | 163 |
| Some Thoughts on the Suffrage Question—By E. H. Shillito, B.A. | 164 |
| Mr. Whibley's Biographical Studies | 165 |
| Historic Cities of the World. I.—Paris. Part I.—By the Editor | 166 |
| Appassionata—By Dorothy Eyre | 167 |
| Canada and Canadian Policy. Part II.—By Augustus Bridle | 168 |
| Richard Wagner—By J. Cuthbert Hadden | 169 |
| The Church Union Question in Scotland—By Hector Macpherson | 170 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. "The Imitation of Christ."—By Monsignor R. H. Benson | 171 |
| A Republic of Books—By Ernest Rhys | 173 |
| The Recall—By Mary Bradford Whiting | 174 |
| My Uncle Sosthène—By Guy de Maupassant | 176 |
| Literary Notes | 178 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Is the Human Brain Degenerating? | 180 |
| The Problem of the Worker | 182 |
| Pacifism and Imperialism | 184 |
| The Lloyd George Crusade | 185 |
| The Birth of a New Civilisation | 186 |
| A Protestant Protest on the Romanist Bias of "Everyman" | 186 |
| Books of the Week | 186 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE delegates of the belligerent Balkan nations are meeting again in London to arrange the preliminaries of peace. Never did an international conference have a more complicated task submitted to it. It will require infinite firmness and ingenuity on the part of the Great Powers, and infinite moderation and self-restraint on the part of the Balkan peoples, to reconcile their conflicting interests and ambitions. Where everything hangs in the balance, it is hopeless to speculate. At the same time, the broad outlines of any reasonable and permanent settlement are fairly obvious. The source of all past and future trouble lies in the racial antagonisms of the Balkan nations. It must therefore be the object of the European concert to establish an equilibrium between the opposing national forces, and to prevent any one Balkan nation from establishing its supremacy over the others. In the interests of future peace, in order to maintain the balance of power within the Balkan Peninsula, and in order to counteract the formidable expansion of the Slav element, it is not desirable that Bulgaria, as was at one time expected, should get the lion's share. Some compensation will have to be given to Roumania, and a very large increase of territory will probably have to be granted to Greece, which ought to become mistress of Salonica. In this way, with the establishment of an autonomous Albania, three non-Slav nationalities, Roumania, Greece, and Albania, will hold in check the three Slav nationalities of Montenegro, Servia and Bulgaria. Unless some such equilibrium be established, the Peace Settlement will be eminently precarious. All the more so because Servian and Montenegrin ambitions will still remain unfulfilled and because Albania is likely for generations to be a smouldering volcano.

The Government have suffered a severe defeat at the Newmarket by-election, the Unionists securing a majority of 851. The defeated candidate, Mr. George Nicholls, speaking to a representative of the Daily Chronicle, attributes his defeat mainly to the bad administration of the Insurance Act. "We should have won," said Mr. Nicholls, "had it not been for the way in which the Insurance Act has been administered in Cambridgeshire. This had more to do with my defeat than anything else." Such an admission on the part of a Liberal candidate goes a long way to justify the severe strictures which have been passed on the gross mismanagement in connection with the Insurance Act, and the election ought to be a warning to the Government to put their house in order.

The tide of emigration continues unabated. Thousands every week continue to leave London, Liverpool and Glasgow for Canada and Australia. There is every indication that the year 1913 will beat every record in the recent history of emigration, and that before December 300,000 will have left these shores. And what is even more ominous than the quantity of the emigration is its quality. It is the young men, the enterprising and the energetic, that are leaving. It is the old men, the women and the children that are left behind. Some of the most beautiful districts of Scotland are being depleted. Whole cities, like the old county town of Jedburgh, are left desolate, and houses are crumbling in even in the main streets. In view of the unprecedented nature of the emigration phenomenon at a period of booming trade and of universal prosperity, EVERYMAN will open a discussion which will be started next week by Mr. Chiozza Money, M.P.

It is a sign of the times that the Public Health Congress in Paris was so largely occupied with what is called industrial hygiene—a subject which practically did not exist fifty years ago. One of the most brilliant papers in this section, and one of particular interest to the layman, was read by a young English medico, Dr. Shufflebotham, of Newcastle-under-Lyme. Dr. Shufflebotham has specialised in industrial diseases, and his paper dealt with occupational fatigue, a most important factor in industrial and general efficiency, and one to which present-day psychologists, notably Dr. Münsterberg, have given considerable attention. Dr. Shufflebotham emphasised the fact that public opinion can yet do much to ameliorate the conditions of labour from the health point of view, and pointed out that not only excessive or insufficient heating, but also the less noticed defect of insufficient lighting, was responsible for a large proportion of industrial accidents. He laid special stress upon the utter inadequacy of the common miner's lamp, which, after being used for some time, is reduced to a very low power.

The Yellow Press of America is making the most of the awkward entanglement which the Californian anti-Japanese legislation has created, and its headlines reek of war. Mr. Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, is making valiant efforts to counteract these endless war rumours, and spares no pains in doing so. Thus he explained to a group of correspondents how the fact of a cruiser having been sent for a trial run to San Francisco, in order to test the quality of some Alaskan coal, appeared in the Yellow Press as: "U.S. ship 'Maryland' stripped for action, makes forced speed to San Francisco. Prepare for battle."

IRISH PROTESTANTS AND HOME RULE

BY J. M. HONE

Inauguration of Protestant Campaign

SHORTLY before Christmas last year a meeting was held in the City of London, at which Mr. Stephen Gwynn, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, and other distinguished men spoke as Irish Protestants in favour of Home Rule. It was the inauguration of a Protestant campaign against the attitude of North-East Ulster. Again, a few weeks ago another meeting for the same purpose took place in Dublin, with Mr. W. B. Yeats as the principal speaker. This movement, if it be watched by the British public, will reveal the fact that the "aristocracy" of Irish Protestantism is Nationalist, at least outside of Trinity College; if one wants to hear the Irish problem discussed with intellectual sincerity one must listen to the Protestant Home Ruler—or, conversely, to the Catholic Unionist (the best speeches against Home Rule made in the recent Parliamentary debates were those of Irish Catholic Unionists). Protestant Home Rulers, therefore, do not pretend that anything like a conversion en masse of Irish Protestants to Nationalism is either taking place or likely in the near future to take place. The pronouncements of the Irish Protestant Church bodies, and the attitude of that part of Ulster in which the Protestant colony is concentrated are definite and decided. Irish Protestants in the mass are still Unionist, and "Ulster" is the most significant fact in the Irish situation to-day, because "Ulster" is more determined not to have Home Rule than Nationalist Ireland is determined to have it.

I.

Irish Nationality Established by Irish Protestants

Irish Protestant Home Rulers, however, believe that their co-religionists will not merely evade persecution, but will profit under Home Rule: they do not profess to be altruists. History bears out this view. The great epoch of the Irish Protestants (or Anglo-Irish) was the epoch of Grattan's Parliament. The oratory and architecture which made Dublin famous at the end of the eighteenth century were the achievement of the ancestors of the Irish Unionists, not of the ancestors of the Irish Nationalists.

One may go further and say that the modern "idea" of Irish Nationality was established by Irish Protestants. The Roman Catholic Church favoured the union; the Orangemen were against it. Most of the great Irish leaders in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were Protestants—Swift, Grattan, Tone, Emmet, Davis, John Mitchell, Isaac Butt, Charles Stewart Parnell. If Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. W. B. Yeats may not be described as "Irish leaders," they are the two Irishmen whose names are most widely known outside of these countries.

Were Trinity College Nationalist, one might say that all the intellect of Protestant Ireland was for Home Rule. And into Trinity College patriotism is penetrating. The attempt of the Ulster Unionists to exclude this seat of learning from the provisions of the Home Rule Bill provoked the active opposition of a minority of Fellows and graduates, led by Dr. Mahaffy. Dr. Mahaffy, whom one should have classed with Mr. Shaw and Mr. Yeats as an Irishman with an assured European reputation, is not a Home Ruler; but he believes that Trinity College and Protestantism have a leading rôle, an Irish rôle, to play in the Ireland of the future.

II.

Home Rule to Benefit Irish Protestantism

But what precisely is meant by Irish Protestantism? Do our Home Rulers use the word in its political and local sense, as connoting the alien race or class that was once described as "Ascendancy"? When they say that Home Rule will benefit Irish Protestantism, do they mean that under Home Rule we shall again see the "English in Ireland" getting a share in government out of proportion to their numbers, if not out of proportion to their wealth and intelligence? It is not necessary to draw this conclusion. Mr. Shaw's idea seems to be (see the Home Rule Preface to "John Bull's Other Island") that the Roman Catholics of Ireland, having got rid of one "foreign domination," that of London, will then (under Home Rule) establish the Protestants in power with a view to the destruction of another "foreign domination," that of Rome. "They (the Irish Protestants) will take an energetic part in the national government, which will be sorely in need of Parliamentary and official forces independent of Rome. They will get not only the Protestant votes, but the votes of Catholics in that spirit of toleration which is everywhere extended to heresies that happen to be politically serviceable to the orthodox." When Ireland is free of London and Rome alike, then the Protestant-Catholic line of cleavage will lose its political, social, and racial characters.

But Mr. Yeats, Mr. Shaw, and their like can scarcely be described as representative Irish Protestants, for Protestant Christianity is still a very living faith in Ireland. "What right have these people to speak for the Protestants? Do they go to Church?" an Ulsterman once naively asked the present writer in argument. There is something in it. One can, however, point to a few clergymen of the Disestablished Church of Ireland who entertain Home Rule opinions, and who, when they say that Home Rule will benefit Protestantism, are thinking (we may assume) chiefly of their Church. There can be no doubt that the Protestant faith would have made more headway among the native Irish if it had not been associated in the Kelt's mind with confiscation and political injustice. But the opportunity was let slip after the days of Bishop Bedell—he who translated the Bible into Irish, and was "keened" at burial by Kelts. "May he rest in peace, the last of the English!" It will scarcely be recovered. Strong Nationalists have often had political occasion to quarrel with the Roman Catholic Church; heresy was rampant among the United Irishmen, the Young Irelanders, and the Fenians; but the Protestant Church has not directly profited. The Roman Catholic in Ireland, as elsewhere, who revolts against "the priest," turns not "Protestant," but agnostic. Mr. George Moore was a solitary exception; when angry at the want of patriotism of the Roman Catholic Bishops, he entered the Protestant Church—but Mr. Moore will only do those things that are inimitable.

III.

Irish Protestants who Approve of Priest's Power

It should be remarked, however, that there are Irish Protestants who deny that the power of the priest is excessive. We know many Irish Protestants whose strongest objection to Home Rule is precisely that in a self-governed Ireland the political influence of the Roman Catholic Church will vanish. Conservatives first of all, such Protestants hold that the priest is a bulwark against Socialism, and nothing would be more calculated to confirm them in their Unionism than the anti-clerical argument for Home Rule. Nor is it possible to think that the rich manufacturers of Belfast, educated men, believe as fanatically as they pretend in the wickedness of the Pope. It is possible to suspect that they dislike Trade Unionism, and do want to keep their Protestant and Catholic workmen apart. Again, one knows of Irish Protestants—a very few—who approve of the priests' power, but think that Home Rule will strengthen it, and want Home Rule for that reason.

We have no idea what view, if any, the Pope takes of Irish politics to-day. It is, however, an historical fact that the result of the Battle of the Boyne caused rejoicings at the Vatican, and later history, too, displays Rome as hostile to Irish national aspirations. The writer once heard an educated orator tell an Orange audience that he would defend Unionism against any man—"even the Pope, if he came to this marketplace." That orator was trusting in a people's ignorance, appealing to a people's prejudice. What Ireland, south as well as north, most wants is neither Home Rule nor the Union, neither clericalism nor anti-clericalism, nor, again, an artificial union of class, creed and race, but intellectual sincerity; she needs that her leaders of opinion shall cease to use arguments upon others that do not convince themselves. The same criticism applies, no doubt, to Great Britain and to all countries; but one has this belief—or patriotic illusion—that the Irish, like the Latin peoples, will not hate the truth when they are told it.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION

By E. H. SHILLITO, B.A.

AT the present time it is difficult for sane, clear-minded people to say whose actions one regards with the greater amazement: those of the suffragists who, by their blind policy and their refusal to face human nature as it is, have thrown away an opportunity of gaining the franchise, which is not likely to recur again at an early date; or those of the statesmen who have allowed the action of a few thousand out of the millions of women in the country to change their views on this important question.

The present position is one of extreme delicacy and danger; what may be the outcome of the collision of these two strong opposing forces it is difficult to say. On the one hand, we have a band of women, a small band certainly, who are willing to sacrifice even life itself, if necessary, to gain the vote. On the other hand are a number of statesmen, who, guided by prejudice, petty irritation, or fear of the unknown, are determined not to be intimidated into surrender. It is an interesting situation, and one wonders what will be the result. The strength of the women lies in the fact that justice and right are on their side. If a democratic government is acknowledged to be the right method of ruling these islands, there is no valid argument for excluding women from the franchise. The tactics of the militants are undoubtedly mistaken; it is manifestly an absurdity for the weaker sex to try to gain anything by physical force, as in this they are undoubtedly inferior to men. The appeal of women for equal rights with men can only be successful in a state where mere brute strength has ceased to be the criterion of a human being's value. Possibly these militants have done useful work in making women's suffrage a living possibility instead of a mere theoretical subject for students' essays; but no person can deny that recently they have done far more harm than good to their own cause.

Little has been done for the woman's suffrage cause, too, by the members of the peaceful societies who have claimed, without considering the facts of the case, a Government measure. Even in their ardent zeal for an important cause, it would have been well to realise that the franchise has to be granted by a Parliament bound by the conventions and rules of ordinary Parliamentary procedure. A Government divided against itself on any question obviously cannot introduce a measure dealing with that disputed subject.

These errors, however, are technical rather than fundamental, caused by an excess of enthusiasm, which has, for the time being, obscured vision. Such errors have been made over and over again by members of the other sex, and have nothing peculiarly feminine in them. But, as in the case of a lady doctor, mistakes of this kind in a woman are generally taken to be a result of her sex, so manifestly unfair is the judgment on women who enter fields hitherto unexplored by them.

Behind these ladies whose zeal oftentimes outruns discretion, however, is a large and increasing army of educated and working women, who are directly or indirectly working for the vote. This fact, coupled with the justice of the claim, ensures success sooner or later; how long the delay will be, who can say?

With regard to the Government, it is difficult to realise that a body of statesmen could be so influenced by the annoying actions of a number of fanatics as our present M.P.'s have been. In May, 1911, Sir George Kemp's Bill was carried at the Second Reading by a majority of 167; in May, 1913, Dickinson's Bill is defeated by a majority of 47, which statistics mean that 107 statesmen have changed their convictions owing to the action of the militants. Truly a reflection on statesmanship! There may be some truth in the asseveration of the women that not until this year has a Women's Suffrage Bill ever been considered as anything but a little amusement pour passer le temps, and that men who voted for a Bill that had no chance of becoming law would not do so for one that was really regarded seriously. For a Liberal Government, too, as a question of practical politics, the point arises whether the addition of women to the voting register, on any basis whatever, would not increase the forces of their opponents. Their hands are also somewhat tied by a Prime Minister who is consistently opposed to the granting of the suffrage to woman, and who has behaved most generously in defiance of his own convictions.

It is surely time, however, that this question should be settled on its own merits, that party and all other prejudice should be put on one side, and the justice of the women's claim considered. And surely to this there can be only one answer. Gamaliel's words to the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, when the rulers were disturbed by the activity of the early Christians, expressed a truth that all statesmen would be wise to realise. "If this counsel be the work of men, it will be overthrown; but if it be of God, ye will not be able to overthrow them." Justice has always been held to be one of the greatest attributes of the Deity, and, without any irreverence, all claims for justice may be said to be "of God." Nothing can finally put an end to such demands. Nothing will end the campaign of women for their rights as citizens but the granting of the vote. One only hopes that statesmen will realise this before any irreparable damage has been done—if, indeed, it has not already been done.

Nothing reveals true greatness of character so clearly as the willingness to give in at the right moment. It is the supreme test of a ruler, whether it be the humble master of the schoolroom, the mistress of the home, or the great statesman whose word sways and influences thousands. In weak natures, obstinacy is invariably one of the most marked characteristics, a quality that outwardly resembles, but is really totally different from the tenacity of purpose that defies and overcomes difficulties. One has only to go back to the history of our own country to see how the weakest kings have invariably been the greatest tyrants: how, in spite of all warnings and demands on the part of their subjects, they have insisted on their own way, and have sooner or later brought themselves or the country to disaster. The Stuarts, with all their personal charm and the fascination they had, and still have for many of the English people, failed in this—they did not know when to give in. Relying on their belief in the divine right of kings, they resisted the just claims of the people, and paid the penalty, as all such rulers must. George III., through lack of this insight, lost for us the great colony across the seas: he refused to acknowledge that the claim of the colonists was a right one, and to realise that nothing can pacify the demand for justice except the granting of it. An example of wise statesmanship was shown by the Duke of Wellington in the year 1832, when the Great Reform Bill that enfranchised half a million men was before the country. This Bill had already been thrown out by the House of Lords, a rejection that caused the famous riots of that year. The Duke, who was personally opposed to the Bill, realising that resistance to such demands was futile, wisely left the Upper House, taking with him a number of his followers, so that the Bill was carried. Would that our present statesmen would follow his example!

But beyond the claim for mere justice, the women's demand has a deeper inner significance. Lately, in connection with the discussion on the White Slave Traffic, a searchlight has been thrown on one of the darkest sides of human life. It is to lessen sin, sorrow, and suffering that we ask for the vote. We long for a day when no woman will be obliged to sell herself for gold. Indirectly, the possession of the vote will raise women, socially, economically, and morally, and the men of the country will rise with them. As Sir Edward Grey said in his masterly speech, the indirect influence of the vote is greater than the direct.

The best men, as a rule, set women on a pedestal: the worst consider them as creatures made for their own pleasures. Neither are right.

"Oh, if you ever marry," said Mrs. Falconer to John Gray in "The Choir Invisible," "don't make the mistake of treating the woman as an ideal! Treat her in every way as a human being exactly like yourself! With the same weaknesses, the same struggles, the same temptations!" Every thinking woman would echo that cry. We want to work side by side with men, either as wives in the home, or fellow-workers in the world: not antagonistic, but sympathetic, each sex doing the work the other cannot do.

Let our statesmen beware lest in their short-sighted refusal to grant what is obviously a right they instigate that greatest of all evils, a sex-war!

MR. WHIBLEY'S BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES*

MR. WHIBLEY is so practised a literary hand that the appearance of his name on the title-page of a volume of essays usually betokens a feast of good things. Nor is there any disappointment in the present instance, for, with one exception, the eight studies which comprise this volume deal with personages of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a period which the author has made peculiarly his own. We do not know that Mr. Whibley has ever published anything quite so good; certainly he has never excelled these brilliant essays. Accomplished scholarship, grace of style, and wise and withal charitable interpretation of human character are apparent on every page.

By far the longest study is that with which the volume opens. It consists of three essays, which recount the life-story of Sir Thomas Overbury—that pathetic figure "whose haggard ghost still walks in the secret places of the Tower." The first treats of Overbury's rise and fall, the second of his imprisonment and tragic death, and the third of his literary achievement as set forth in his "Characters." It is usual to associate the "Character" as a literary convention, mainly with the name of Samuel Butler, who, as Mr. Whibley points out, made most effective use of it in political controversy. But it is to Overbury that we owe the beginning of the "Character." His work, our author shows, formed a chapter in the history of literature, for it was the first of its kind to be composed in English.

In the sixteenth century no figure was more familiar to the courts and colleges of Europe than the travelling Scot. Mr. Whibley here presents us with masterly portraits of two of the most famous—George Buchanan and James Crichton, better known as the "Admirable." Buchanan's services to humanism and literature are skilfully summed up. We do not remember having seen him compared with Rabelais, but certainly the resemblance which Mr. Whibley establishes is striking. The judgment of Crichton is, in the main, conventional. "He was something of a coxcomb. There is the truth in six words."

Of John Stow, the Elizabethan chronicler, whose "Survey of London" contains much curious antiquarian lore, we have an interesting sketch, which the author winds up by bemoaning the vanishing of much that gave London for centuries an attractive architectural character of its own.

"London is the Paradise of the County Councillor, and if only the financiers are amiable, in fifty years there will be no ancient stone standing on another. Not only will the houses of London disappear before the greed of the speculative builder; the streets themselves will be lost in straight-cut boulevards."

The remaining essays discourse pleasantly regarding Edward Hall, "the eloquent panegyrist of Henry VIII.," John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, who seems to have had his counterpart, in later ages, in the "Bloody Mackenzie," the persecutor of the Covenanters, for Tiptoft was an "accomplished scholar, munificent patron of learning, and the Butcher of England"; Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle, who seems to have been a wit and a Blue-stocking born out of due season; and Sir Thomas Browne, the genial author of the "Religio Medici," a work to which, as well as to the author, Mr. Whibley does full justice. Should the book come to a second edition, the curious slip on page 174 ought to be corrected.

* "Essays in Biography." By Charles Whibley. 5s. net. (Constable.)

HISTORIC CITIES OF THE WORLD

I.—PARIS * * * BY THE EDITOR

PART I.

MY DEAR "EVERYMAN,"—The hearty welcome which you have extended to the series of sketches on the "Countries of the World" encourages me to submit to you another series on the "Historic Cities of the World." Such a subject ought to be of even greater educational interest than the previous one. For if it be desirable to extend our knowledge of other nations, so as to widen our horizon and to develop the European spirit, what may be called the Catholic and Universal spirit, it is even more important from a practical and moral point of view to develop the civic spirit, to foster the love of the city. And this can best be done by showing what the city has accomplished for humanity in the past. It is my firm conviction that the city has done a great deal more than either nation or empire, and that, therefore, to develop the civic spirit is vastly more important than to develop the national or Imperial spirit. Whoever studies the history of Athens and Rome, of Florence and Venice, of Nuremberg and Cologne, of Bruges and Antwerp, of London and Edinburgh, must come to the conclusion that it is mainly the city that has built up civilisation.

We shall start this new series with the world city, Paris. So wonderful have been the developments of democratic travel that Everyman can now afford to go to Paris. To go to Paris is as easy and as cheap as to go to Edinburgh. This Whitsuntide, thousands of Londoners have run across the Channel for the week-end at the total cost of 26s. Everyman has the chance, and Everyman ought to use it. The tragedy of it is that ninety-five per cent. of those who do go to the world city do not even realise the magnificent advantages which are within their reach. For the enormous majority of visitors to Paris it is only a pleasant trip, and nothing more. It is not the educational discipline which it might be and which it ought to be.

And this is not for lack of knowledge of the language, which, however useful, is not essential; it is mainly for total lack of guidance. It is true the tourist has at his disposal hundreds of popular guide-books to Paris. Unfortunately those "guide-books" do not guide him, but misguide him. Nothing could well be more superficial, more artificial, more conventional than the information given by even the best of them. Take Baedeker—probably the most perfect guide-book to Paris, of which an excellent new edition has just appeared (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)—how little does it tell us of the realities of Parisian life, of the conditions under which the French millions work, of their national characteristics. To read Baedeker, or Murray, or Joanne, one would imagine that the British nation are the most artistic nation in the world, the most passionately and the most exclusively devoted to the fine arts. One would imagine that to look at pictures, to visit museums, is the one thing worth living for, and worth going to Paris for. There is no more melancholy sight than to see the herds of tourists driven through the Louvre by a Cook's agent, and looking with pathetic docility at the pictures which Cook or Baedeker tells them to look at. The thousands who are never tired of doing a Catholic cathedral never think of attending a Catholic service, which alone would reveal to them the meaning of that cathedral. The thousands who are never tired of visiting museums, academies, or salons never think of looking at the scenes of real life which those pictures illustrate.

In giving a survey of the historic cities of the world, we shall therefore only make passing reference to the conventional "sights" described in the conventional guide-books. We shall assume that Everyman is not only interested in the monuments of Paris, but in the men who built the monuments, that he is not only interested in the dead past, but in the living present, that he is not only interested in the gossip or scandal of royalty, but in the lives of suffering humanity. We shall draw Everyman's attention to the inequalities of wealth, to the distribution of population, to the human and social aspects of each district, to the Fair and the Market-place, to the Slum and the Rookery, to the Pawnshop and the Police Court; in short, to the conditions under which the toiling millions earn their precarious existence.

I.

In its relation to France, Paris occupies an altogether unique position. It is the one centre of national life in a sense no other capital is. It absorbs in itself all the national activities in a sense which no other capital does. Suppress Rome, and there still remain Florence, the artistic capital; Milan, the industrial capital; Venice and Genoa, the commercial capitals. Suppress Berlin, and there still remain Leipzig and Cologne and Munich and Düsseldorf. Suppress London, and the shipping and the trade and the industries and the artistic and intellectual activities of the British people still continue in Liverpool and Glasgow, in Manchester and Birmingham, in Oxford and Edinburgh. But destroy Paris, and you strike at the very heart and brain of the French people. For many centuries Paris has concentrated the Government and the industries, the wealth and the art and the intellect of the French people.

Paris is the harmonious synthesis of many contrasts and many contradictions. Paris is the city of the past, and the listless tourist in quest of amusement is haunted at every street corner by the most venerable memories of civilisation. But if Paris is the City of tradition, the City of Emperor Julian and St. Louis, of the Renaissance Monarchy, she is also the City of revolution, the Mecca of Triumphant Democracy. The civic motto of Paris fittingly expresses the political destiny of the capital: "Fluctuat nec mergitur"—"always tossed on tempestuous waves, yet never submerged"!

Paris is supreme in the arts of peace, but it is also the strongest military fortress of the world, and on its capacity to repel the foreign invader depends national security. Paris is the capital of literature and art. But it is also a beehive of industry. It is also the first commercial harbour of France.

Paris is the city of leisure. Whatever a millionaire has earned in the Argentine, or San Francisco, or Siberia, he comes to spend here. But that city of leisure is also a city of strenuous labour, and the highest of all forms of labour—scientific labour—is better organised here than anywhere else. Paris is a city of pleasure, and, to outward appearance, light-hearted and frivolous, yet it is also intensely earnest, and few capitals evoke so many tragedies. In few cities are men more weighed down under the burden of so many anxious responsibilities.

No city is more characteristically French. She is the exquisite flower and culminating blossom of Latin culture. Yet Paris is also pre-eminently cosmopolitan, and her attractive power represents the mysterious fascination and magnetism of the French genius. Generation after generation travellers have felt with the Roman Emperor Julian, and have sung the praise of his "beloved Lutetia." There are living, even to-day, 600,000 foreigners inside and outside her walls. London and New York may far outnumber her, but Paris remains the city of light and leading. Every event has a wider echo here than in any other capital. Any revolution which originates in Paris is likely to spread in stormy waves to the extreme ends of the world. Every drama enacted on the Parisian stage stands a good chance of becoming a world drama.

In studying so infinitely complex a world as Paris, within the few days which the average tourist has at his disposal, it is no doubt advisable to adopt some method. It may be more pleasant to wander about aimlessly as our fancy leads us; still, for the traveller who wants to make the most of his opportunity, and to whom travel is not merely a relaxation and a luxury, but an education, some systematic plan is certainly advisable. The academic student who still believes that the past has a prior claim on his attention will prefer to explore in their historic sequence the ancient Lutetia, of Cæsar and Julian, the Mediæval, Gothic and scholastic and Ecclesiastical Paris, the Paris of the Renaissance, the Paris of Louis XIV., the Paris of the Revolution and the Empire. On the other hand, the student of present-day conditions will prefer to examine the various social conglomerations which constitute the world city, the city of labour and democracy in the east end, the city of wealth and leisure in the west end, the city of pleasure in the north, the city of knowledge and learning in the south, the city of trade in the centre, and the original historic city of Nôtre Dame and the Saint Chapelle and the Palais in the island of the Cité.

I have often found it extremely useful for didactic purposes to adopt some such sociological divisions. But for our present purpose, in attempting a brief systematic survey of the French capital, it will be more practical to accept the existing administrative districts. Since 1859 Paris, within the boundaries of the old fortifications of 1840, is divided into twenty independent cities (arrondissements) and eighty districts (quartiers), and the succession of those twenty cities forms a spiral twice revolving round its centre. The centre is constituted by the first four arrondissements. The next seven arrondissements form an inner circle. The remaining nine arrondissements form an outer circle, and constitute the eccentric and outlying districts. I believe that, on the whole, the simplest plan for the student is to follow that political spiral. I am quite aware that any purely administrative divisions have something artificial, but, after all, those twenty cities have now had a corporate life for more than half a century, and although they are only known by abstract numbers, they yet constitute living civic units; they possess a moral and political personality.

II.

It will be best to take the first two arrondissements together. They are bounded by the Seine on the south, by the Grands Boulevards on the north, by the Boulevard de Sébastopol on the east, and they are separated by the rue des Petits Champs and the rue Etienne Marcel. In area they are the two smallest divisions of Paris, yet they contain the chief organs of economic life and the majority of the most important "sights" of the capital. There are few spots on earth outside Rome where so much history, so much art, so much beauty, are concentrated in so narrow a space as in the first arrondissement, of which the second arrondissement is only the hinterland. Here are crowded together the Louvre, the Palais de Justice, with the Tuileries, the Place Vendôme, the national theatre (la Comédie Française), the National Library, the Palais Royal, the Post Office, the Exchange, the central market-place of Paris (les Halles), as well as the great stores and the luxurious shops dear to fashion.

Although the most animated quarter of Paris, although throbbing with a feverish life which continues for twenty-two hours in the day, this district is not Parisian; it is not French. It is pre-eminently cosmopolitan. It is the realm of the tourist. It belongs to the alien nomad. Few Parisians reside here. The population is a population of waiters and servants, hotel-keepers and shopkeepers catering for the foreign mob.

Most educated tourists make it a point of duty to visit the Comédie Française—the "House of Molière," the home of the classic drama. I am afraid such a visit is rather a sacrifice to convention than a means of education. An appreciation of Corneille and Racine and Molière requires a very different initiation into the mysteries of the French language from that which is generally received at school. To be quite candid, rather than take the traveller to hear classic comedy or tragedy at the Théâtre Français, I would rather take him to the open-air comedies of the market-place or to the domestic tragedies of the police courts. A visit to the Halles between five and seven in the morning—the Parisian is a much earlier riser than the Londoner—and a visit to the Palais de Justice will teach the tourist more about French character than any number of nights at the "Théâtre." The brightness and excitability and loquacity of the women at the Halles, the atmosphere of sentiment in the Inns of Court, the rhetoric and the passion of the advocates, will reveal in a few hours, better than anything else, the gulf which divides the French temperament, from the British.

(To be continued.)

APPASSIONATA

NIGHT was drawing her silvery stars one by one into the deep blue of the sky, when I went out alone to the wilderness to meet my love.

I had waited so long in the silence, but no awakening call had come to me out of the lonely void until this night.

Far away I wandered towards the voice that was echoing across the parched sands.

Earth trembled at his approach, and a light wind stirred my hair as he came swiftly over the sand.

He was beside me.

Silently I lifted my eyes to his, and in that long, lingering look, memories of strange things—of lives together in the dim past, came before us, and I understood how I had heard him call out of the great solitude.

DOROTHY EYRE.

CANADA AND CANADIAN POLICY

A NATION AND A NAVY . * * * BY AUGUSTUS BRIDLE

PART II.

THE election of 1911 was fought mainly on the basis of reciprocity. Already, however, one Naval Bill had passed Parliament. The Laurier navy of three cruisers bought from Great Britain was inaugurated as "a sop to the jingoes"—so said Conservatives. It was intended as a nucleus. It is a nucleus still. The idea was clear enough—a Canadian navy manned and maintained, if not built, by Canadians. It was the intention to extend the idea into an ultimate Canadian navy—built by Canadians.

But reciprocity loomed up and shouldered the Canadian navy aside. The Conservative party flung itself strongly against reciprocity. The alarm of possible annexation to the United States was raised, and it was very effective. The Nationalist party threw in its lot with the Conservatives to defeat, not so much reciprocity as the Canadian navy. There began to be a stampede. The Empire was in some danger. The old flag must be maintained and very much waved. It was the return of the Conservative party to its old love—the Old Flag.

And the old flag won, even without counting the Nationalists and their balance of power. Canada turned down reciprocity on a basis of sentiment, without much regard to the mere matter of trade. Whether wisely or not is for those to determine who understand how far the United States, under the present Democratic Government, is beginning to throw down walls which the United States itself built up.

Meanwhile the Conservative party, opposed more in 1911 to a Canadian navy than it had been in 1909, carried out its promise of 1911 to confer with the Admiralty. The Hon. Mr. Borden and three of his Ministers last June went to England to find out from Mr. Churchill and his colleagues what the Canadian Government might do to begin repaying Great Britain for the safety accorded Canadian trade by the Imperial Navy.

They came back armed with a memorandum. That memorandum was kept carefully in camera until the assembling of Parliament in November. Parliament was some weeks old before Mr. Borden chose to divulge what the memorandum was, and to base upon it his Government's draft of the Naval Bill, involving a cash contribution of 35,000,000 dollars to the Admiralty for the purchase of suitable vessels, to be built, manned, and maintained by Great Britain. The memorandum and the Government draft of the Naval Bill both predicated an "emergency."

In the debate on the memorandum Sir Wilfrid Laurier enunciated the view of his party—that there was and is no emergency calling for a cash contribution to the British Navy. It was argued by the Premier and Mr. Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, both of whom in 1909 had not been opposed to some form of Canadian navy, that the Admiralty had defined an emergency; or was it more succinctly a need? For a long while in the earlier stages of the Bill the discussion centred about the "emergency." Much national wit was expended by the Liberals to show that an "emergency" which could be relieved by the construction of three "Dreadnoughts" within a period of years, was a new sort of emergency indeed.

The Premier was pressed to declare whether or not this was one or merely the first of regular and permanent contributions to the Imperial navy. He chose to stand by the express wording of the Bill. The Opposition hinted at "Taxation without Representation." An Imperial Council was foreshadowed by some. Others reverted to the "Boston Tea Party." Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in a burst of characteristic and adroit eloquence, declared that if England could be shown to be in danger from two or more of the great Powers, he and his followers would vote as much as four times $35,000,000 to aid in the defence of the Empire. Hence, Liberals are not anti-Imperialists.

Premier Borden made it clear that he and his Ministers agreed with the Admiralty that "Dreadnoughts" could not be conveniently built in Canada, but that certain subsidiary and auxiliary craft might be. Hence, Conservatives are not anti-Autonomists.

On February 28th the Bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole. After discussion on the cost of certain types of vessels, Clause 1 was voted, and the House adjourned, pending information promised by the Government as to cost. March 3rd the House again went into Committee, and the cost-discussion was resumed. Three hours later Hon. Robert Rogers, Minister of Public Works, raised the objection that the discussion was out of order. The Opposition asked for an adjournment—it was then 2 a.m. This was refused unless Clause 2 should be passed.

And for weeks thereafter, mainly day and night without ceasing, in relays skilfully organised by the Opposition from the rank and file, Clause 2 was discussed. The Government members kept silence. They alleged obstruction; Opposition members were endeavouring to talk out the Bill.

The longer they talked, the more disorganised Parliament became; and the more sharply and vividly the real issue between the parties began to emerge. March 10th the Premier threw a "bombshell," based upon cabled advice from Mr. Churchill, that Canada could not construct war vessels of the type demanded by the Admiralty. From this bombshell the Opposition devised a whole fusillade of bombs, saddling upon the Admiralty the accusation of Canadian incompetency. Parliament began to revert to the old taunt of "Colonialism" and "Downing Street." Much Liberal indignation. Much reassertion by the Conservatives that close attachment to Great Britain carried no allegation of incompetency.

Closure was threatened. But there was in the Parliament of Canada no Closure Bill. The threat of closure still further consolidated the Liberals. They denounced it as tyranny, and the whole attempt of the Conservatives to force the Bill through the House by means of a majority, and without a real mandate from the people, as the work of an oligarchy opposed to the interests of true autonomy.

And so the matter grew. History, not content with repeating itself in party politics, invented new differences of opinions and new arguments over the Empire. And the Naval Bill of 1912 will go down into Canadian history as the most remarkable contribution to the definition of Canada's status within the Empire ever made since the day of Confederation.

RICHARD WAGNER

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN

It is a hundred years this week since the greatest master of music-drama was born. Richard Wagner is a name now as familiar as that of Beethoven or Mozart, and to some of far more importance. The whirligig of Time brings strange revenges! At this centenary period nothing can well be more curious, or indeed more instructive, than to compare Wagner's position to-day with that to which the vast majority of his contemporaries assigned him. Fifty or sixty years ago he was regarded generally as a musical madman, a mountebank, a crazy iconoclast who had arisen to throw all established art forms and traditions to the winds, to trample under his feet the classical masters of the art.

Caricaturists joined with critics in deriding him and all his works; and, indeed, if Wagner could have been killed by ridicule, his centenary would have been passed by the musical world unheeded. Wagner himself, it has been said, must have been irresistible for the caricaturist. The long head, the prominent nose, the aggressive chin, the odd head-gear, the extravagant trappings of silk and satin, would be enough to make the most difficult caricaturist happy.

Of course, the caricaturists took their cue from the critics, from the musical amateurs, and even from Wagner's brother composers. The views of the latter were well represented by Rossini, who had been tempted to go and hear "Tannhäuser," though he never went to the Opera. "It is too elaborate to be judged after a single hearing," he said; "but so far as I am concerned, I shall not give it a second." Later, when "Lohengrin" appeared, Rossini was found holding the score upside down, trying it that way, he explained, because he could make nothing of it the usual way!

The subject of "Tannhäuser" was found "distressing and harassing"; the music formless and devoid of melody. Prosper Mérimée, the author of "Carmen," did not hesitate to say that he could compose something as good after hearing his cat walk over the piano keyboard. "Lohengrin" was declared to be "the apogee of hideousness; a distracting and altogether distressing noise; a mere blaring of brass." John Hullah called it "an opera without music." To Gustav Engel it seemed like "blubbling baby talk." When Wagner first sought to place "Tristan," it was everywhere declined as "impossible." When it was produced in London, one surprised critic expressed his wonder that the physical resources of the artistes endured the strain. Even as late as 1871, when this splendid work was staged at Mannheim, several citizens of good standing declined to sit at Wagner's table at the banquet which followed; they did not wish to be viewed as belonging to the stricter communion. Tolstoy condemned "The Ring" as bad art, and Max Nordau found it (and Wagner generally) "a bleating echo from the far-away past." Nordau even went so far as to say that the Wagner cult was a symptom of the disordered nerves of France and Germany after the war of 1870!

There is no denying that Wagner the man, as distinct from Wagner the composer, was neither a very estimable nor a very lovable personality. His relations with women were not beyond reproach.

Three women entered largely into and influenced his life: Minna Planer, his first wife; Mathilde Wesendonck, the wife of a friend; and Cosima Liszt, Wagner's second wife. The relations between him and his first wife were quite commonplace, and not at all in the nature of a "problem." He was a complete Bohemian; she as complete a Philistine.

Wagner disgusted even his admirers by his borrowings. "Money-making," he said once, "is not my business in the world, but creating, and to enable me to do that undisturbed, the world would really have to care." In plain terms, the world ought to provide him with a handsome subsidy!

There is something rather ignoble in the bare idea; it becomes still more ignoble when considered in the light of Wagner's personal luxuries. He liked domestic comforts, had an artist's fondness for rich colours, harmonious decoration, out-of-the-way furniture, well-bound books and music. He must have rich garments, especially for indoor wear. He always wore silk next his skin, and he paid the most absurd prices to a Viennese dressmaker for dressing-gowns from his own elaborate designs. Even when relentlessly pursued by his creditors he lived as expensively as ever.

The curiously interesting point is that Wagner held all this luxury to be a necessity to him. He knew that his habits were expensive, and he knew also that the world would, to say the least, be unsympathetic in the matter. Hence, in a letter of 1854 to Liszt, he wrote: "How can I expect a Philistine to comprehend the transcendent part of my nature, which in the conditions of my life impelled me to satisfy an immense inner desire by such external means as must to him appear dangerous and certainly unsympathetic? No one knows the needs of people like us." In another letter he says he cannot sleep on straw and drink bad whisky. "I must be coaxed in one way or another if my mind is to accomplish the terribly difficult task of creating a non-existent world."

There is much more of this sort of thing in his correspondence, and it will hardly be denied that there is an unmanly weakness about it. Bach had difficulty in making ends meet, but he bore it uncomplainingly. Mozart was so poor that he had to be buried in a pauper's grave. Yet we have "Don Giovanni" and "Figaro." Schubert, who said pathetically that his music was the product of his genius and his misery, was always in financial straits. Beethoven, too, was perpetually beset by "the eternal pence problem." Chopin deplored that he had to play in public for money. Brahms did not consider it a useless discipline that he had once to accompany the singers at a café chantant and play dance music.

There is always this to be said for Wagner, that in his borrowings and his costly personal indulgences he had not so much his own personal ends in view as the "cause" of music-drama with which he had identified himself. From his belief in this cause he never wavered. He looked on his music as part of the world itself, as something outside its creator. This was never more evident than his refusal to transfer the projected festivals at Beyreuth to Berlin, when Beyreuth was likely to fail him for want of funds. At Berlin the undertaking had been guaranteed, and Wagner himself would have been a considerable financial gainer. But he wanted to address the whole of the German public and not a section of it in a large city, and he stuck to Beyreuth as a neutral centre for the whole of Germany. He may have been wrong, but one cannot but respect him for his whole-hearted devotion to his own "cause," and that devotion may be accepted as in itself the keynote of actions which would otherwise be inexcusable and charged with a lack of self-respect.

THE CHURCH UNION QUESTION IN SCOTLAND

By HECTOR MACPHERSON

IN one of his facetious moods, Matthew Arnold remarked that "Presbyterianism is born to separation as the sparks fly upwards." The history of Presbyterianism in the eighteenth century certainly gives point to the remark of Arnold. Thus we find a stern Cameronian leaving his protest against "all sectarian errors, heresies, and blasphemies, particularly against Arianism, Erastianism, Socinianism, Quakerism, Deism, Bourignism, Familism, Scepticism, Arminianism, Lutheranism, Brownism, Baxterism, Anabaptism, Millenniumism, Pelagianism, Campbellianism, and Independency." In the "Heart of Midlothian," Scott makes David Deans declare his independence of all sects. "I will," says David, "be led by the nose by none. I have my name as a Christian from no vessel of clay." In Scotland, ecclesiastical controversies die hard, and for many years the national Church founded at the Reformation was split into fragments. By-and-by tendencies toward union began to manifest themselves. The two main bodies, which had separated from the Establishment on the question of patronage, united. The union of the Frees and U.P.'s further testified to the desire for unity. It should be remarked that the tendency towards union received a check from the Disruption. Here, too, as in the case of the earlier secessions, the cause of separation was not, as Arnold imagined, a love of contention and hair-splitting, but patronage, which, as Macaulay has remarked, was the real cause of our ecclesiastical separations. With the abolition of patronage it was expected that the breach caused in the Auld Kirk would be healed, but old controversies rankle long, and even yet some of the bitterness of the Disruption time remains to keep good men from ecclesiastically seeing eye to eye. For years there has existed in both Churches, the Auld Kirk and the Disruption Church, a desire for reunion, a desire which has been strengthened by the famous "Wee Free" case.

Once again the question of union occupies the foremost place in the minds of Scottish ecclesiastics. The fact that a new generation has grown up comparatively free of the bitter feelings of the past gives to the negotiations of the present a hopeful touch. Still obstacles remain. In both Churches are extremists, whose minds are anchored in the past. In the Auld Kirk are those who still hold fast by what is called the Disestablishment principle, and in the United Free Church those who refuse to surrender the Voluntary principle. At the time of the House of Lords' decision, I unearthed the famous deliverance of Professor Flint, that Establishment is not a principle but an expedient, and since then the deliverance has played a conspicuous part in the controversy. The truth is, the principle upon which the Church of Scotland rests is not Establishment but National Recognition of Religion on the lines of Spiritual Independence. The Parliament of 1567 established the Kirk, but that Act did not make the Kirk subordinate to the State. National religion existed from 1560, and found expression in the various General Assemblies before it was established. The verdict of history is that at the Reformation the Church rested upon the principle of National religion, and its Spiritual Independence was recognised, not created, by the State.

Those, therefore, in the Auld Kirk who cling to Establishment as a matter of principle find no countenance for their views in the ecclesiastical history of Scotland. A similar remark applies to those who, on the basis of what they call the Voluntary principle, make Disestablishment an essential condition of union. The curious thing is that the founders of the Secession and the Disruption Churches were not opposed to Establishment. Erskine and Chalmers, in regard to the wisdom and necessity of religious establishments, were of the same mind; both left the Church of their fathers, not because it was established, but because the State had encroached upon the spiritual functions of the Church. But for the breach of the Act of Union in the time of Queen Anne, when patronage was passed, there would have been no Secession and no Disruption. Despairing of the abolition of patronage, and breathing more freely in a Church unconnected with the State, United Presbyterians and a section of the Disruption Church reached the view that not only was the State connection injurious to religion, but was essentially wrong. Note the difference between the views of Erskine and Chalmers and their followers. Whereas the early Secession and Disruption leaders only wanted the purification of the Establishment, their latter-day followers demand its abolition. It is not too much to say that had patronage been abolished, or had never been imposed, there would have been no Secession and no Disruption.

In resisting the Erastianism of the Establishment in the old days, the followers of the Erskines did noble work. The cause of freedom, political as well as ecclesiastical, owes much to the United Presbyterians, with their democratic ideals. The Voluntary controversy was aided by the phase of Liberalism, which dominated the public mind in the early nineteenth century. As I have said elsewhere, "It is easy to trace causes which led to agitation against Establishment principles as such. As a reaction against State despotism in the secular sphere, there grew up a system of political philosophy whose fundamental principle was the reduction of State control to a minimum. Beyond securing for the individual protection and freedom to work out his own salvation, the State had no further function. Consequently, it was entirely wrong for the State in any way to support religion, which, as being a matter for the individual, should be left in the sphere of conscience. Accept this philosophy of the State, and the logical outcome is the Disestablishment movement, which naturally became a prominent plank in the Liberal programme."

The proposals of the Established Church Committee go far to remove the taint of Erastianism. Freed from State control, the United Church will be enabled to devote its undivided energies to the grave problems which confront Scotland. Theoretically, large numbers of people favour the Republican form of Government, but they support the Monarchical form, despite its irrational hereditary basis, because it works well. They have no intention of reviving the old Republican agitation. They have no desire, like Charles Lamb's Chinaman, to burn down their house in order to roast their pig. After all, sentiment counts for much in national affairs, and, apart from that, when it is considered that union between the Churches on a basis free from State control would stop the dissipation of religious energy at present caused by our divisions, no patriotic Scot should be found opposing the movement. The old cry of Erastianism has lost its vitality. The danger of the Church is not Erastianism, but Agnosticism. In face of the new enemy, Presbyterians, clerical and lay, would do well to cease their ecclesiastical hair-splitting, and march shoulder to shoulder against the common foe.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

“THE IMITATION OF CHRIST” * * BY MONSIGNOR R. H. BENSON

I.

AFTER the Psalms of David, there is probably no book in the whole range of devotional literature which is so widely known, so universally used by persons of the most completely divergent theological views, and so tenderly loved, as Thomas à Kempis's "Imitatio Christi." The causes of this extraordinary popularity are several. First, it is not controversial. It is, of course, wholly and convincingly Catholic; it was written at a time when practically no form of Christianity other than Catholicism was known in Europe; the Catholic creed and Catholic devotion are taken for granted. One complete section of the book—often omitted, however, in Protestant adaptations—treats of the Holy Eucharist and the doctrines of Sacrifice and Sacrament both learnedly and devoutly; yet the author does not argue greatly concerning these things, still less does he controvert views opposed to those which he himself held. There is, therefore, throughout the book an atmosphere of complete rest and serenity. Secondly, the book treats of the spiritual life in its deepest, and therefore its simplest, realm. Christianity, it has been said, is Christ. It is not, that is to say, primarily a code of laws or observances, though laws and observances are necessary for its setting forth; it is not, fundamentally, a series of dogmas, though dogmas are necessary for the scientific statement of the truths which it, or any religion, contains; it is not essentially a series of devotional acts, though devotional acts are necessary for the expression and continuance of the spirit which underlies them. But Christianity is the Person of Christ, from whom Christian laws take their rise, of whom dogma speaks, and to whom devotion is directed. It is, then, directly to the Person of Christ that Thomas à Kempis leads his readers, setting that Divine Figure before them, certainly as their Saviour and their God, yet supremely as their Model. He is presented there, under the guise of His humanity, as the Perfect Man, by the imitation of whom can, alone, be found that peace which He promises; as the Master who Himself trod the road along which His disciples must follow; as the Teacher of the soul who, in dialogue after dialogue, describes how obstacles must be overcome, how graces must be used, how the experiences of life must be met—how, in short, those supreme relations towards God and man, of which both the law and the Gospel speak, must be transformed by religion after Christ's own pattern and precepts.

II.

The book is sometimes described as a masterpiece of mysticism. This is perfectly true if the word is used in its simplest sense. It scarcely resembles at all the mystical writings of such persons as St. John of the Cross, or St. Teresa; these treat of a way of initiation—of modes of purgation, illumination, and union—founded indeed upon an imitation of Christ, and intended to lead to the same end as that to which Thomas à Kempis aspires, yet ranged under completely different modes and images, and discussing en route a number of considerations—experiences, phenomena, introspections, and spiritual conditions—to which our author seldom, if ever, even refers. Such writers as these Spanish mystics present the spiritual life—the one under a parable of a rugged mountain that must be ascended, set about by precipices, battered by winds, engulfed in darkness, night upon night, with scarcely a glimmer between; the other, as an interior fortress, intricately built and fenced, inhabited by distractions, yet ruled by the Sovereign Lord who awaits the coming of His bride in the chamber He has set aside for Him and her. Such writers as these analyse the inner life of a Christian with marvellous insight and knowledge, yet by the very wealth and variety of their intuitions and illuminations terrify sometimes those simple souls who desire what they, too, desired so fervently. But Thomas à Kempis leads such souls as these rather to a little walled garden in the sunlight—such a garden as even the poorest may possess if he has but the will for it; and there brings the timid, loving soul to the feet of a Brother who is yet a Master, of a Master who yet is God. Certainly he, too, leads the soul to the highest from the lowest; there is not a step on the Way of Sorrows—the Royal Road of the Cross as he names it—which he would have us miss or avoid; there is not the smallest and most minute act of kindness to a neighbour, of mortification towards self, or of love towards God, that has not its lesson in his teaching; yet he deals with souls, not as a guide brings the traveller over the hills of death and storm, or as another may conduct a visitor through halls where the men-at-arms brawl and the dogs bay up to the bride-chamber in the heart of the castle, but rather as a mother, infinitely tender, yet no less resolute, disciplines her children, even while she smiles at them, over their lessons on a summer's day. He presents the soul to Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ to the soul; and there the two speak together. The Divine Figure is infinitely pathetic, yet almost intolerably strong; the soul is infinitely desirous—(of desiring, if of nothing else)—yet knows herself unbearably weak. He bears upon Himself the marks of His Passion beneath the brightness of His glory; she bears beneath the rags of her unrighteousness and the scars of her sinning the lineaments of a saint in making. Here, then, the two speak together: He urges her to the highest, and shows how this may be attained only by submitting to the lowest; He does not spare her when she needs rebuke, yet never forgets to give her courage even in the midst of pain; and she, acknowledging her unworthiness, not only of glory, but even grace, grasps by the very knowledge of her weakness and the remembrance of her falls that grace which alone can lead to glory.

III.

A third reason for the popularity of the book, amongst even those who do not accept Catholic authority, may be found in its relation to the Bible. Its direct and explicit quotations from that source are comparatively few, yet, in itself, it may be described as being a strong solution of Scripture. It resembles in this respect a mediæval church, which, although it has few actual texts carved or painted upon the walls, yet in wall and window, in carving and fresco and glass, presents, under another form, the essence of the story of God's dealings with men, crowned and consummated in the great Rood above the doors that lead to the high altar. In the case of the "Imitation" it is the mystical, ascetic, and ethical teaching of the Scriptures that is so presented: Upon one page it would seem as if Solomon were once more uttering proverbs; upon another as if David were singing to his harp; from another the Shepherd of Galilee Himself seems to be reiterating, through the delicate deliberation of the author's style, the deep principles of the Beatitudes, the poignant warnings to those who rejected or misinterpreted Him, and the sublime and moving discourses of the Upper Chamber. Yet above all towers the Figure of the Crucified, drawing all to Himself, uniting into a common system of devotion and spiritual wisdom the utterance of prophet and king and seer and saint, by placing in their centre the keystone of His Cross. That Cross has budded and blossomed indeed into beauty; its arms and head break out into gilding and flowers and angels' heads; yet in its midst, as in the record of Scripture itself, hangs the grim and blood-stained Victim of Calvary.

IV.

Lastly, the book bases its universal appeal upon the extraordinary knowledge which its author shows, not merely of those outward aspects of human nature that are within the reach of the most boisterous of optimists or the most superficial of cynics, but of that inner reality of it—that strange cauldron of motive and negligence, of self-seeking and altruism, of generosity and prudence—in short, of self as contemplated by self, the moment of whose first discovery is the supreme crisis of conscious life. In this book, then, the mind that has passed inwards for the first time, and found itself in a realm where all is strange and bewildering, where at one instant self-sacrifice seems the dominant motive, and, at the next, self-assertion; when the soul, tormented by impulses which she cannot explain, now raised to an ecstasy of self-abnegation, now rolling herself in the gutter, believes herself alone in her experience, wonders afresh at God and man, and, most of all, at herself—in this book she finds a record of all that she has gone through, a prediction of her future, which little by little she verifies, and a promise of a Secret which, if she will but faithfully adhere to it, shall bring her safe out of all her trouble.

V.

It is the extraordinary human knowledge of the book—no less than its divine wisdom—that is the key to its success, and, above all, of its power of reassurance. As when a sick man visiting a doctor, and learning from him, after five minutes' conversation, that his sensations, after all, are not unique; that he is suffering from a perfectly familiar illness, that his symptoms are thus and thus . . . finds, in the very recounting to him by his physician of all his trouble, an amazing strength and encouragement; so, too, when a soul, first conscious of ill-health and egotism, first aware, in fact, of itself through unfamiliar discomfort, turns to the "Imitatio Christi," she finds, in the minuteness with which her own state is described, in the steady and accurate probing to which she is subjected, and the instant response of every nerve, as, one by one, each is touched by a skilled finger, a confidence, and, indeed, an alleviation, she could never have won from a merely unintelligible course of diet or medicine dictated for her obedience.

VI.

The book, therefore, will remain always as a monument of spiritual teaching, for it is not with phases or movements or fashions that it deals, but with the immutable laws of interior humanity. Even if Christianity itself were but a phase, even if Theism were no more than a movement, and immortality but a pleasant dream; even so, since, at its deepest, the soul is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," the "Imitation" could never wholly die, since it displays the constitution of that soul with an accuracy that can never be surpassed. And, from this very accuracy in undeniable facts, it supplies a kind of strong, if slender, apologetic for Christianity, a probability for its truth in matters that are for some minds doubtful, if not unknown. For it is hard to think that a man so clear-sighted as was its author in the verifiable realms of psychology and humanity, so unerring in his knowledge of human frailty and human aspiration, could, after all, be utterly deceived in the remedies he proposes for the one, and the rewards he promises to the other.

VII.

Of the author himself comparatively little is known, beyond the unsurpassable revelation he has made of his own soul. He was a priest and a Religious, at first one of the "Brothers of the Common Life"; his parents lived at Kempen (whence he took his name), near Cologne; later he joined the order of "Canons Regular" at Mount Saint Agnes, near Zwolle, and ultimately was elected prior. He "finished" this book of his in the year 1441 A.D.; but fragments of it are extant nearly twenty years earlier. Other works have also been attributed to his pen, and, especially, a certain series of meditations on the Life of Christ as recorded in the Gospels; but for his authorship of these the evidence is neither so strong, nor so ancient, nor so widespread as is that on which it is believed that he wrote the "Imitation." Translations of his book were freely and rapidly made from the Latin in which it was written into various European tongues.

It is remarkable how entirely absent from this book are all hints of the stirring events in the world at the period in which it was composed. It has all the peace of the cloister, and the serenity of a soul that loves the cloistered life, and makes no account of the superficial world of external event. Yet it is none the less profound—in fact, it is all the more profound for that very reason, since the man who wrote it knew well that it is in the world of spirit that real history is made, that here alone are the conflicts that count, that here alone irremediable disaster and inalienable victory are reached, since the Kingdom of God is within us, and "cometh not with observation."

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

IT is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

- | | |
|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Composer. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace,

Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

A REPUBLIC OF BOOKS . . . BY ERNEST RHYS

I.

THE average man, the man who does not read anything but newspapers, thinks of books as the sealed packets of an exotic intelligence, which it will not do him much good to open. He knows nothing of the fine salt-reek in the pages of Hakluyt or the heartening strain of the ballad-book:—

"It fell about the Lammas-tide,
When the moor-men win their hay." . . .

But by this neglect he leaves unused his sixth sense that quickens all the others, that can add rooms to his house and a region to his brain. If over-night he has been in Nantucket with the American Farmer, De Crèvecoeur, or walking the Edinburgh Canongate with Sir Walter Scott, he has a fresh vista to his street when he turns out in the morning; and at its end rises the new Pantheon.

II.

In this faith, six or seven years ago we set out to build a city of the New Republic—a Library-in-Being that should have faith in the power of the Book, and keep in view the play of literature upon life. It did not much signify where we began, so long as we took for the beginning a handful of old authors who had stood the racket of time and the changes of fashion, for, once they had been fixed upon, their elective affinities would do the rest. We pitched, as it happened, first on Boswell, since his Doctor Johnson is not only a man, but a whole region of human nature, with London and Fleet Street for a background, and his great biography for a sign. A better inductor to the commonwealth could hardly be desired. He starts up in the book, more alive than most of us who think we live, as on one Monday morning—to be exact, October 4th, 1779—the Doctor was not yet out of bed, but "he sent for me to his bedside," says Boswell; and seemed "as pleased as if he had been in the gaiety of youth, and called out briskly, 'Frank, go and get coffee, and let us breakfast in splendour!'" A few days later and a little discussion of the Art of Coaxing a Fire leads to a bit of folk-lore, and then brings Johnson to the word, "Be as wise as you can." This is from the life, and human nature is re-kindled in the page. Another page, and Dr. Johnson recommends to Boswell a Greek Lexicon, a Translation of the first book of the Iliad, and Hesiod. In fact, while he was a great viveur, a man who lived for life, and never bookish in the dull way, he loved a cordial writer, said "the chief glory of every people arises from its authors," and waxed eloquent over the life and death of words, "some budding, some falling away."

We did not wish to construct, however, a Dr. Johnson Academy of Letters, nor a Boswell group in the Senate. Our librarians intrigues were politic, but not scientific, and we tried to keep in mind the sort of young man who, in a confidential letter, wrote to say that "his speciality was the universe." So we went on boldly, knitting up antiquity with new time, and adding Athens to London, and Emerson to Lord Verulam, and in our second relay contrived even to make near neighbours of Plato's "Republic" and that most engaging book of wit and wisdom, "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

III.

From the last we took a parable—that of the transcendent desire in men for more than meat or drink. There are books that create this craving; and if biography is good for this, so is fiction. A good novel is an admirable provoker—familiar history itself, it leads to history. We soon had Balzac on the string, opening the great human comedy as he conceived it with his Peau de Chagrin, which is the fable of Everyman's strife with death and time; just as Everyman looks for his own plight of memory and age in Rip Van Winkle or in Colonel Newcome. Balzac holds a master-key to the treasury of the republic. What did he say in the confession of faith that opens his encyclopædia of human nature? "I attach to common, everyday facts and acts of mere individual lives, and to their causes and principles, the importance which historians have hitherto ascribed to the events of public national life." He expanded this idea in constructing his history. He wished, in fact, to construct a republic all of his own making. "My work," said he, proudly, "has its geography, as it has its genealogy and its families, its places and things—its heraldry, its nobles and commoners, workmen and peasants, senators and dandies; its army, too—in short, a whole world of its own."

What Balzac tried to do in his single discharge, it ought to be possible to carry out in the wider circles of human interest. So we felt and believed. Pepys's Diary sits in a circle: you do not get far in its pages without being infected by the gossip curiosity. What of the plays he went to?—"Bartholomew's Fair," by Ben Jonson, which he saw more than once; or Beaumont and Fletcher's "Philaster," or Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night."

IV.

Pepys, though living under Charles II., and aware of Nell Gwynn, did very well as a citizen of the literary commonwealth; and it was easy, when the London theatres were in demand, to move from English to Greek drama. Æschylus and Sophocles soon followed, and we found it illuminating to put Ibsen by Euripides. We would have followed Aristophanes with George Bernard Shaw, and Shaw with Synge, but for absurd restrictions of copyright, which are in the present sense feudal, and against which the republican spirit in books mutinies. But we were able to map out other townlots with some completeness. We could have Grote's "Greece," and Finlay's, to eke out our spiritual Athens. We could build around Gibbon's "Rome" with Sismondi's "Italian Republics," and Macchiavelli could have his supplement, and his counterblast, in Mazzini. As the State developed, it became clear that the value of the structural idea on which it was ultimately to rest had not been exaggerated. Our silent republicans had a colony in every quarter of the world, and seemed of themselves to make their own groups and installations, as if to reaffirm Emerson's theory of a new dynamic quality of mind that travelled by day and night, moving in concentric circles. By their law of interfusion, the spirit in great authors found out the congenial spirit in their readers, and the acquisition of truth and reality in any quarter was "so much good to the commonwealth of souls."

V.

Take, for instance, the province of Philosophy—the one portion of the commonalty, which the average man is likely to neglect, who finds something alarming in the idea of Plato, and something disturbing in the mere notion of a book by René Descartes. Yet who that picks up an account of the life Descartes spent as a soldier in the Low Countries—camp life with a mixture of fighting and high thinking, with a discussion perhaps on military strategies and mathematics, leading on to a question of astronomy and the structure of the stars, and the divine proportions of the human body—but, if he have any zest, will be bound to explore the Meditations and the Discourse on Method for himself?

In 1619 their author joined the army of Maximilian on the Danube, and there, as he tells us, he passed the greatest day of his life, "being full of enthusiasm, and having discovered the basis of true science." That is a personal revelation to draw the spirit of a Descartes close to those other free spirits, books and men, on whose effect the fortune of the literary state, invisible and spiritual, rests. From Descartes it is an inevitable step that takes one to a volume of Spinoza, or to a Bishop Berkeley who saw the external world as dependent for its very existence upon the ideal. To compare Berkeley's "New Theory of Vision" with the pages in which René Descartes discussed the ideas of corporeal and incorporeal substance and the ideas of place and space is to arrive at a new sensation of the world by which man is environed and the modes by which he is conditioned. There, indeed, is a road well worth the taking; and the map of the country, when you scan it, is simple, with divisions plain to be seen. To go to Rome in Shakespeare's play, or to Paris in "César Biotteau," to take up the Little Flowers of St. Francis, or the Speeches of Abraham Lincoln, was clue enough to its lines—quite sufficient, we believed, to bring any man and every man within the sphere of influence. Once within that gate, he was lost, and saved: the silent republicans had him at their mercy. He must submit to their law, and become wise as Plato, multiple as Shakespeare in spite of himself.

THE RECALL

By MARY BRADFORD WHITING

HIS life had been spent in India—his working life, that is to say. As a subaltern of eighteen he had said good-bye to home and friends, and set sail for the mysterious, exotic land which had summoned so many of his race to her service. A hard life, but a successful one as such lives go. Lean and sinewy in build, with generations of plain living and high thinking in his blood, he had worked unceasingly, winning honour if not honours, and possessing in full measure the answer of a good conscience if he had but little material treasure.

No hated Sahib, this, but a leader loved and feared by his men; and thus it came to pass that when his time for retirement came, a neighbouring Rajah, eager for the prestige of his troops, offered him a small fortune if he would undertake their training. But all through those long years of blighting sun and dust-laden wind, the steely-eyed, unemotional Scotsman had had his inward gaze fixed upon a vision, and the car of his soul had caught echoes from a far-off land. Never once, in any day of all that span of years, had the vision been dim to him. He had but to shut out the hard, blue sky, the glitter and the dazzle, the gaudy colouring, and the tropical glamour of the scene around him to be back in his Highland home—in the deep glen clothed with woods, where the bracken grew up and up above his head, and wild brown streams raced madly over the stones, and the sweet dim fragrance of moss and fern scented all the air on the wide stretch of moorland, carpeted with heather and thyme, and bounded on the far horizon by a shadowy host of dreaming hills. He had but to deafen himself to the harsh creak of the bullock carts, the fierce screams of the parrots, to the chatter and the cries of the motley crowd around him, to hear the rush of the burn, the sigh of the wind in the pines, the call of the grouse and the swirl of blackcock on the wing.

Wealth on the one hand—wealth and perhaps fame; and on the other, a vision and an echo. How could he hesitate? Man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth, nor does any man subsist on bread alone. Another must train the troops, another reap the rich reward. His term of service was ended. He had the right to do as he willed with the remnant of his life, and where his heart was there should his body be also. The bugle from his Highland hills sounded the recall, and, turning his back on the tempting offers made to him, he obeyed its bidding as gladly as though it summoned him to a lovers' tryst.

And what when he returned? Old friends were gone, parents lay sleeping in their graves, the family home had passed into alien hands, the hoot of the motor was heard far up the dim recesses of the glen, and wealthy strangers shot over the moors that his ancestors had owned for centuries. Yet never once did he regret his choice—never once through the short tale of years that remained to him! His whole being was filled with a peace too deep for words. He was part of the soil that he trod. The air and the dew, the charging squadrons of the storm, the low-lying mists, the clear saffron of the dawn, the far-flung splendours of the sunset—all these were woven into his life as they had been woven into the lives of his forefathers. The memory of the East, its glories and its terrors, its pleasures and its pains, had dropped from his mind like a troubled dream. He was made one with his surroundings, and not even Death had the power to wrest him apart from them.

In the burial-ground of his race he lies—deep in the woods where rabbits scuttle through the rustling bracken, where the perching feet of birds rest upon the graves of the sleepers. Stone after stone bears the record of that honoured race: Donald—Malcolm—Fergus—Nigel. All these and many another went out to toil and fight, to serve their country in lands beyond the seas, to uphold the British Raj, to keep the flag flying at lonely posts of Empire. And all these, too, and many another, heard in those distant lands the recall sounded from their Highland hills, and, as children come home at eventide, they came back across the world that they might sleep their last sleep in the arms of their Motherland.

LITERARY COMPETITION

The Editor of EVERYMAN offers a prize of Two Guineas for the Best Essay on "The Working of the Medical Insurance Act: Criticisms and Suggestions," the essay not to exceed 1,800 words. All entries for this competition should be addressed to the

COMPETITION EDITOR,

21, Royal Terrace,

Edinburgh,

and must reach him not later than June 1st. It is recommended that the essays be typewritten.

THE HEALTH WIZARD OF ST. JAMES' STREET

WHY PEOPLE TRAVEL FROM THE ENDS OF THE EARTH TO BE CURED OF THEIR COMPLAINTS BY A REMARKABLE LAYMAN

A CRITICAL EXPLANATION BY DR. ROBERTSON WALLACE, M.B., C.M.,

Author of "The Constitution of Man."

Is it not wonderful that the most consulted and successful health adviser upon all manner of complaints is not a doctor?

There is no use denying the fact that here in London, in the midst of the world's most famous specialists and consultants, there resides a man whose practice extends far beyond that of the most successful medical specialists.

To this health genius—for the results he obtains warrant the title—come seekers after health from India, from Africa, from the United States, from far Australia, just as from Manchester, Brighton, Hampstead, Ealing, or Grosvenor Square. He teaches them the way to cast off the shackles of the long-suffered Dyspepsia, Insomnia, Neurasthenia, Obesity, or to eradicate the results of Malaria or "Indian Liver" contracted by residence in tropical parts, or to overcome whatever the particular weakness may be, in such a manner as is at one and the same time the wonder, the envy, and the admiration of the orthodox medical man.

And yet his method does not encroach upon the field of the doctor, for not a bottle of medicine—not a pillule—does he prescribe; in fact, medical men consult him themselves and send patients to him.

5,000 WONDERFUL CURES IN TWELVE MONTHS.

Eugen Sandow is, indeed, a health wizard.

In one short twelve months more than 5,000 ailing people, the majority of whom have proved the despair of some local practitioner, who have perhaps gone the round of the specialists and passed through various treatments more or less elaborate at home or in some expensive foreign spa, here are these cases, the bêtes noires of the profession, cured by Mr. Sandow.

And what lies behind this success? Why is it that the best informed people go to Sandow and are cured?

To my mind there are two reasons for Mr. Sandow's successful cure of the ailing.

To take the first. Mr. Sandow chooses his patients. You may go to him or write to him, but it does not follow he will accept you for treatment. He accepts only those whom he believes his method will radically cure. It may be in the course of a year he is not compelled to reject many, for his successful cures range through the whole gamut of functional derangements, from the dyspeptic to the neurotic. Thus from the very first the patient who is fortunate enough to be accepted by Mr. Sandow starts off on the health road with the immensely valuable impetus of practically knowing his cure will be accomplished.

MAKING THE BODY HEAL ITSELF.

Mr. Sandow, if it may be so described, has rediscovered the keynote of all therapeutics—the art or science of enabling the body to cure itself.

The knowledge of how to direct natural movements to overcome the stagnation that is illness—that is all that lies behind the hugely successful practice Mr. Sandow has built.

Mr. Sandow's great success in overcoming illness and restoring perfect health is at the disposal of all who call upon him at 32, St. James' Street, London, S.W., or who forward the form below.

He discovered that the exercise involved in ordinary games, athletics, and sports, whilst excellent for the robust, is more often than not harmful to the out-of-health man or woman, and of no curative value. At the same time, he made a science of curative exercise specially directed in each case to eradication of the causes of specific troubles.

His treatment is sympathetic, adapted to the special requirements of the individual, ideal for the society or professional man or woman, the busy City man and his wife, or for workers of all classes. So gently and yet so permanently effective is his treatment that one cannot withhold the advice to those disappointed with the efficacy of the medicine bottle or other treatment—"Go to Sandow." It is infinitely wiser than self-drugging.

Whether your trouble is indigestion, constipation, kidney or liver disorder, anæmia, insomnia and bad circulation, lack of tone, rheumatism, sciatica, or gout, Mr. Sandow will consider your case, and, wise man, he will accept you for treatment only if he believes your case will be thoroughly benefited.

Those who live in London or who can spare the time for a journey to town naturally call on Mr. Sandow, and interesting and valuable indeed is a few minutes' face-to-face talk over one's condition with this giant of the healing profession, who seems intuitively to grasp one's trouble and know how to point the way to its cure.

His skilful aid, however, is not debarred those who cannot come to him in person, for they may equally well consult him by means of the post, for he has a characteristically thorough organisation for dealing with the hosts of letters on health troubles that reach him from all parts of the world in such a way that each receives careful personal attention.

Mr. Sandow, despite the numbers who wish to consult him, is not an inaccessible specialist. His Institute and his consulting rooms at 32, St. James' Street, London, W., are open at all times for those who wish for health, and, what is more, he makes no charge whatsoever for a first consultation and advice.

There is a series of books which, I understand, he is willing to forward to all who apply for them. Here is a list of these valuable and interesting books:

- "Indigestion."
- "Constipation."
- "Liverishness."
- "Nervous Troubles."
- "Sleeplessness."
- "Spinal Curvature."
- "Rheumatism."
- "Gout."
- "Sciatica."
- "Heart Affections."
- "Corpulence."
- "Under-development."
- "Weak Chest and Lungs."
- "Figure Culture."

Simply fill in the form below and enclose 1d. stamp for return postage.

FILL IN AND FORWARD TO EUGEN SANDOW, 32, St. James' Street, London, S.W.

I enclose 1d. stamp for postage.

Please forward me your book upon
(Here fill in nature of complaint.)

Name.....
(State whether Mr., Mrs., Miss, Rev. or title.)

Any further particulars may be given in an accompanying letter.

Address.....

AGE.....

OCCUPATION.....

MY UNCLE SOSTHÈNE BY

GUY DE MAUPASSANT

I.

My uncle Sosthène was a freethinker, such as many are, a freethinker to the point of foolishness. One is often religious in the same way. The sight of a priest threw him into an inconceivable fury; he would show his fist, cry shame on him, and touch iron behind his back, which indicates a belief, the belief in the evil eye. Now, when it concerns irrational beliefs, it is necessary to keep every one, or to have none at all. I, who am also a freethinker, that is to say, a rebel against all the dogmas that have invented the fear of death, am not angry at the temples, be they Catholic, Apostolic, Roman, Protestant, Russian, Greek, Buddhist, Jewish, or Mussulman. And then, too, I have a way of considering and explaining them. A temple is but homage to the unknown. The more the thought is enlarged, the more the unknown diminishes, the more the temples fall to pieces. But instead of putting censers there, I should place telescopes, and microscopes, and electrical appliances. There!

My uncle and I differed on almost every point. He was a patriot, and I am not, because patriotism is but another religion. It is the germ of warfare.

My uncle was a Freemason. As for me, I denounce the Freemasons as more nonsensical than the old saints. That is my opinion, and I maintain it. If we must have a religion, then the old one would be sufficient for me.

Those fools do nothing but imitate the parsons. They have a triangle for a symbol instead of a cross. They have churches that they call lodges, with a lot of different ceremonies; the Scottish ritual, the French ritual, the Grand-Oriental, a lot of palavers fit to make you split your sides laughing.

Then what is it they wish? To help each other, through tickling the palm of the hand. I do not see harm in it. They have put into practice the Christian injunction: "Help one another." The only difference consists in the tickling. But is it worth while to make such ceremonies, in order to lend a poor devil a hundred sous? The priests, for whom almsgiving and charity are a trade, inscribe at the head of their epistles, three letters: J. M. J. The Freemasons put three at the end of their name. Back to back, comrades.

My uncle answered me: "Honestly, we exalt religion against religion. We make freethought the weapon that will kill clericalism. Freemasonry is the citadel where all the demolishers of the divinities are enrolled."

I replied: "But, my dear uncle" (in my heart I said, "Old fool!"), "that is exactly what I reproach you with. In place of destroying, you organise competition, which but lowers the values, that is all. And, further, if you did not admit any but freethinkers amongst you, I should understand; but you receive everyone. You have the Catholics in a body, even the leaders of the sect. Pius IX. was one of you, before being Pope. If you call a society thus constituted a citadel against clericalism, I find your citadel weak."

Then my uncle, winking his eye, added:

"Our real activity, our most formidable activity, takes place in politics. We undermine the monarchical spirit in a sure and continuous way."

This time I burst out: "Ah! Yes, you are rogues!

If you tell me that Freemasonry is an instrument at elections, I agree with you; that it serves as an implement to secure votes for candidates of all opinions, I should not deny it; that it has no other function than to fool the good people, to form them into regiments, in order to make them go to the ballot-box, as soldiers are sent under fire, I should be of your opinion; that it is useful, even indispensable to all political ambitions, because it changes each of its members into an election agent, I should exclaim: "'Tis as clear as the sun!' But if you pretend to me that it serves to undermine the monarchical spirit, I laugh in your face."

Consider this vast and mysterious democratic association with me for a little, that has had as Grand Master in France, the Prince Napoleon under the Empire; that has for Grand Master in Germany, the Heir Apparent; in Russia, the Czar's brother; in which King Humbert, and the Prince of Wales, and all the crowned heads of the world take part!"

This time my uncle whispered in my ear: "That is true; but all these princes serve our purposes without a doubt."

"But reciprocally, is that not so?"

And I added to myself: "A lot of ninnies!"

II.

But you should have seen my uncle Sosthène give a dinner to a Freemason!

First they met each other, and touched hands, with a mysterious air, quite funny; you could see that they devoted themselves to a series of secret pressures. When I wanted to put my uncle in a rage, I had only to remind him that dogs have also a way, quite Freemasonlike, of recognising each other.

Then my uncle would take his friend into a corner, as if he had some important things to confide in him; then at table, face to face, they had a way of holding themselves, so as to exchange looks, to drink with a glance of the eye, as if to repeat to themselves without ceasing: "We belong to them, eh!"

And to think that there are some millions in the world who amuse themselves with affectations like these! I should rather be a Jesuit yet.

Now there was in our town an old Jesuit, who was my uncle Sosthène's pet aversion. Each time he met him, or, if he only noticed him at a distance, he murmured, "Villain, begone!" Then, taking me by the arm, he would whisper in my ear: "You will see, that scoundrel there will do me an injury some day or other. I feel it."

My uncle spoke truly. And this is how the accident occurred through my fault.

We were nearing Holy Week, when my uncle took a fancy to organise a meat dinner for Good Friday, a regular dinner, with pork sausages and saveloys. I opposed it as much as I could. I said, "I shall eat meat, as I always do on that day, but quite alone, at home. Your celebration is idiotic. Why celebrate? So that you may annoy the people that do not eat meat?"

But my uncle remained firm. He invited three friends to the first restaurant in the town; and, as it was he who paid, I did not refuse to celebrate any longer.

For about four hours we occupied a prominent place in the Café Pénélope, one of the most frequented; and my uncle read out the menu in a loud voice.

We sat down at the table at six o'clock. At ten we were still eating; and we had drunk eighteen bottles of light wine at five, besides four of champagne. Then my uncle proposed what he called the "Archbishop's Round." Six small glasses filled with different liqueurs are placed in a line in front of you; then you must empty them, one after the other, while one of your friends counts up to twenty. It was stupid; but my uncle Sosthène thought that it was "the thing."

At eleven o'clock he was drunk as a lord. He had to be carried off in a cab, and put to bed; and already it could be seen that his celebration was going to turn into a severe attack of indigestion.

III.

As I returned to my lodgings, drunk myself, but with a gay intoxication, a Machiavellian fancy, and one that satisfied all my ideas of scepticism, crossed my mind.

I adjusted my scarf, put on a desperate air, and went and rang like a madman at the old Jesuit's door. He was deaf; he kept me waiting. But as I shook the whole house with my kicks, he at last appeared at his window, in a cotton night-cap, and asked: "What is it that you want?"

I cried: "Quick, quick, my reverend father, open to me; it is a despairing invalid who claims your saintly ministrations!"

The good man put on his trousers at once and came down without his cassock. I told him, in a panting voice, that my uncle, a freethinker, suddenly seized by a terrible indisposition, that seemed to indicate a very grave illness, had been obsessed by a great fear of death, and that he desired to see him, to talk with him, to listen to his counsels, to understand the creeds better, to draw near again to the Church, and, without doubt, to confess himself, then receive the Sacrament, in order to take the dread step, at peace with himself.

And I added, in a critical tone: "He wishes it, anyway. If it does not do him any good, it will certainly not do him any harm."

The old Jesuit, all trembling, bewildered, enraptured, said: "Wait for me a moment, my child, I come." But I continued: "Pardon, my reverend father, but I cannot accompany you; my convictions will not admit it. I even refused to come and seek you; I beg you, therefore, not to admit that you have seen me, but that you were informed of my uncle's illness by a kind of revelation."

The good man agreed to this, and went at a quick pace, to ring at my uncle Sosthène's door. The servant who took care of the invalid soon opened it, and I saw the black cassock disappear into that fortress of freethought.

I hid myself in a neighbouring doorway, in order to await events. Had he been well, my uncle would have knocked the Jesuit on the head, but I knew he was incapable of moving an arm, and, I asked myself with delirious glee, what improbable scene was going to be enacted between those two antagonists? What a contest. What explanations? What astonishment? What confusion? And what would be the end of this extraordinary situation, that the indignation of my uncle would render more tragic still!

I laughed all alone, until I had to hold my sides. I repeated, in a semi-tone, "Ah! a good joke, a good joke!"

It was cold, however, and I could see that the Jesuit was remaining a long time. I said to myself: "They are explaining."

One hour passed, then two, then three. The reverend father did not come out. What had happened to him? Had my uncle died in a fit on seeing him? Or had he really killed the man in the cassock? Or had they actually eaten each other? This last supposition appeared to me the least probable, my uncle seeming to me at present incapable of absorbing even another gramme of food. The day dawned.

Troubled, and not daring to enter in turn, I remembered that one of my friends lived exactly opposite. I went to his house; I told him of the affair, which astonished and made him laugh, and I lay in ambush at his window.

At nine o'clock, he took my place, and I slept a little. At two o'clock I took his place in turn. We were terribly annoyed.

At six o'clock the Jesuit came out with a peaceful and satisfied appearance, and we saw him depart with an easy step.

IV.

Then, timid and ashamed, I rang at my uncle's door. The servant appeared. I dared not question her, but went upstairs, saying nothing.

My uncle Sosthène, pale, wasted, downcast, the eyes dull, the arms inert, lay in bed. A little image of piety was fixed on the curtain with a pin.

The room smelt strongly of indigestion.

I said: "Well, uncle, so you're in bed? That's not at all good?"

He replied, in a dejected voice: "Oh, my dear child, I have been very ill. I have just escaped death."

"How's that, uncle?"

"I do not know; it is indeed astonishing. But, what is more strange, is that the Jesuit father who has just left, you know the brave man that I could not bear very well, he had a revelation of my condition, and he came to find me out."

I was seized by a terrible desire to laugh.

"Ah! really?"

"Yes, he came. He heard a voice that said unto him, to arise and come, because I was about to die. It is a revelation."

I pretended to sneeze, in order not to burst out laughing. I had the inclination to roll on the ground.

But in a moment I replied, in an indignant tone, in spite of some bursts of mirth: "And you received him, uncle, you? A freethinker? A Freemason? You did not throw him out?"

He appeared confused, and stammered: "Just listen, it was so wonderful, so wonderful, so providential! And then he spoke to me of my father. He knew my father formerly."

"Your father, uncle?"

"Yes, it seems he knew my father."

"But that is not a reason for receiving a Jesuit."

"I know that well, but I was ill! And he took care of me with great devotion the whole night. He was perfection. It is he who has saved me. All these people are a little bit of a doctor."

"Ah! He took care of you the whole night. But you told me that he only left here just now."

"Yes, that is true. As he appeared excellent in my estimation, I kept him to lunch. He ate there, near my bed, on a little table, while I took a cup of tea."

"And . . . did he eat meat?"

My uncle made an angry movement, as if I had just committed a dreadful indiscretion; and he added:

"Don't joke, Gaston, there are many pleasantries that are out of place. The man has on this occasion been more devoted to me than any parent; I require that his convictions be respected."

This time I was astounded. I answered, however: "Very well, uncle, and after lunch what did you do?"

Over 2,000 lessons in the
THELWALL Rapid System of SIGHT - READING

have been despatched from
The Pianoforte Sight-Reading School,

157, New Bond Street, London, W., during the present year.

This system enables all pianists to play all their new music at Sight.

The System has received the endorsement of some of the most distinguished musicians of the day.

Mr. LONDON RONALD says:—

"You have my consent to use my name as being one who strongly approves of your system."

Dr. JOHN BORLAND, Musical Director of the Education Department of the L.C.C., says:—

"I am in perfect agreement with practically all your method. You state you believe your method to be an improvement upon the ordinary system of training, but I think this is far too modest."

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE says:—

*"I do not think you require anything after Dr.
Borland's excellent letter."*

One important advantage is that the whole of the tuition can be received in your own home, at times convenient to yourself. Students testify to the value of the system in such terms as these:—

"I am very glad I have taken your course. It has made all the difference to me."

"The lessons have made a tremendous difference in my ability to read at sight."

Send for particulars post free to—

THE PIANOFORTE SIGHT-READING SCHOOL,
157, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

FREE LESSONS IN LATIN, LOGIC, AND ENGLISH

The Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (Camb.) has obtained a world-wide reputation by his "Simplified" system of teaching the supposedly difficult Hebrew language. It has gained the admiration of thousands of students and scholars.
This method has now been successfully applied to the teaching of ENGLISH, LATIN, and LOGIC. A thorough knowledge of these subjects will be a great asset to anyone whose desire is to improve his position and take his place in the forefront of commercial, social, and political life.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE

The first four Lesson Papers, with full particulars of this scientific and simplified system of teaching by correspondence, will be sent to you post free and without any obligation on your part.

The "WILCOX" system is unique, thorough, and tried.

Write to-day, stating the special particulars you require, to:

The Secretary, THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED
STUDY (Dept. 27), St. Paul's Chambers, 19-21, Ludgate Hill, LONDON, E.C.

"We played a game of besique, then he said his breviary, while I read a little book that he had on him, that was not badly written at all."

"A holy book, uncle?"

"Yes, and no, or rather no. It is a history of their missions in Central Africa. It is more a book of travel and adventure. It is very fine what these men have done out there."

I began to see that it was turning out badly. I rose: "Well, adieu, uncle. I see that you are deserting Freemasonry for religion. You are a renegade."

He was still a little confused, and murmured: "But religion is a kind of Freemasonry."

I asked: "When does your Jesuit come back?"

My uncle hesitated. "I—I don't know, perhaps to-morrow—it is not certain."

And I went out, absolutely stunned.

My joke had turned out badly! My uncle is radically converted. So far, it matters little. Clerical or Freemason, for me it is six of one and half a dozen of the other; but the worst is, that he has just made his will; yes, made his will, and disinherited me, sir, in favour of the Jesuit father.—*Translated by W. W.
Tunbridge.*

LITERARY NOTES

MESSRS. FUNK AND WAGNALL'S New Standard Dictionary—a practically new creation from cover to cover—bids fair to be the last word in the art of popular lexicography. This immense undertaking will run to nearly 3,000 pages, and contain more than 450,000 terms. Perplexed newspaper readers who stand aghast before such terms as cattalo, citrange, zebrass, decathlon, pulmotor, aerofoil, and such like words of the hour will find clear and concise definitions of these twentieth-century terms in the New Standard Dictionary, which also claims for itself the simplest and most uniform system of classification and reference. The illustrations, to the number of more than 7,000, and including many fine plates, will be a strong feature, special care being taken to illustrate the latest thing in aviation, railroad equipment, wireless telephony and telegraphy, and other recent inventions. In the natural history illustrations all living animals will be drawn to scale, and the inclusion of many reproductions of famous pictures will supply another distinctive touch. On the literary side the inclusion of 7,500 separate lists of synonyms and the discussion of more than 33,000 synonyms, as well as the special stress laid on dialect—a specialist being engaged for Irish terms only—should prove a source of attraction. More than 300 specialists and editors have been at work for years on this gigantic undertaking, and no pains have been spared to make it a unique departure in dictionary-making.

The one sensational event of the slack publishing season has doubtless been the publication of Mr.
Arthur Ransome's study of Oscar Wilde at the popular price of 1s. Originally issued by Mr. Secker, it was soon withdrawn, and the author thereupon transferred it to Messrs. Methuen, who decided to issue it at the price of a popular reprint. Orders for no less than 10,000 copies were received before publication, justifying this surprising adventure. This is, of course, largely a succès de scandale. Wilde's tragic history has gained him more vogue than his inimitable cleverness ever brought him in the heyday of his popularity, and the recent revival of a pitiful affair in the Law Courts has given a fresh fillip to curiosity.

Nevertheless, both the book and subject are of more than sensational interest. It takes us back to a time when literature, from being the arena of the great Victorian titans, had become a paradise of petits-maitres who cultivated the exotic and bizarre in word-carving and phrase-turning with the solemn dignity of hierophants. The great Victorians had been oppressively strenuous and solemn, the decadents were no less oppressive and solemn in their assiduous quest of the flippant and the obverse. Yet we owe them a considerable debt. Whatever affections and insincerities were theirs, they sought beauty in language with a passionate and selfish devotion, and their generation needed to be recalled to that worship. With all their sham æstheticism and moral nastinesses, they were the precursors of much that is fine and valid in the literature of to-day.

* * * * *

It was Wilde's proudest boast that he was "a lord of language," and no one can read "De Profundis" without paying homage to his verbal mastery. Yet, as one greater than he—Walter Pater—he wrote English as if it were a dead language. This deadness was common characteristic of the period. One doubts if a craftsmanship so deliberate as that of Pater and Wilde (and one must reluctantly include R. L. S. in this category, however far removed from it he is otherwise) can produce anything but dead loveliness. One need only to contrast the style of Defoe, of Swift, or, to come to modern times, of Balzac in France and Mark Rutherford in England, with the style of Pater or Stevenson to realise the truth of it. Stevenson's style is the garment of his thought—a perfectly wrought garment of creaseless fit, but still only a dead encasement; the style of Balzac and Mark Rutherford is the very flesh of their thought, and it belongs to life even more than to literature.

* * * * *

Complaints of the decline of book-reading are in the air. To go by all accounts, the number of non-fiction readers is steadily decreasing, while the number of fiction readers is becoming increasingly fickle. But while it is no doubt true that the reader—i.e., the non-fiction book-reader—is tending to disappear, books on social questions, both in the way of radical criticism of social conditions and of constructive social betterment, are gaining an ever-growing public. The spirit of social revolt and that of social service have kept pace in rapid growth during the past few years, the tendency being towards the disappearance of a merely negative revolt and the growth of a constructive humanitarian spirit.

* * * * *

With the lengthening of the sunny days, however, the open-air book is displacing the sociological manual. Nature books figure largely in publishers' announcements, and while the would-be naturalist will find any number of interesting and not too technical manuals to guide him in his researches among insects, plants, or whatever else be his choice, the lover of the wind in the trees and the blue wine of the running wave will, in the end, turn from the many charming plein-air books of the season back to Borrow and Jefferies and Alexander Smith, and, if he be wise, to Fiona Macleod. The present-day nature book is pleasant enough, and often rich in the harvest of a quiet eye; yet one feels that the modern wanderer does, as a task and as a cult, what Borrow did for the sheer, headlong, natural love of the thing. And that makes all the difference. Moreover, the trail of the specialist is over many of the new nature books. One writer looks for churches,

FOOT'S BED-TABLE

The Adapta

Patented.

Can be instantly Raised, Lowered, Reversed, or Inclined.

Extends over bed, couch, or chair, and is an ideal Table for reading or taking meals in bed with ease and comfort. To change from a flat table to an inclined reading-stand simply press a button at the top of standard. The top measures 27in. by 18in., and can be raised from 28in. to 44in. from the floor, or to any intermediate height. It cannot over-balance. Comprises Bed-Table, Reading-Stand, Writing-Table, Bed-

Rest, Sewing or Work Table, Music-Stand, Easel, Card Table, etc.

- No. 1. Enamelled Metal Parts, with Stained Oak Top ... £1 7 6
- No. 2. Ditto, with Adjustable Side Tray and Automatic Bookholders (as illustrated) ... 1 15 0
- No. 3. Complete as No. 2, but with Polished Oak Top and superior finish ... 2 5 0
- No. 4. Complete as No. 3, but with all Metal Parts Nickel-plated ... 3 3 0
- No. 5. Complete as No. 4, but fitted with a Detachable Candle Sconce, and all Metal Parts finished in Polished Brass ... 3 12 6

Carriage Paid in Great Britain. Write for Booklet A30.

J. FOOT & SON, Ltd. (Dept. A30),
171, New Bond Street, London, W.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES FOR THE HOME.

CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Perfectly made in true proportion. Prices from £3/7/8. The popular size, 6 ft. 4 in. costs only £5/5/0. Seven days free trial. Send to-day for fully illustrated art catalogue giving sizes & prices.

E. J. RILEY, Ltd.,
Ondino Works, Accrington.

HOW TO WRITE SALEABLE "FICTION," by the Literary Agent, who sells MSS. to over 150 Publishers and Periodicals. Strongly recommended by Editors. Syllabus free.—G. Magnus, 115, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write—we sell. 16pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

ADVICE ON DIET.—If you are not so well or vigorous as you would like to be, write to—THOMAS MACINTYRE, Diet Specialist, Cullercoats, Northumberland.

CONCENTRATION: THE MASTER KEY.

Positively worth £100 to anyone fired with ambition.

Clear, Powerful, Practical, Scientific. Nearly every book on Concentration has lacked the one thing to make it of real value to the reader—the preparation of the mind, which has been fully dealt with. The most practical and helpful of the many Self-Help through Self-Development manuals issued by the Talisman people. This book will double your mental capacity and ability. Send 2s. 8d. to-day direct to

THE TALISMAN OFFICE, HARROGATE.

PHOTOPLAY WRITING.—The New Art. Plots criticised and re-constructed into approved scenario form by Conductor of Scenario Page in Cinema. Interested?—Particulars stamp, E. A. Dench, 54, Lr. Thames St., London.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and General MSS., 8d. per 1,000 words. Plays, 1s. per 1,000 words. Carbon-copies, 1d. extra per 1,000 words.—C. A. GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

Every owner, or prospective owner of a gramophone, should read

HINTS ABOUT THE GRAMOPHONE

Considered as a Musical Instrument.

Cr. 8vo, 68 pp.
ROWELL and SONS, PRICE 1/6 POST FREE.
62-68, Rosebery Avenue, London, E.C. (Mention this paper.)

JUST PUBLISHED.

FELLOWSHIP BOOKS

A new contribution by various writers toward the expression of the Human Ideal and Artistic Faith of our own day.

The first Six Volumes are:

| | |
|------------------------|----------------|
| FRIENDSHIP | Clifford Box |
| THE JOY OF THE THEATRE | Gilbert Cannan |
| DIVINE DISCONTENT | James Guthrie |
| THE QUEST OF THE IDEAL | Grace Rhys |
| SPRINGTIME | C. J. Tait |
| THE COUNTRY | Edward Thomas |

Price 2/- net each. The Volumes are small 8vo (6½ × 4½), tastefully bound in cloth gilt, with silk bookmark.

The aims of the Series are to recall the elemental truths whence springs all that makes life worth living, the factors that increase our common enjoyment of nature, poetry and art. The main intention is constructive, not destructive, and neither theological nor political.

Each Author has been given free choice of subject, and no one has been asked to contribute who was not in sympathy with the scheme, the result being that the writers give of their best, and express in the spirit of fellowship their thoughts on the themes they select.

The question of the Format has received the fullest consideration. It has been the Publisher's aim to make the books show from cover to cover every right quality usually associated—often erroneously—with high-priced volumes issued by private presses.

A full Prospectus, with Notes on the Authors, will be sent on application.

B. T. BATSFORD, Publisher,
94, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

another for old inn signs, a third for mosses, when he ought not to be looking for anything but let the soul of all things come to him. Or, what is worse (from the nature lover's point of view), he may look for the sign-manual of the conscienceless and greedy landlord in the thatch and brick of every old wayside cottage—another instance of the invasion of the new social spirit. One welcomes this growing sensitiveness to human pain and wrong, but . . . there's the wind on the heath, brother, and it, too, is one of the inalienable rights of man which cannot be filched from him with impunity.

* * * * *

And talking of Borrow reminds one of the coming celebrations at Norwich, where, on July 5th, the 110th anniversary of his birth will be celebrated. There will be the usual reception and speeches, and a Borrowian touch will be added by the Gypsy and Folk Lore Club, which will hold a week-end camp on Mousehold Heath, immortalised by the potent and sensitive brush of Old Crome. It is intended to raise a permanent memorial to Borrow, Mr. Frank J. Ferrall, of Guilderoy, Yarmouth, acting as treasurer.

* * *

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING?
To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Most of your correspondents who have criticised Mr. Bland's article on this subject seem to me to have rather missed his point. The basis of his argument was not that struggling for life developed brain in the struggler. Though training and general conditions of life may cultivate talents, these acquired changes cannot be transmitted to the offspring, so have no influence on the evolution of the race.

The factors of evolution are variation and selection. In every generation of any species there will be variety. Some will be more clever than their parents, some more dull, some will have this ability enhanced or suppressed, some that. Then, since the total number is too large for the available food and other necessities, there is a struggle for existence, in which those fittest for their environment (of which their fellows form a part) will survive, and the less gifted be killed or starved before reaching maturity. Thus, the only ones left to produce the next generation will be those possessed of the most strength or reasoning power. This succeeding generation will also have its variations, but the average will be just a little higher than that of the last, because it has been born from the best of it. Thus, by a weeding out of the less brainy at every generation, intellect is slowly increased in the race. Mr. Bland asks which gardener does the best weeding, Nature or the conditions of to-day? He then explains how the little weeding there is to-day is of a very haphazard kind.

To say that the recent leaps of invention and industry are due to brain evolution is wrong. There is probably no appreciable human evolution for better or worse within the historical period. Our material progress is the result of the accumulated store of knowledge and ideas to which each generation adds its own fraction; for these things can be passed on to our children by means of words and books and the works of men, though not by the act of giving birth.

THE ART OF PIANOFORTE PLAYING

By VINCENT JACKSON and
EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN

A New and Systemised Method of
Pianoforte Instruction, to be completed in 4 parts at 2s. 6d. net each.

Parts 1 and 2 now ready.

TIMES

"Its author has conceived the admirable notion of teaching the elements of form and harmony simultaneously with those of pianoforte playing."

A BOOK OF ENGLISH MELODIES being a Selection of 100 Songs from the 16th to the 18th Centuries

Edited by VINCENT JACKSON

Medium 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SEND FOR PROSPECTUS

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

Neither do men of great genius point to racial advance. They are only the few very varied ones of their day, who have placed corner-stones in the edifice of human thought, and so achieved notoriety.

Mr. Bland touches on the other way of weeding out, that of keeping the unfit from reproduction, which, of course, is just as effective as killing them off before they reach adolescence, and a deal more humane. With Nature the most beautiful animals can most easily win mates, so beauty is evolved; and we know that with Man this is also to some extent true. Could not intellect be involved in as painless a way? Eugenists believe it could. At present we could dare no more than the segregation of the feeble-minded; but surely we have sufficient brains to gain the knowledge that will save our brains. It would be sad to let some other kind of animal catch up Man and wrench from him the dominion of the earth. Yet that may happen—millions of years hence.—I am, sir, etc.,
Manchester. BRIAN BRUCE-WALKER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—One needs only to read the articles and correspondence contributed on this subject thus far to see how utterly confused are the ideas obtaining upon the question of the brain and brain functions. — But before we can judge of brain degeneracy we must be quite clear as to what those attributes of mind are which we connect with brain function, also how brain conditions act, and are in turn acted upon by the mind. We shall not then be found declaring that the brain is degenerating when we only mean that intellectuality of a certain kind is degenerating. Nor shall we talk of the evolution of any particular convolution in any fancied sense when we speak of its ushering in the advent of some great step in the ascent of man, but seek to identify such convolution in something like a palpable way. We should also be spared the rather ludicrous spectacle of one intellectual person using the word "brain" to express his meaning whilst another equally intellectual says "brawn" ought to have been used.

If we ask what is the cause of this confusion, we shall be able to get the true answer from no less an authority than the co-discoverer with Darwin of the Theory of Evolution, Alfred Russel Wallace, and I would, as a humble individual who has given considerable attention to these matters for himself, commend to the notice of your readers one chapter in this author's book, "The Wonderful Century—Its Successes and Its Failures." This chapter is entitled "The Neglect of Phrenology," this neglect being one of the failures to be set over against the extraordinary successes of the last century.

This indubitable authority upon all kinds of natural phenomena thus speaks of the brain and brain functions (p. 191):—

"The front of the brain is the seat of our perceptive and reflective faculties, the top of our higher sentiments, the back and sides of our animal instincts. . . . The form of the skull during life corresponds so closely to that of the brain that it is possible to determine the proportionate development of the various parts of the latter by an examination of the former." He also concludes the chapter as follows:—

"In the coming century Phrenology will assuredly gain acceptance. It will prove itself to be the true science of Mind. Its practical uses in Education, in self-discipline, in the reformatory treatment of criminals, and in the remedial treatment of the insane, will give it one of the highest places in the hierarchy of

*An EDITION DE LUXE at
the price of an ordinary edition.*

The Handsome Surrey Library Edition

OF THE

Works of George Meredith

Bound in Pale Blue Cloth, gilt top edge

PUBLISHED AT £8 NET

is now offered by

The Times Book Club

376 to 384, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

AT THE GREATLY REDUCED CASH PRICE OF

5 : 10 : 0 FOR THE 24 VOLS.

CARRIAGE PAID, OR

Six monthly payments of £1.

This provides, at a cost equal to 4s. 7d. per volume—the price of an ordinary edition not comparable with this in typography, paper, or binding—a sumptuous Edition de Luxe of the works of this great writer.

Prospectus, with Specimen Page and Illustrations of the Bindings, sent on receipt of postcard mentioning "Everyman."

NOW READY.

In Memoriam:

RICHARD WAGNER

1813—1913.

By DAVID IRVINE.

Leather, gilt lettered, 3s. net, by post 3s. 3d.; half leather, 2s. 6d. net, by post 2s. 9d.

LONDON: WATTS & CO., 17, JOHNSON'S COURT, E.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included. — Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

LEARN FRENCH by Rosenblum's Anglo-French Journal, 1d., monthly, 1½d. post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French."

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

THE CITIZENS' CHARTER. A Scheme of National Organisation.

To Grant a Charter of Citizenship. To Collect National Information.
To Prevent Crime and Disease. To Simplify Elections.
To Ensure Proper Appointments to Public Offices.
To Effect Economies in Legislative and Administrative Action, Etc., Etc., Etc.

By CHARLES E. INNES.

PRICE 3d. POST FREE. 4d.

THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, Ltd., 30, Blackfriars St., Manchester.

PRIVATE SOCIAL TOURS (Ladies and Gentlemen).
June 20th. HOLLAND. July 4th. TYROL (Magnificent scenery).
Aug. 1st. RUSSIA (Caucasus, Volga, Crimea, Moscow, Petersburg).
Aug. 15th. SWITZERLAND. Sept. SPAIN. ITAL. LAKES & CHATEAUX.
Miss Bishop, Hasleuere, Wim'edon Park Road, Wimbledon.

AN ARTIST in 12 lessons. If you wish to learn to draw humorous pictures, book illustrations, cartoons, posters, etc., in 12 lessons, write for prospectus "E." Describes our new system, also course for beginners.—Northern School Drawing, Westhoughton, Lancs.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

DAUBER. By JOHN MASEFIELD. 3s. 6d. net.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL. By A. FILON. Royal 8vo. With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 15s. net.

RUE AND ROSES. By ANGELA LANGER. Introduction by W. L. COURTNEY. 5s. net.

THE PLAYS OF OLD JAPAN (The Nô). By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc., Ph.D. With translations of four of the plays. Preface by Baron Kato, the Japanese Ambassador. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

THE "MIND-THE-PAINT" GIRL. A Play by Sir A. W. PINERO. Cloth, 2s. 6d.; Paper, 1s. 6d.

DEGENERATION. By MAX NORDAU. New Popular Edition. Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. Heinemann begs to announce the publication of HAROLD E. GOAD'S new novel, THE KINGDOM.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE KINGDOM HAROLD E. GOAD
LU OF THE RANGES. ELEANOR MORDAUNT
VIRGINIA ELLEN GLASGOW
GOSLINGS J. D. BERESFORD
THE AMBASSADRESS WILLIAM WRIOTHESLEY
THE LIFE MASK By the Author of "He Who Passed"
THE WEAKER VESSEL . . . E. F. BENSON
WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO . . . ? (2nd Imp.)
 ELIZABETH ROBINS
GROWING PAINS (2nd Imp.) . . . IVY LOW

Heinemann's Shilling and Sevenpenny Novels are the best.
Write for List.

Swift Sure

What are you going to do with your last Summer's Suits?

Discard them and buy new ones? (that will cost you pounds). Wear them again this Summer just as they are? (they look rather the worse for wear), or send them to Achille for cleaning and tailor-pressing? (that's the best plan, for then you'll start with suits that will look like new ones).

We only take four days to clean and tailor-press a suit, we charge only 3/9, and we know that you will be very pleased with the result.

Write for new book, "Modern Beau Brummels." The cover is reproduced from a fine water-colour by WILL HOUGHTON, and the letterpress is illustrated with clever pen and ink sketches by "THORPE." The book contains much useful information in an interesting form and is well worth keeping.

A postcard brings it.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.
Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

the sciences; and its persistent neglect and obloquy during the last sixty years will be referred to as an example of the almost incredible narrowness and prejudice which prevailed among men of science at the very time when they were making such splendid advances in other fields of thought and discovery."

These are the words of "one who knows," surely.—
I am, sir, etc.,
Margate. F. C. BARRATT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. H. Bland says that "Progressive evolution is not brought about by some inward impulsion, some mysterious life-force, . . . it is the result of certain external conditions."

Permit me to say that it is the reciprocity between both the inward and outward life-forces that affects evolution and growth.

An acorn will not grow if sown in a desert, nor will a stone manifest itself as a tree when embedded in the choicest and richest life-giving loam. Evolution proceeds by means of involution on each plane of our living, and it is the cumulative effect of that which is involved which helps us further forward and capacitates us to take in more.

Where the necessary substance, fertiliser, or exercise is not forthcoming, on whichever plane it may be, evolution on that plane stagnates, does not proceed, as is the case with the savage tribes of to-day.

The sharpness and cunning which crude and half-savage conditions of life, together with a low standard of morality, call forth, and which, in a great measure, poverty, arduous toil, and competition foster, is not intellectualism; this quality of mind is bred by other means and requires other conditions, and a culture which first coaxes into life, then smiles upon it and strengthens it, without blasting and bruising it at every stage of its unfoldment.

I think, too, that astrological influences count largely in the development and formation of character, as well as physique, and often counteract and modify both heredity and environment, and, to a certain extent, explain the great difference (mentally, morally, and physically) which often exists between parents and children, and also between brothers and sisters; and I think it is by reason of astrological influences that so many great men have arisen from out the most adverse circumstances to a noble career and life, while those born amid the most helpful conditions have either not risen higher or have fallen lower.

Allow me to remark also that involution is not a process of cramming; the things involved must be assimilated, understood, recognised.

I should say that there are four factors which count in progressive evolution:

1. The individuality of the human-ego itself.
2. Astrological influences.
3. Parental chastity or otherwise pre-natally.
4. The physical form which the ego-soul takes on from its physical parents, which may, as far as this life is concerned, sometimes be a somewhat ill-fitting garment for its particular type of soul.—I am, sir, etc.,

Teignmouth, S. Devon.

F. H.

(This correspondence is now closed.—EDITOR.)

THE PROBLEM OF THE WORKER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Lethaby, states that a body of workmen have as much right as any other corporation of men to establish a business and take the profits thereof. Of course they have! Why have they not done it? Instead of this incessant talking and quarrelling with existing conditions, why have not the working men combined, in however small a way, for a start to produce what people want, and divide the whole profits. (They have already done this in a way so far as distribution is concerned.) So long as price is right and the work is good the buyer is satisfied, and would probably prefer to encourage a producing guild of workers.

Oh, some say, they have no capital. Nonsense! The Trade Unions have ample capital for such a departure. It is wonderful how little capital is needed if men are honest and trustworthy.

In the space of a few years I have seen an illiterate man of fifty, who up to that time had never more than 30s. a week wages, build up a large business. True, he was a good and hard worker, which most people are not.

The fact is, both the idea of universal arrangement of work to suit every man and communistic production mean direction and absolute control.

The only real trial of the first took place under a despot in Peru, and to run a community as a business in which all the producers shared they must do so, first, according to the value of their work; or, second, at equal rates, without regard to the value of the work produced by each.

In the present state of human nature an autocratic governing body would be necessary to carry this out.

Whether there is one despot or despotism by a Board matters nothing. The people would have to do what they did not wish to, just as they do now.

A beneficent despotism would, it is always admitted, be the best system.

Outside of that, individualism was a rough and ready way of raising the standard of human achievement; Socialism—even so far as we have it—means taxing the fit for the maintenance of the unfit, and a premium on the propagation of the unfit at the expense of the fit. The effect of Individualism is just the reverse. For twenty-five years Individualism has been discouraged, discipline and obedience have not been taught, manners have been neglected, and immediate material good put forward in place of high ideals and formation of character.

The ignorant voter has controlled the politician only anxious to keep in power, and to do so the politician has to give the ignorant voter what he wants, not what he needs. Free bread and games have never been the means of building up free and strong men.

Freedom of opportunity is all that a strong man asks, whether he is of high or low birth. To be boarded, lodged, and directed by a Government is the refuge of the weakling.—I am, sir, etc.,

C. STANSFIELD HICKS.

Essex, May 13th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Re "The Abolition of the Working Classes," your correspondent, W. R. Lethaby, writes of "the right of a body of workmen to establish a business," etc. Of course they have! Let them do it! They have the funds (Trades Union). Let them show the world what can be done.

Many will say it is already done by the co-operators. But do they really compete on level terms with shopkeepers, and can they as manufacturers turn out as good quality cocoa, soap, etc., as the largest manufacturers, who spend tens of thousands on advertising, at an equal price? No, decidedly not!

Can the State give justice to all parties in anything

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers" scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

- | | |
|--|--|
| Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech"; | A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S. (President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing"; |
| ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech"; | ALBERT CREW (Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings"; |
| J. L. GRIFFITHS (U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking"; | GENERAL EDITOR, A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law). |

But "The Book of Public Speaking" is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World's Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

- | | | |
|----------------------|--------------------|--------------------|
| Lord Rosebery | Joseph Chamberlain | Lord Fisher |
| Lord Beaconsfield | Max O'Rell | Abraham Lincoln |
| H. H. Asquith | R. Waldo Emerson | Justin McCarthy |
| A. J. Balfour | Harold Cox | Viscount Milner |
| W. E. Gladstone | Woodrow Wilson | M. Poincaré |
| Sir Edward Clarke | G. Bernard Shaw | Whitelaw Reid |
| Andrew Lang | Charles Dickens | Theodore Roosevelt |
| D. Lloyd George | John Bright | Philip Snowden |
| Winston Churchill | Chauncey Depew | Ian Maclaren |
| Mark Twain | Sir A. Conan Doyle | Augustine Birrell |
| Spencer Leigh Hughes | Sir Edward Grey | Sir A. W. Pinero |
| Sir Henry Irving | Earl Halsbury | Etc., etc. |

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

FREE BOOKLET.

The Publishers have prepared an interesting Illustrated Booklet—which they will send free—describing the work and their offer to deliver the complete work as published for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

To the CANTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge and without any obligation on my part, full particulars of "The Book of Public Speaking."

Name.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address.....

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

NIETZSCHE COMPLETED

18 Volumes £3 16s. net

Single Volumes Supplied

"The atheism of Nietzsche should blind us to his qualities any more than the scepticism of Voltaire prevents us from enjoying the wit and common sense of the Sage of Ferney."

"Standard," April 22nd, 1913

"The Intense and even arrogant individualism which Nietzsche preaches is precisely the sort of stiffening we want to-day." Mr. George Sampson in the "Daily Chronicle" of May 8th, 1913

"To-day no person who follows the great movement of intellect has failed to draw energy from the Nietzschean well."

"Daily Mail" of May 9th, 1913

"Nietzsche, with all his tempestuous violence, was a great poet of hope and courage and the worth of man."

"The Times," May 15th, 1913

T. N. Foulis, Publisher, London & Edinburgh

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

INEX-
PENSIVE

A DAINTY
AND

LUXURY.

FOR MUSIC.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

they do? Ask the sub-postmasters about the sale of insurance stamps! Ask the Inland Revenue man who dealt with Old Age Pension claims! Ask the Second Division clerks, who know their work better than the First Division University Class!

What I think is necessary is to take away from the State what is already State monopoly.—I am, sir, etc.,
SOUTHAMPTON.

PACIFISM AND IMPERIALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Signor Corradini's article under the above heading is no doubt intentionally provocative, conformably to its function of advocating a doctrine opposed to popular views, but he vitiates the whole of his otherwise interesting argument by his opening sentences, which are a challenge to reason.

He says, "There are three kinds of pacifists," and proceeds to name three types, which most people will recognise at once as impossibilists, neglecting altogether the kind of pacifist which forms the greater proportion of those owning the title.

The first, the plutocracy, he himself actually excludes, on quite sufficient grounds, in the next paragraph.

The second, the Socialists, are such a heterogeneous group—in England at any rate—that it is a gross assumption to lump them together as he does in this connection. The reason he assigns for their opposition to war is too manifestly a partisan sneer to carry much weight in what purports to be a philosophical argument.

With regard to his third type, the idealists, none but the extremely fatuous would regard war as anything but a glorious and all-absorbing duty when the question of resisting unjustified aggression is concerned. When it is a question of overcoming opposition to the enterprise and commercial expansion necessary to the continued existence of a nation, the idealist-pacifist will ever, by the nature of things, be found in a futile minority in that nation.

The great majority of pacifists simply hold that armed warfare is, in itself, an outrageous state of things—not one to be glorified—and that it should only be resorted to in extremities, and when the other manifold resources of civilisation are unavailing to avert disaster.

The glorification of the thing in itself is as senseless as the cult of any other form of violence, say the use of the lash for certain criminal offences.

If we must have the thing, well we must put up with it for the present in default of a better solution of our difficulties, but for heaven's sake don't let us make a god of international hooliganism!—I am, sir, etc.,

W. H. MATTHEWS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Does not Signor Corradini take things a little too much for granted in his interesting article on "Pacifism and Imperialism"?

He contends that "war is the quickening force of the world," and to prove his point, he refers to the Turco-Italian and Balkan wars, maintaining that districts which under Turkish sovereignty have been unproductive and barren, will become fertile and fruitful under the new régime. Personally, I think it is premature to form an opinion either one way or the other as to this; however, be that as it may, the argument does not seem to me to have very much force as a point in favour of the principle of war, as it was by a mere chance that progress, and not reaction, was triumphant. Surely it stands to reason that had the Turks conquered, as was at one time anticipated, the Balkan States would have been compelled to take upon themselves the yoke of Ottoman, laissez-faire incompetence, and civilisation would have been as adversely affected as by the Allies' victory she has benefited.

No one deplors the results of the Balkan and Turco-Italian conflicts, but these results can scarcely be accepted as a justification of the principle of war.

And how would Signor Corradini support his theory in the case of a war between nations so highly productive and progressive as, say, Great Britain and Germany? Here there is no room for "quickenings," and the result of a war would be industrial and financial chaos, by which the hands of the clock of progress, far from being quickened, would be very considerably set back!—I am, sir, etc.,

Chingford. THEODORE ESMOND.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I must thank your contributor, Signor Enrico Corradini, and the correspondents on the above subject for stating their several cases so distinctly as to introduce me immediately to the fallacy of each.

My difference with Signor Corradini is a rather fine, but, I think, an important one. He says that war is the renewing force of human society, pouring new life into lazy countries (obviously he is assuming that the man best able to till the soil is the one best able to take it in war), and is therefore desirable. The pacifists say that war is murder and therefore undesirable.

I wish to advance that war is not necessarily a renewing force of human society, that it is nearly always a devastating and destroying force, and that the good soldier is not always a good workman; but that war is in some cases desirable, nevertheless, for quite another reason—that it is an ancient and natural expression of certain forces in a healthy man's heart, that in some cases it is the only possible means for the achievement of an ideal or the exterminating of an injustice, and, therefore, that if, for instance, many men were the slaves of a few tyrants and war were the only way to freedom, then war would be just.

The open sky and the glory of God call every man who has a suffering brother to fight, to die, if that is the only way, for him.—I am, sir, etc.,

Bradford. H. BURROWS.

THE LLOYD GEORGE CRUSADE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. P. W. Wilson suggests that to assess only the land value of our railways for rating purposes "would be to put some millions a year into the pockets of the companies," which he thinks would affect the price to be paid by the State in the event of "nationalisation."

He seems to overlook the fact that the wages bill of the railways generally is smaller by millions of pounds than it ought to be; and that when the cause of this—the exodus of ill-paid labour from the rural districts—has been removed by the rating and taxing of land values, the companies will need a fund upon which to draw for the proper remuneration of those whom they employ.

Again, if we relieve Chatsworth House at the expense of Chatsworth Park, and supplement the Dependability

is really rare as far as a Range of Collars is concerned—dependability that in every Collar is every good point that matters. For style—for a choice to suit all tastes—for fine materials and fine finish—for the utmost resistance to laundry usage—for Satisfactory Wear

"HORBRO" COLLARS
can be relied upon. Thought and care expended on trifles, as well as on main details, have produced an Ideal Collar Range—with a shape and style for Every Neck and Every Purpose.

6d. each 5/6 per Dozen.
. . . Write to-day for the Collar Folder illustrating 36 styles and giving full d. tails. Kindly mention this paper.

Horne
BROTHERS
388, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.
And Branches throughout London.

"Popular! it speaks for itself, sir—everybody is having Hall's Distemper walls now. We used to use it most among the artistic folk and people with fancy ideas, but now it is Hall's Distemper everywhere."

And no wonder! The English public, proverbially proud of their homes, have learned that behind the artistic idea

HALL'S DISTEMPER
(REG. TRADE MARK)

gives solid practical advantages, such as are offered in no other wall covering.

It gives an even, velvety wall surface. It sets hard as cement, and does not crack, blister, nor peel off. Unlike wallpaper it never fades nor changes colour.

It is instant death to all insect and germ life, and gives clean, healthy walls which may be washed by lightly sponging with warm water.

"HOW TO DECORATE YOUR HOME"—a booklet that helps, by giving beautiful examples in colours, and useful hints, free by post on application to the Sole Manufacturers:—

SISSONS BROTHERS & CO., Ltd., HULL.
London Office: 199^B, Borough High Street, S.E.
Liverpool: 65, Mount Pleasant.
Glasgow: 113, Bath Street.
Reading: 6, Gun Street.

amount collected out of the much under-assessed land values of Devonshire House, Piccadilly, it would seem that we shall assist, in several ways, the poorer ratepayers in the Chatsworth district.—I am, sir, etc., Kent, May 13th, 1913. F. A. E. WATERFIELD.

THE BIRTH OF A NEW CIVILISATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with considerable interest Rev. Lord William Cecil's article entitled "The Birth of a New Civilisation." May I suggest the modification of the title by the omission of the word "New"? If you will pardon the paradox, China, it seems to me, has existed until recently only in a state of refined barbarism, and such a state of existence, whether considered from the Western or any other standpoint, is always directly opposed to civilisation.

Lord William would infer, I take it, that such horrible rites as those observed by the various tribes in India until a comparatively recent date were the practices of a civilised race (Eastern variety, of course!). I regret that for me such an opinion is quite untenable.

He further asserts that civilisation, having "change" (i.e., "progress") as its ideal, is undesirable, inasmuch as it is apt thereby "to run past efficiency." I have not yet read of a civilisation which ever approached true efficiency, far less ran past it.

The superior (or most progressive) civilisation has invariably asserted itself over the inferior (or less progressive) civilisations. Consequently, the aspiration to a standstill civilisation by China, as approved by your able writer, would mean to her, not permanent stability—not even retrogression—but sure disaster.

China, sir, thanks primarily to English mission work, has decided for civilisation in its only true sense, i.e., progress, and is quitting, not entering, the domains of inactivity and indifference.—I am, sir, etc.,

F. W. GIDLEY.

Charing Cross, S.W., May 5th, 1913.

A PROTESTANT PROTEST ON THE ROMANIST BIAS OF "EVERYMAN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have taken in EVERYMAN since its first number appeared. I have seen from time to time your answer to the charge that your paper has a bias in favour of Roman Catholicism. I have always discredited such suspicions as being both ungenerous and unjust; for some good folk the scent of Romanism is everywhere. Now, however, judging from your own article, "Liselotte," in your last week's issue, I am reluctantly compelled to come to the conclusion that there is something in the surmise, for you take the, as I consider it, unfair opportunity of having a fling at Protestantism and the Reformation. Speaking of the marriage of the father of Liselotte with Louise von Degenfeldt, you say, "Having the supreme control of the Church as well as of the State, he forced his subjects to recognise his bigamous union with Louise von Degenfeldt. The Church Courts accepted the strange situation, even as Luther had sanctioned the bigamous marriage of Philip of Hesse." Now, you must know that there is another side to this question of Luther sanctioning what you term the bigamous marriage of Philip of Hesse. What I complain about is your dragging in Luther's name in this connection with the too obvious purpose of discrediting his character.

Then, again, further on you say, "It was only an application of the old Lutheran principle adopted from the beginning of the Reformation—'Cujus regio, illius religio.' Religious allegiance followed political allegiance, and spiritual interests were subordinated to reasons of State."

A more flagrant perversion of the facts of history in regard to the Reformation and the Reformers it would be hard to match. But let that pass. Again, what I complain of is your evident attempt to discredit the Reformation and Protestantism by your own reading of history, and in other equally unfair ways I have noticed in your paper. I, for one, shall be compelled to drop your paper, and to warn my Protestant friends against its unfair controversial tactics.—I am, sir, etc., Wilts, May 10th, 1913. (Rev.) F. DOCKER.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE PIONEERS (Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). This is an intensely interesting novel, and it has the somewhat unusual merit of retaining the reader's interest and sympathy, in spite of the fact that it is obviously written with a purpose. The scene of the story is laid in Canada, and the author has managed to catch the spirit of the tireless pioneers who are striving to wrench a living from the "Thirsty Land." Dexter Hayden has left home and determined to make for himself a home in the wilderness. He proceeds to build a "soddy," or house, made of cut sods, and here he takes up his abode and makes many valiant but, alas! fruitless fights against stern and relentless nature. Miss Sarah Comstock has depicted her characters with care and understanding, and the unfolding of Dexter's personality as the story progresses is sympathetically portrayed. "A vast, greyish-brown stretch, unbroken, infinite; seared, lashed, buried for ages by merciless sun and wind and snow in turn; left to eternal barrenness by a forgetful God." It is out of this that Dexter determines to hew a green and happy homestead, but everything seems to go against him. His first crop is blown out of the parched earth before it has hardly taken root; his second and third crops are burnt to death by the sun. His house, so hardly built, and the furniture, so lovingly fashioned (even though it be from old boxes and boards)—all this, including his stock, is burnt by a prairie fire. He nearly loses his wife, who is starving herself so that she may add to the pitiful savings which they are contriving to collect for an irrigating plant. The reader will observe that the book is rather a sad one, and though it has not the proverbial happy ending, at any rate things look a little brighter than at the beginning. But, then, the lot of the pioneer can never be an easy one, though it may well be heroic, and that is undoubtedly what Dexter and his wife are—heroic fighters against almost hopeless odds.

THE SOLDIER'S FRIEND, SARAH ROBINSON, with a Foreword by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C., K.G. (T. Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d. net). This is a record of the life and works of Miss Sarah Robinson, who for practically the whole of her life has worked amongst soldiers and sailors, striving to imbue them with a high moral and religious standard. The volume is an extremely interesting one, revealing, as it does, the difficulties with which Miss Robinson had to cope in her earlier years, both with the Government and the men, in her endeavours to set up mission halls in and around the garrison towns of Aldershot and Portsmouth. In spite of enormous disadvan-

(Continued on page 188.)

THE ART THAT PAYS.

50 Summer Scholarships in Black-&-White Designing and Commercial Illustration open to "Everyman" readers without Entrance Fee.

ART in advertising offers a splendid field to all who are willing to learn the few practical requirements of the work. Men like Walter Crane, Bernard Partridge, Simpson, E. J. Sullivan, Hubert Herkomer, Charles E.

Better than Picture Painting.

Dawson and others who matter in the Art world design advertisements not merely because it is more profitable than picture painting, but because they know it's better for our walls and magazines to be covered with designs that are good in line and colour than with advertisements that are bald, crude and vulgar.

• • •

FORMERLY the artist was the rich man's lackey. Only the wealthy could buy pictures, and the poor painter had to sell his work or perish. To-day the artist can snap his fingers at the retired usurer or mill-owner, because there is a new and widening market for his work. Artists can now do better than paint portraits of obese magnates, or "pretty landscapes" in gilded frames to cumber up the stuffy dining-rooms of dull-eyed dukes. They may draw pictures for the people—their fellows in the workaday world.

Artists snap fingers.

Can you draw a Boxing
Glove or the Post-Impressionist Cat?

MORE and better drawings are wanted daily, new periodicals keep adding to the countless opportunities for the man or woman who can draw for reproduction—these periodicals arise to meet the needs of the enormously increasing number of advertisers. They succeed or fail according to the quantity and merits of their illustrations. Cut out the pictures and tear the cover off a popular magazine such as Nash's and see what it looks like. Who would buy it without its pictures?

Thousands of Pounds Daily.

Advertisers now have such a lively appreciation of the value of illustrations that, in London alone, they spend thousands of pounds a day upon the kind of work that EVERYMAN readers could soon learn to do.

• • •

ARTISTS usually sell their work by post, saving time and embarrassment of verbal bargaining. By post anyone with a taste for drawing can enjoy the advantages of a London training at home.

When the Student has earned £10.

The Practical Correspondence College—the All-British Art School with the world-wide reputation—offers the Full Course of Instruction in Black and White at half fees to the first 50 readers to pass a postal examination. The balance of fees is only payable when the student has earned Ten Pounds. Our interests are mutual, for we succeed or fail with the student.

• • •

IF the Course fails to help the student to earn £10, then the student is under no obligation to complete payment of fees.

The College stakes 200 guineas upon the success of the 50 EVERYMAN Scholarship holders.

Earning while
Learning. Most students are helped to earn while they learn, and easily dispose of their work.

Any reader with a taste for drawing, common sense, and ambition, stands a chance of being launched at unprecedented terms right into the most interesting and lucrative of the artistic professions either as a profitable spare-time pursuit or a regular occupation.

• • •

NO preliminary training or expenses are necessary. Awards will be made in the order in which specimen sketches are received. Send as soon as possible, but not later than June 30, stamped, self-addressed envelope for full particulars of the world's most successful Course of Home Study in Applied Art at the most favourable terms ever offered.

• • •

THE subjects taught include:

Drawing for reproduction, book cover, advertisement designs, lettering, perspective, line, wash and body colour sketches, splatter work, time and labour-saving devices, originating saleable designs, establishing a connection, commercial correspondence, dealing with printers, publishers and advertisers, how, when, and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

Correspondence must not be addressed to the editor of EVERYMAN, but to the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

• • •

IT costs nothing and you risk nothing by entering for this unique scholarship. The exclusive and confidential lessons are superbly illustrated. Students' exercises are criticised and difficulties explained away by personal correspondence.

If you can draw well enough to amuse your friends, you should begin at once to learn how to turn your Talent into Guineas.

HOW TO STUDY

Rapidly, Effectively & Scientifically,
with the Minimum of Fatigue.

To study rapidly and effectively you must understand how to pay attention, how to observe, how to employ your memory so that you may remember what you read. You must know how to develop your Will-power so as to enlist its valuable aid when your Will flags. You must know how to control your thoughts so as to inhibit alien ideas, and to shut out distracting influences. You must know how to guard against Fatigue, for to engage in study when your mind is fatigued is to make your study of no value. You are taught how to secure the above in an easy, sure, and scientific manner in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration," the finest all-round Mental-Training you can undertake. It will revolutionise your outlook on life and make you much more efficient in study, or in your Profession or Business. In every part of the civilised world men and women in every walk of life testify to this. "Scientific Concentration" is highly recommended by the late Mr. W. T. Stead (Editor of the "Review of Reviews"), "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Public Opinion," "Great Thoughts," etc. Learn all about this splendid All-Round Mental-Training by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 45 CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready. Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost. Gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

THE DISABILITIES OF AN IMPERFECT EDUCATION can be speedily removed by our special course of postal tuition. Remarkable results. Send stamp to-day for our explanatory booklet 125.—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

SHORTHAND.—ANOTHER CLERGYMAN'S EXPERIENCE: "The system, indeed, is a pleasure to learn and write. Formerly I wrote Pitman's, but always found the reading a severe tax on the memory, but the Sloan-Duployan can be read with ease and certainty after any length of time. My son wished to learn shorthand, and we tried two or three systems, but found S.-D. far superior."—From Rev. T. I. Price, The Green, Seaton Carew. SLOAN-DUPLOYAN SHORTHAND is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for free illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

BROTHIER RICHARD'S BOOKSHELF.—No. 3. "Modern Wars and the Peace Ideal," by NORMAN ANGELL. Price 1d. Now ready. No. 4. "Hope for the Worker," by CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P. Price 1d. Ready June 19th. PRIZES FOR BEST ESSAYS. London Agents: MURRAY, EVENDEN & CO., Pleydell House, Fleet Street. Agents wanted. W. H. SMITH & SONS.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S

ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time.

tages Miss Robinson has succeeded in the mission she undertook. She is loved by all with whom she has come in contact, and she has undoubtedly had a large share in breaking down the public opinion which for so many years was so dead set against soldiers in their private capacity. The indefatigable energy she showed in the founding of the Soldiers' Institute at Portsmouth is worthy of all praise, and those who are interested in knowing the inner history of its inauguration will welcome this book with avidity. There are many interesting and sometimes diverting anecdotes to be found in this volume, and the following is one of these which it would not be inappropriate to quote:—

"I remember G—, a proud, handsome, big cavalry man, coming in for refreshment. Some talk was going on among a group of men about the Bible. One remarked it was too dry to read, when a Christian worker said, 'Why, it is full of good stories; let me read one,' and read the story of the Prodigal Son without comment. G— was vexed, and accused this friend of making up that story just to have a hit at him; but when shown it in the Bible he seemed quite overcome, and said, 'Then I'll give in.'"

Just at this time, when militarism is so much before the public, THE SOLDIER'S FRIEND is particularly apposite, if only because it shows the human side of the soldier of to-day as seen by one who knows him intimately, and who has faithfully and lovingly served him for many years.

Mr. Thomas Holmes's work as a police-court missionary is too well known to need any introduction. He has perhaps a greater knowledge of the problems of the criminal classes than any other man of the present day, and what makes him so valuable an authority is that while his practical capacity for dealing with unpleasant facts remains undoubted, the depth of his charity, his peculiar qualities of self-sacrifice, bring him into close touch with the waifs and strays of humanity. LONDON'S UNDERWORLD (Dent and Sons, 6s.) is the title of his latest book, written with an insight into human nature, a clarity of vision and a sympathy of understanding which render it unique. "The odds and ends of humanity, though plentiful in London's great city, have for many years largely constituted my circle of friends and acquaintances." In that phrase, perhaps, lies something of the secret of Mr. Holmes's power. He is in very truth a friend of these people. They come to him with their troubles, their cares, reveal to him the secret sin or sorrow gnawing at their souls; and to those who have fallen by the wayside, outcast through poverty and the blows of circumstance, his help is never failing. Hear what he has to tell us of some of them. "Here is the paralysed woman of 35 who has for twenty years lain in bed the while her sister has worked incessantly to maintain her! Here is my widow friend who, after working fifteen hours daily for years, was dragged from the Lea. As she sits and listens her hands are making match boxes, and throwing them over her shoulder, one, two, three, four! right, left! they go to the imaginary heaps upon the imaginary beds, while blighted children are crawling upon the floor looking up at me with big eyes. Here is my patient old friend who makes 'white flowers,' although she is eighty years of age, and still keeps at it, though, thank God, she gets the old age pension." One can only read these pages and marvel at the courage of the man who never loses his faith in human nature—ay, even though he has gone down to the depths and witnessed scenes of shuddering misery such as the prosperous and well fed can never even picture. Throughout the book the same note sounds clear and triumphant. "I have learned that the greatest factors in life are kindly sympathy, brotherly love, a willingness to believe the best of the worst, and to have an infinite faith in the ultimate triumph of good!"

We can only say in conclusion that such a book as this is of priceless value, and should be read by all who value and regard the truth, told with infinite pity and understanding.

The longing of a woman for a child has been the theme of many novels. Miss Clara Viebig handles it with conspicuous power and insight in her latest book, THE SON OF HIS MOTHER (John Lane, 6s.). Käte Schlieben has everything that money can bring her, a devoted husband and luxurious house. All these things are hers, but for the lack of the little feet that turn a house into a home, her money and her jewels, her carriages and horses are as dust and ashes. She is ready to barter them all for a baby. As time passes on her husband shares her regret; he finds himself envying the poorest workman, and pictures how different life would be were he to have a son of his own. The woman's nerves break under the strain, and, fearful that some calamity should overtake her, her husband absents himself from business and leaves the little German town where they have lived so long and goes to Switzerland. And then ensues the climax; the husband of a peasant is shot for smuggling, and a short time after his execution his fifth child, a boy, is born. The mother has known hunger and hardship all her life, and she realises how difficult, almost impossible, it will be to find food for the newcomer. The scene between the two women is dramatic. On the one side the peasant instinct, with all the inarticulate resentment of her type, aflame with the injustice of life, yet denied the expression of her feelings; on the other the wealthy wife of the prosperous merchant, perfectly dressed, exquisitely mannered; the finished product of a refining civilisation. And between them is the child, the baby whom Kate longs to have, and from whom the mother cannot find it in her heart to part. Not until the money is counted out before her eyes does the peasant yield, and then, in a sudden outburst of elemental rage, as she sees the strange woman carrying off her child, she lets fly a knife in the hope that it may kill her. The child of their adoption is not a success. It is a case of a son of the wild brought home to the fireside, and eternally fretting for the open spaces of the earth. Wolfgang ultimately discovers that his father and mother are his only by adoption, and fiercely resents the discovery. He dies of what the doctors term heart disease, but what in reality is a vast soul sickness for his own people, his own mother and the mountains that were the cradle of his race. And poor Kate and her respectable husband cannot find it in them to regret his loss.

A clever book, full of intimate touches and flashes of rare insight.

A BALKAN PRINCE (Everett, 2s. net) is a medley of war, intrigue, aviators, and mysterious jewels! It has no great claims to interest or to amuse. Its style is commonplace, and at times degenerates into the slipshod. A certain element of popularity may be derived by Mr. Charles Roberts from the fact that the story is laid in the present day and the scenes taken from the Balkan War.

FOSTER GARTER

FOR GENTLEMEN.

A KNIGHT OF GARTERS.

Fits the leg perfectly; all metal parts being protected, it cannot injure the skin.

COMFORTABLE, because it lies quite flat.

RELIABLE, because it is made of the best material.

To be obtained from all principal dealers, or we will send sample pair post free on receipt of 1/-

THE FOSTER MANFG. CO., LTD.,
90, Foster Road, Parkeston, Essex.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksnoire Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

Shorthand

80 words per minute in

ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

STAMMERING AND ALL DEFECTS IN SPEECH effectually CURED by correspondence or personally. The "Practical Guide" is lent to inquirers, post free.—N. H. Mason, 30, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TO PLAY-WRITERS.—Manuscript Plays wanted for publication in book form. No fees. Send MS. to Publisher, 34, Maiden Lane, Strand, W.C.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

WHY RENT A HOUSE? You would not rent anything else in everyday use. You would buy it outright, and you can buy your house whether you have capital or not. Send for "Every Man his own Landlord" post free on application to Managers, 216, Bishopsgate, E.C. Mention Everyman

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

ARE YOUR NERVES HEALTHY?—If not, let me explain an inexpensive, drugless treatment. Banishes depression, sleeplessness, irritability, brain-fag, lassitude. Renews youthfulness.—Write "Specialist," c/o EVERYMAN, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes

of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

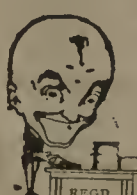

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.

Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. Money refunded if not satisfactory.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E. C.

MARTHA-BY-THE-DAY (Putnam, 2s.) is a kindly Irish charwoman, who plays the rôle of good fairy to the heroine, by name Claire, a young person with a certain amount of freshness and charm. Martha obtains for her a position as governess, and the accounts of Claire's battles with her young charge, a small scallywag of a boy, are admirably written. Miss Julie M. Lippman writes of children as only one who is on intimate terms with them can write. It would be interesting if this author were to give us a child's book. We should be certain that the small heroine and hero would not belong to the sentimental goody-goody type, nor yet to the modern and inquiring infant phenomena of contemporary fiction. Claire marries the uncle of her charge, and we are not disposed to quarrel with the conventionally happy ending of a simple but quite delightful book.

A story of the Bush, of the wild, free life of the open spaces of the earth, LU OF THE RANGES (Heinemann, 6s.) is marked by a dramatic power and force that single it out from the many books written round the Colonies, yet possessing a flavour that marks them as undeniably home grown. The author has the sense of loneliness—the loneliness born of vast solitudes, when the landscape seems invested with an actual personality, and the trees for the moment become laughing demons or stealthy spies, vanguard of a vast host of malign beings. "A veritable child of the Bush, she was inured to heat and cold, to hard work and a spare diet, to an almost incredible isolation. But now loneliness had for the first time become tangible, while appetite had grown to starvation—a creature of giant strides, with huge, tearing hands. Miss Eleanor Mordaunt has the art not only of visualising scenes with such imminent force that the reader feels the shock of reality, but of sensating the emotions she describes, so that in reading of Lu's sufferings one insensibly shudders, and glances round in sudden apprehension at the stealthy silence. The girl's devotion to her brother is not of the ordinary milk and water type of sisterly affection. Lu is as fierce in her love as in her antagonisms, and sometimes the wildness of the spirit caged in her slim little body and tense face finds expression in a mood of almost elemental savagery. The death of the little brother is a mistake. It is bad art to create only to destroy, and Win was too strong a force in Lu's life to have been removed. The girl's relations with Julian Orde, the sudden surrender of the fierce virginity of mind and body she had maintained in the teeth of adverse circumstances, is admirably told, as are the chapters dealing with her subsequent development, and the birth of her child. We could have wished, however, that the author could have found out another way for her social rehabilitation other than through her genius for the dance! Surely a story of the Bush should be immune from the invasion of the dancing mania! This, after all, however, is but a blemish on a finely written book, full of strong situations.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett has left the pleasant country of romance, where dusky woods slope to the high road of adventure, and has strayed into the shadow-land of fantasy, where things seen merge into things felt, and the mind usurps the functions of the senses. As ever, his style is matchless; he uses words after the fashion of a swordsman flashing here and there with his weapon, holding his audience enraptured with sleight of fence, as they watched the shimmering light play on his blade, or follow with straining eyes the sudden declension into darkness. Of the sketches in the present volume, LOVE OF PROSERPINE (Macmillan and Co., 5s)—of which the author says he cannot say whether or no they are true—the most charming is "Harkness's Fancy." The scene in the forest is almost as vivid as the immortal chapter in "Forest Lovers," when Prosper le Gai, waiting for the monk to take vengeance on the evil woman, watches the moon rise behind the trees, until he returns, to resume the fight that ends in his death! Almost, but not quite as vivid. The human element is wanting, the alluring creature of fantasy has none of the rare charm, the glamour of Prosper's child-wife. "A radiant young female thing, fiercely favoured, smiling with a fierce joy, with a set gleam of fierce light in her narrowed eyes. . . . Her hair, loose and fanned out behind her head, was of the colour of natural silk, but diaphanous as well as burnished, so that while the surfaces glittered like spun glass, the depths of it were translucent and showed the fire behind." Monstrous fine writing this, as throughout the volume, but lacking the tang of the forest, the scent of romance, that makes the author's early works so intimate a joy to read.

The issue of Messrs. Williams and Norgate's Home University Library of Modern Knowledge marks an important era in publishing. The volumes are in every case brought right up to date, and the articles are written by men in the front rank of scientific and literary attainments. Many books of reference contain much that is antiquated, and too often the information is beset with technical terms that make it difficult reading for the student. The Home Library presents none of these difficulties, and we confidently recommend it to our readers.

The Pitman centenary is to be celebrated both in London and Bath on May 23rd and 24th. Meetings will be held at Stationers' Hall, and the proceedings will be opened by speeches from well-known journalists and men of letters. In these days of rush and hurry, when letters must be written at express speed or not at all, it is as well to realise the immense debt both the commercial and newspaper world owe to the inventor of shorthand. The centenary of Sir H. Isaac Pitman promises to be a most interesting function.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

ATHENÆUM: "Mr. Wicksteed proves himself an admirable guide. He gives a good summary account of Aristotle's teaching and its varied fortunes till it conquered the schools in the middle of the thirteenth century, and received its final form, so far as the mediæval world was concerned, at the hands of Albert and St. Thomas. We can recommend it as a disinterested treatment of the scholastic philosophy of Aquinas."

SWINBURNE

AN ESTIMATE

By JOHN DRINKWATER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

MORNING POST: "From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

BIRMINGHAM POST: "Mr. Drinkwater's study of his character is one of the most illuminating pieces of modern criticism. His book is, indeed, marked with such an insight into the mind and art of a great poet as only a poet-critic is able to arrive at. Nothing fairer, truer, more interesting and enlightening has been written about Swinburne."

DREAMS AND THE WAY OF DREAMS

By R. L. HINE. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MANCHESTER COURIER: "Mr. Hine has accomplished his object and written a book of real literary merit. Every reader with imagination will find something to give him pleasure in these pages."

LONDON'S UNDERWORLD

By THOMAS HOLMES. New and Cheaper Edition, Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

STANDARD: "It is good that rare men like Mr. Holmes exist, for there are not many of us who could spend a long lifetime amongst the human wrecks of the underworld and still retain any confidence or hope in human nature. This is a book that will make people think, and, in a way, it ought to make us hopeful."

BROWNING'S SORDELLO

Being the Text of the Poem, with Introductions, Notes, and Index by the Rev. ARTHUR JAMES WHYTE, M.A.,

Clough Memorial Prizeman, Gold Medallist and Senior Moderator in History in the University of Dublin.

Crown 8vo, 7s. net. (In preparation.)

NOVELS OF NOTE

ROSALIND OF THE WOODS.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. 6s.

(Ready shortly.)

THE LOST MAMELUKE.

By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

Times.—"The tale is full of colour and episode. The torch of romance is kept bravely alight."

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS, 6s.

Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc.

Times.—"Full of a galloping movement that is over-mastering."

Morning Post.—"We recommend our readers to get the book for themselves."

Pall Mall.—"A very fine piece of work."

DAISY DARLEY; or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street,

By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily News.—"A clever, attractive book. Mr. Ryan has made a genuine success in his delightful sketches of the subsidiary characters."

PROSPECTUSES FREE ON APPLICATION.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

OETZMANN & CO LTD.

Nr. TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD, W.

Telegrams—"OETZMANN, LONDON." Telephone—MAYFAIR 101.
Stations—Met. Railway, EUSTON SQUARE; Tube, WARREN STREET.

Bedroom Suite in Solid Fumigated Oak, the same and similar to illustration, comprising Wardrobe, 4 ft. 6 in. wide over all, with drawer at bottom and shaped bevelled-edge mirror. Dressing Chest of Drawers, 3 ft. 6 in. wide, with jewel drawers and shaped bevelled-edge toilet mirror. Double Washstand, with cupboard enclosed by two doors, marble top and tiled back, and towel rail attached each end. These Suites are complete with two rush-seated Chairs. Offered for the specially low price of £9 10 0

Solid Fumigated Oak Bedstead, complete with adjustable double woven wire mattress on iron frame.

- 3 ft. 0 in. wide by 6 ft. 6 in. long £1 19 6
- 3 ft. 6 in. wide by 6 ft. 6 in. long 2 5 0
- 4 ft. 0 in. wide by 6 ft. 6 in. long 2 8 6
- 4 ft. 6 in. wide by 6 ft. 6 in. long 2 15 0

Small Overmantel to match, with shaped bevelled-edge mirror and shelf £1 9 6

COUNTRY COTTAGES
CHARMINGLY and INEXPENSIVELY
—FURNISHED.—

Illustrated "OUR COTTAGE" post free.

DELIVERY BY MOTOR 50 MILES RADIUS.

£5 PREPAID ORDERS CARRIAGE PAID ENGLAND OR WALES.

THE ROTARY CYCLOSTYLE

Gesteiner's Patent.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEPARTURE
IN DUPLICATING MACHINES.

2,000 Copies from One Original.

HANDWRITING—TYPEWRITING—DRAWING—MUSIC.

THE DUPLICATOR FOR FINEST WORK.
SPEED, CLEANLINESS, AND RELIABILITY.

Full particulars on application to—

The CYCLOSTYLE CO.,
50, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Telephone 5454 Gerrard.

Wholesale & Export: TOTTENHAM HALE, LONDON, N.

The Seal Pen is the Safe Pen. It gives you all the benefits of the fountain pen with the added virtue of being proof against leakage. You can carry it upside down or flat in your pocket.

When you bring it into use it writes right away, for the nib is always in the ink when the pen is sealed. It writes with a smooth, even flow, never doubtful, never jibbing.

The Seal Pen is made in three sizes, fills without taking apart, is fitted with a heavy 14-carat gold nib, tipped with costly iridium, and is guaranteed for two years.

Your Stationer
Sells the Seal

W. H. Smith & Son, Wholesale & Manufacturing Stationers,
Kean Street, Kingsway, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 33. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MAY 30, 1913

One Penny.

REV. R. J. CAMPBELL,
NATUS 1867

For Character Sketch, see page 261.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Portrait of Rev. R. J. Campbell | 193 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 194 |
| The New Emigration—By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P. I.— The Colonial Advertising for our People | 195 |
| From Heine. Poem—Translated by S. F. Butchart | 196 |
| Industrial Scientific Management—By Joseph Fels... .. | 196 |
| Historic Cities of the World. I.—Paris. Part II.—By the Editor | 198 |
| The Kinematograph and the Drama. From an Artistic Point of View—By Arthur Owen Orrett | 200 |
| Rev. R. J. Campbell—By E. Hermann | 201 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. "Esther Waters," by George Moore—By C. Sheridan Jones | 202 |
| The First Rung—By Munroe Clark | 203 |
| G. Bernard Shaw—By Richard Curle | 204 |
| Woman in the Financial World—By Lucy H. Yates | 205 |
| Everyman's French Page. The Death of Napoleon—By Louis Adolphe Thiers | 206 |
| Tuyet. Short Story—By Jules Claretie | 208 |
| Correspondence— | |
| The Suffrage Question | 211 |
| Another Protestant Protest | 213 |
| Canada and Canadian Policy | 214 |
| The Emigration Phenomenon | 215 |
| The Needs of the Countryside | 216 |
| Nietzsche | 217 |
| A Correction | 218 |
| "The Cloister and the Hearth" | 218 |
| The Birth of a New Civilisation | 218 |
| Books of the Week | 218 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IF we were to trust to the big headlines in the daily Press, the outstanding event of the week has been the marriage of the Kaiser's only daughter with the eldest son of the Duke of Cumberland. It is very pleasant, and indeed very romantic, to be told that the bridegroom has found a ducal crown on his dinner-plate; it is even more pleasant to be informed that the marriage marks the end of a long-standing feud between two German dynasties, and if the German people are happy in the glorification of their royalty and in the demonstrations of their loyalty, we heartily sympathise with their rejoicings. But surely at the beginning of the twentieth century it is a little late in the day to attribute such paramount importance to royal marriages. If matrimonial relations between princes could make peace between nations, perpetual peace would henceforth be assured, for in this strange political world of to-day practically all princes are closely related by marriage, and German dynasties occupy two-thirds of the thrones of Europe. With those necessary reservations, and when due allowance is made for the gushing enthusiasms of snobbism and flunkeyism, still there is one feature in the German celebrations which is of most happy augury for the future, namely, the presence of King George and his consort, and the warm welcome extended to both by the German people. This cordial reception is at least an indication that more cordial relations have taken the place of the strained relations which so recently existed between the British and the German people.

Alas! hardly is the peace with Turkey in sight, when Europe is threatened with a new war, between Bulgaria on the one hand and Greece and Servia on the other. The allies, as was to be expected, are quarrelling over the spoils. Neither Greece nor Servia will concede the lion's share to Bulgaria. Little Montenegro has been forced to surrender Scutari, but Greece will not surrender Salonica, and Servia will not surrender Monastir. As was hinted in these columns last week, there is only one way out of the difficulty, namely, the establishment of a balance of power within the Balkans. But Bulgaria, apparently, will not readily submit to such an equilibrium. The writer of these lines some years ago, in a private audience, complimented a Bulgarian Prime Minister on the prosperity of the country, which reminded him of the prosperity of Belgium. The Bulgarian Prime Minister indignantly protested, and remarked that Bulgaria did not wish to be the Belgium of the Balkans, but wanted to be the Prussia of the Balkans. Perhaps Europe has quite enough of one military power like Prussia. We do not want a duplicate of the Hohenzollern Monarchy in the south-east of Europe.

What is really the most important event of the week has scarcely been alluded to in the English papers, while it has been extensively discussed in the German papers: we are referring to the outbreak of military riots on the French frontier. We have been repeatedly told that the French people are in favour of the proposed three years' service; but the outbursts of Toul scarcely support that contention. Obviously, neither the French people nor the French army want the three years' service. Whether they are right or wrong, in view of the formidable menace of the new German military law, is another question. But the military riots on the French frontier prove at least two things. In the first place they are a final reply to the German contention that there is a war fever raging in France. And in the second place they are a convincing proof that, rather than submit to the demands of the military party, the French people are as likely to wage war against their own Government as against the Germans. And it may be suggested that if the millions of Germans who profess themselves Socialists and pacifists showed the same spirited temper as the French soldiers at Toul, the chances of international peace would be more assured than they are at present. But even German Socialists are so law-abiding and so docile that they are not disposed to rise even against unjust laws. And German soldiers are so inured to discipline and authority that no Toul incidents are to be feared in the near future.

One of the most significant incidents of the Berlin celebrations is the fact that the Czar had to travel from St. Petersburg in an armoured train, and that the best way which the Kaiser could devise to insure the safety of his guest was to drive him in his own motor car through the streets of Berlin. The incident comes as an unpleasant reminder that everything is not well in the Russian Empire. Russia is just now passing through an unexampled period of prosperity. Her industries are developing at a prodigious rate. Her exchequer is full to overflowing. Her population, which already amounts to 170,000,000, shows an unusual increase of more than 3,000,000. But, alas! it is not political liberty which is taking advantage of this phenomenal prosperity; rather is it political reaction. If the Treasury is filled to overflowing, so are the prisons. Political executions have multiplied tenfold. Will the advisers of the Czar not take warning from recent history? Whoever knows the character of the Russian people also knows that if the lessons of the last civil war are lost on the Russian rulers, a new civil war, more formidable than the first, will put an end, once for all, to the abuses of autocracy.

THE NEW EMIGRATION * * * BY L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

I.—THE COLONIAL ADVERTISING FOR OUR PEOPLE

I.

IN recent years the world has witnessed a remarkable economic and political development in the deliberate organisation of population by "new" countries. Time was when a country in the making either fought shy of immigrants altogether, or at most was content to give a cold welcome to such people as came uninvited to her shores. To-day the ambitious junior States of the world are ill-content with slow development, and they adopt commercial methods in seeking inhabitants for their wide and sparsely peopled territories. The new policy has had a profound effect upon the British Empire and upon the national economy of the United Kingdom, and it is high time that the British people took stock of the position and realised what is going on.

Broadly stated, the situation at this moment is this. Both Ireland and Scotland are losing by emigration more than they gain by excess of births over deaths. England and Wales are still increasing in population, but emigration is increasing so rapidly that we are threatened with the danger that they will follow the sad example of Ireland and Scotland.

It is not a matter of bad trade or lack of employment. Twenty or thirty years ago British emigration was often attributable to lean periods of trade. Thus, when in 1879 trade was so bad that nearly eleven per cent. of our Trade Unionists were out of work, emigration rose to 126,000 as compared with 58,000 in 1878, and in the succeeding years a population which had been visited by such bad times freely emigrated. Later on, in the 'nineties, the tide of emigration considerably slackened, and we find that in 1899, which was a year of very good trade, the number of emigrants was only 46,000, a negligible quantity in view of the fact that the excess of births over deaths at that time was over 400,000.

II.

For the years after 1900, however, there is a different tale to tell. Then began the active endeavours of Canada to obtain more people. Very large sums were voted for the purpose, expensive emigration offices were opened in the United Kingdom, and all sorts of temptations offered to British working men to desert the Old World for the New. By 1902 emigration had risen to 102,000, or almost as much as in the bad times of 1879. In 1907, which was a year of very good trade and employment, the number of emigrants rose to 235,000. But let me give the facts in tabular form to make them clearer:

EMIGRATION, 1900-1912.

| Year | Emigrants. | Year. | Emigrants. |
|------|------------|-------|------------|
| 1900 | 71,000 | 1909 | 140,000 |
| 1905 | 139,000 | 1910 | 234,000 |
| 1906 | 195,000 | 1911 | 262,000 |
| 1907 | 235,000 | 1912 | 268,000 |
| 1908 | 91,000 | | |

Observe that in 1908 there was a great slump in emigration, showing that the new emigration is not caused by bad trade. In 1907, with good trade, there was great emigration; in 1908, with bad trade and an unemployment rate of nearly 9 per cent., emigration fell to 91,000. Note, again, that in the succeeding year, 1909, with trade slightly better, emigration again increased, and that as our trade and prosperity grew in 1910 and 1911 and 1912, emigration increased enormously, reaching in the last year named the extraordinary and unprecedented figure of 268,000.

III.

The fact is that the new emigration is not a flight from bad times, but the deliberate transplanting of people who, weighing the respective advantages of the Mother Country and her Colonies, decide to seek fresh fields and pastures new. People of this mind are best able to go when trade is good, and when they can save some money to help them in their new venture. Thus, the better trade of the last few years, instead of checking emigration, has helped the efforts of the Colonial emigration agents.

In 1913 emigration is still increasing, and as far as we can judge from facts so far ascertainable, it is likely that we shall export no less than 300,000 people this year. The population of Scotland will again fall. The population of Ireland will again fall. The population of England and Wales will probably increase by no more than 100,000 people!

The point of view of the British Dominions is easily understood. Their Governments control enormous and rich territories which cry aloud for development. They occupy great areas on our maps, but in point of population they are still very small. Let us remind ourselves of the facts of the case. Here is an approximate estimate of the population of the Empire in 1911:

THE BRITISH EMPIRE'S POPULATION IN 1911.

| | |
|--------------------------------|---------------|
| (1) United Kingdom | 45,000,000 |
| (2) Self-Governing Dominions: | (Whites Only) |
| Canada... .. | 6,950,000 |
| Newfoundland... .. | 250,000 |
| Australia | 4,400,000 |
| New Zealand | 950,000 |
| South Africa | 1,400,000 |
| | 19,000,000 |
| (3) Other British Possessions: | |
| India | 315,000,000 |
| Rest of Empire | 35,000,000 |
| | 350,000,000 |
| Grand Total | 414,000,000 |

IV.

All the self-governing Dominions together are seen to possess about 19,000,000 of people, and of these only about 14,000,000 are of the white races, British or other. So far, Canada has outstripped the rest in building up a population, and that is because she was the first to lay herself out to attract immigrants. For many years Australia deliberately practised a policy of exclusion, until it dawned upon her people that that policy placed her in a position of great and growing danger. Australia is a great continent containing a mere handful of people—fewer than there are in the London County Council area—and these are very largely concentrated in two great cities, Sydney and Melbourne, which between them contain about 1,000,000 whites out of the total of 4,400,000 in all Australia! The modern Australian sees clearly that if Australia does not come to be populated by whites she will be overrun by Asiatics. This realisation has caused Australia to follow in the footsteps of Canada, and to take special steps to secure from the United Kingdom a share of her surplus population. The United Kingdom is now honeycombed with agents who advertise the Colonies after the manner of soap or whisky. I have before me, as I write, a beautiful pictorial calendar, headed "Canada: The Most Fertile Country in the World," which tells the reader in large type that he can have 160 acres of Canadian land for nothing, accompanying the offer with such alluring lines as "Free Farms of the Richest and most Productive Soil in the World"; "Free to Every Man, a Fair Chance in Canada's Golden West"; "Canada's front door is wide open to British Agriculturists. Wealth and welcome await those who come." The calendar goes on to offer descriptive literature and maps to any applicant. It gives the names and addresses of five official emigration offices in England, two in Scotland, and two in Ireland. In town and country alike it is difficult to escape this advertising. I have seen it in rural districts at the end of harvest time, and I have noted that Australia has been widely using the provincial hoardings for some really beautiful pictorial advertisements. In a recent official report on emigration, written by a special Commissioner in the United Kingdom, I see Canadian immigration expenditure described as "a National advertising bill," and the claim made that "the Dominion Treasury makes a profit on every immigrant from his arrival in the country." I believe that to be true; but what of the land which loses what Canada "makes"?

V.

We must grant that it is a happy thing for the British Empire that its far-flung territories should be peopled. The Empire must be regarded as a trust, and it is impossible to stand in the way of its development, even if we were unwise enough to wish to do so. It must also be granted that when the nation is increasing at the rate of something like 400,000 or 500,000 a year, it can well afford to spare a proportion of its natural increase in order to build up and strengthen the Britains over the Seas. There are, however, other considerations to bear in mind, both national and Imperial, and the time has come when we have very seriously to ask ourselves: has Colonial success in advertising for our people reached a point at which it has become a positive danger to the Mother Country, and therefore to the Empire at large? Our emigrants are not lost to the British Empire, for of the 268,000 who left us in 1912, as many as 219,000 went to places beneath the British flag. The issue we have to judge, therefore, is whether the Dominions are being strengthened at the undue expense of the heart of the Empire. It is a question of degree.

(To be continued.)

FROM HEINE

OH, once I dreamed of love's consuming flame,
Of myrtle, mignonette, and beauteous hair,
Of sweetest lips and wild and bitter speech,
Of gloomy songs, each set to gloomy air.

Faded and gone those early dreams long since,
And vanished even my dearest, fondest dream;
Remains to me but what in passion fierce
I poured forth once in many a moving rhyme.

Thou, orphaned song, alone thou didst remain;
Go forth now, too, my long-lost dream to seek,
And shouldst thou find the airy shade again,
A ghostly greeting from its author speak.

S. F. BUTCHART.

INDUSTRIAL SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT

By JOSEPH FELS.

A GOOD many years ago an American mechanic stated publicly that if he could have one-half of all he could save in the management of engineering and other works of which he had knowledge, he would, within twenty years, become the richest man in the world.

Since then another American—Mr. Taylor—has developed the same idea, and has produced a system which he terms "Scientific Management," under which he claims that, by the mere application of certain formulæ and rules, the cost of the production of commodities may be diminished from 30 down to almost vanishing point. This has been achieved by discovering experimentally what may be termed the line of least resistance in the production of each commodity and relentlessly pursuing it.

This system means an enormously greater output per man and per machine. It is merely the application of common sense to the methods of manufacture, and the carrying out of the fundamental principles of economic production.

It is said that the new Science is warmly endorsed by the capitalist employers throughout the United States. On the other hand, organised labour is bitterly opposed to it and regards it as Labour's inveterate enemy. Moreover, it is certain that any attempt to introduce it generally in this country, will arouse the most bitter antagonism of the Trade and Labour Unions throughout Great Britain.

And yet Mr. Taylor claims to be doing a great work for the benefit of society, and believes his system will help to unite Capital and Labour more closely. Why, then, should Labour oppose him? The subject affords a most interesting study, and a useful illustration of the essentially antagonistic elements existing in our present industrial system, which are the root causes of the seemingly eternal conflict between Capital and Labour.

The object of Mr. Taylor's science is to enable an employer to secure a much larger return from each workman and machine than at present. Consequently, the present annual output of each factory will be obtained with fewer hands and at a greatly reduced cost. The general adoption of "Scientific Management" must, therefore, result in a wholesale discharge of operatives in all industries. This is, of course, the logical end of the continued application of Science and Invention to Production, viz., the elimination of the human factor in production. From the standpoint of economic production, Mr. Taylor is eminently right, for the aim of economic production is to achieve the greatest possible result with the least possible expenditure of energy.

I.

But economic production is, after all, but a means to an end. What is this end? Selfish individuals will, perhaps, regard it as the mere making of profits, and, no doubt, under our present economic system, this end is fully attained.

On the other hand, the economist, the statesman and the humanist must take a very different and broader view. Looked at from the standpoint of social well-being, the essential object of production is the maintenance and well-being of all the members of society rather than of the few.

Now it is very certain that this object will not be obtained under present conditions by the new "Science." On the contrary, the existing inequality in the distribution of wealth would be greatly augmented.

In order to demonstrate this, let us consider the examples given in The Nation of August 3rd. According to those, the new Science is to increase the efficiency of Labour as follows:—

- (1) Bricklaying: 120 bricks per man per hour increased to 350 bricks per man per hour.
- (2) Cotton goods manufacture: Increase of output, 100 per cent.
- (3) Handling pig-iron: 12½ tons per man per day increased to 47 tons per man per day.
- (4) Machine factory work: Increase of production from 400 to 1,800 per cent.
- (5) Shovelling: 16 tons per man per day increased to 59.

Now, it is certain that wages will not be increased to anything like the same percentage as the increase in product and profit, otherwise there would be little temptation for employers to adopt the new method. In one example given in The Nation, that of "Scientific" shovelling, wages rose from $1.15 to $1.88 per day, whilst the cost of production fell from $00.72 to $00.33 per ton. But it must be remembered that although the rate of wages is increased, the number of employees is greatly diminished, so that the total sums paid weekly in wages are very seriously reduced.

Take bricklaying, for example. Here one man is to lay 350 bricks instead of 120 per hour. This is an increase of efficiency of nearly 300 per cent. On the other hand, wages, according to the example, are not likely to be increased over 60 per cent. If, therefore, the demand for bricklaying under the new system remains on an average what it is, only one-third of the number of bricklayers will be employed, and their wages will only be about 60 per cent. higher. Hence, in this particular industry, the total wages paid under ordinary conditions will be reduced from 40 per cent. to 50 per cent. In other industries the results are even more startling.

II.

It is just here that the inevitable conflict commences. Production is maintained by reason of demand, and demand is maintained by consumption. But consumption diminishes as purchasing power is curtailed, for demand can only be effective when accompanied by purchasing power. Now, the great demand for general commodities comes from the wage-earners in all countries. Hence, when the volume of wages is diminished, demand is necessarily reduced, and we are face to face with one of the most startling paradoxes presented by our economic system. The tendency of industrial efficiency is, therefore, to reduce, and, ultimately, destroy, the demand for the very things which it is its object to increase.

"Scientific Management" seems, therefore, to spell ruin and disaster to the wage-earners and to the community at large. It means that unless the demand for all commodities can be greatly increased, two-thirds of the bricklayers, one-half of the cotton operatives, nearly three-fourths of the iron-workers, four-fifths of the machinists, and over 70 per cent. of those engaged in shovelling will be thrown out of employment. But what prospects are there for an increased demand under increased efficiency? Apparently it will mean a greatly decreased demand; this necessitates our inquiring what becomes of the money which the new management is to save by cutting down the number of employees?

A Rockefeller can only eat one meal at a time, and three or four meals per day, even if his digestion permits this. On the other hand, wealth, concentrated in the hands of a few, usually leads to a greater demand for servants and members of the serving class. It must also be remembered that although the demand for motor cars and similar evidences of wealth will increase, this by no means implies an increase in the number of persons employed in such industries. The new science applies with equal force to the production of articles of luxury and ostentation as to cotton and iron goods. It seems clear, therefore, that the immediate application of the higher efficiency system will mean a wholesale discharge of skilled workmen and factory operatives, followed by an increased demand for waiters, servants, chauffeurs, butlers, footmen, and, most probably, doctors and nurses. There will also be a greater demand for members of the theatrical and music-hall professions and professional society entertainers. Evidently Mr. Taylor's new science will be of little value in these professions.

III.

It may be laid down as a principle that the physical, material and moral health of a nation is dependent upon a just distribution of its wealth, and this should be as even and as extensive as possible, consistent with the highest development of each and every member of society. Moreover, under such a system, every man would, by the mere acts of living and consuming (together with his family), create a sufficient demand for commodities as would provide himself with regular employment.

Our present economic system is absolutely opposed to this principle. It produces inequality, and breeds discord, hatred and conflict. It sets class against class. One part of the system is in direct opposition to another part. As previously affirmed, production is dependent upon demand. But demand can only become effective so long as the masses have something to purchase with. And this necessitates their sharing justly in the distribution of the annual produce.

The essay in The Nation may be divided into two parts. The first is a description of what is meant by "Scientific Management"; the second consists of a soliloquy on the results. I do not pose as an authority on slave-driving, and therefore would not object to "Scientific Management" if the result is to be greater production with no greater effort; or the same production with less effort. Henry George has put it, "Man tries to satisfy his desires by the least possible exertion." If "Scientific Management" can increase his satisfaction by saving his exertion—so far so good. But the problem will not be solved at this point. If the mass of men are merely to be regarded as wealth-producing machines, to be sifted and sorted so that only the best are to be used, and, when used, to be kept at the highest possible pitch of output, those that are not used being cast upon the scrap-heap, then I hope and believe that the mass of mankind will not stand it. A more equitable distribution of wealth will never be secured by the most scientific management of industry. Nor can we hope to establish a "high form of co-operation" between all concerned in industry such as is hinted at in the concluding paragraph of the article in The Nation, so long as the present system of unrestricted and untaxed private ownership of land is allowed to continue. That system is both irrational and immoral, and must finally give way to a true science, which will harmonise with our own science of ethics. That science will enable mankind "to produce incessantly with the least possible amount of labour the greatest possible variety and quantity of wealth," and will automatically distribute it in such a way as "to realise for each member of society the greatest amount of physical, moral, and intellectual well-being, and, for the race, the highest perfection and glory."

HISTORIC CITIES OF THE WORLD

I.—PARIS * * * BY THE EDITOR

PART II.

I.

THE Arrondissement du Temple, or the IIIrd (the Parisian generally drops the substantive, and designates the divisions of the city merely by their number), is one of the most interesting both to the student of history and to the student of social conditions. Its north-eastern extremity was the headquarters of the Knights Templars, once the proudest and richest religious Militia of Christendom, and on the same site stood the prison of the Temple, where Louis XVI. spent the last months of his tragic life. The Centre of the Arrondissement, the Marais (the Marsh), was during the seventeenth century the fashionable quarter, and its narrow streets still contain some of the finest historical houses of the city. It is quite in the fitness of things that the beautiful Hotel Carnavalet, which for twenty years was the home of Madame de Sévigné, should shelter the museum of the history of Paris—a museum, by the way, which ought to rouse the envy of all patriotic Londoners, and the extraordinary popularity of which shows how keenly the Parisians are interested in the annals of their city.

The most beautiful spot of the Marais is the Place des Vosges. For administrative purposes it is just outside the IIIrd Arrondissement, but historically it forms an integral part of it. This dignified square is almost the only part of Paris which has retained the old-world atmosphere. Planned by Henry IV., inaugurated by his widow, Marie de Medicis, it was, under the name of Place Royale, the centre of social life in the golden age of the Monarchy.

The glories of the Marais are gone for ever. The stately mansions are inhabited by the lower middle class and by artisans. Its palaces have become Government offices, like the Palais Soubise, which is now the Government Printing Works. It is a strange social phenomenon, this periodical migration of wealth and fashion from East to West, following the sun in his course. It is strikingly illustrated in the history of Paris. We see the French aristocracy moving in the seventeenth century to the Place Royale, and in the eighteenth from the Place Royale to the Palais Royal; in the early nineteenth from the Palais Royal to the Boulevard St. Germain, and finally deserting in the twentieth century the noble Faubourg for the plutocratic quarters of the Arc de Triomphe.

The Marais has become one of the beehives of Parisian labour, and many of the industries are home industries. If we could visit the humble and overcrowded flats of the IIIrd Arrondissement, we could form some idea of the skill and taste of the metropolitan artisan, which have made the Articles de Paris famous all the world over. That skill is the result of a long tradition, and it has been sedulously developed by the fostering care of the State, which has established in this neighbourhood one of the finest industrial museums of the world—Le Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers.

We have seen in a previous paper that there is no poverty in the first arrondissement. There is very little in the second. It makes its first appearance in the third. It has its chosen temple in the Mont-de-Piété, or public pawnshop. The tourist ought on no account to avoid a visit to this extraordinary place.

It is true that the conventional guide-books only make a contemptuous reference to it, but to the student of social life I do not know whether there exists any more arresting sight in the metropolis. It is true the Mont-de-Piété evokes mainly sad and sordid associations, yet I do not know where there exists a more beneficial institution in the city. Advancing loans at an interest varying between six to seven per cent, it saves hundreds of thousands of all classes from the clutches of the moneylender. I am not familiar with the private pawnshops of the United Kingdom, but I imagine that, if such an establishment were introduced in London, it would not be less serviceable. There seems to be little likelihood of our having a Mont-de-Piété on this side of the Channel in the near future. Nations are ever ready to copy their most stupid fashions, but they are often little disposed to adopt what is best in their institutions.

There are some curious aggregates of population in the IIIrd Arrondissement, such as colonies of Polish Jews, mostly cap-makers; or colonies of Belgians, largely cabinet-makers. One-third of the fifty thousand masons of Paris are also concentrated here: a formidable destructive and constructive guild, which once every thirty years demolishes the great city, to build it anew.

II.

I am not sure whether the IVth Arrondissement does not surpass all others in historical interest, for in addition to the venerable Tour de St. Jacques, erected in 1522, in addition to the wonderful library of the Arsenal, it contains two out of the three most important monuments of the capital—Notre Dame and the Hôtel de Ville.

The Hôtel de Ville has been, ever since 1789, the stronghold of democracy. To tell its history would be to tell the political history of the city, from the day when the first Commune was established during the Hundred Years' War by Etienne Marcel, the father of all modern revolutionists, down to the days when the last Commune, in a frenzy of destruction, burned the palace of the people. The Hôtel de Ville is situated in the heart of the Faubourg St. Antoine. Here the Parisians, again and again, have risen in their wrath and erected barricades against their oppressors. From here they started to storm the Bastille—which for generations stood on the eastern extremity, a grim menace to popular liberty. The square in front of the Hôtel de Ville is now one of the most spacious public spaces of the city, and commands an admirable view of the Seine and of the island of the city. It was once the sinister Place de Grève, the scene of public executions. From here Madame de Sévigné witnessed the execution of the Marquise de Brinvilliers, the most successful poisoner of all times.

The Faubourg St. Antoine is an ever-smouldering volcano, and it is not to be wondered at that the Government of the day should consistently try to curtail the political powers of the Municipality. Even under the Third Republic, the people of Paris do not enjoy self-government. And although the Mayor of Paris is not merely the ornamental figure-head which the Lord Mayor of London is, still, the reality of political power is vested in the Prefect of Police and in the Prefect of the Seine, and the doings of the Municipality are closely watched and constantly checked by the Central Government.

The historical importance of the Hôtel de Ville is only equalled by Notre Dame. As the one building has been identified with the Civic Life of the capital, so the other has been identified with its Religious Life. In the Middle Ages, as every student of Victor Hugo's masterpiece knows, the Cathedral was the heart of the city. It stood as the symbol of the omnipotence of the Catholic Church. For the Catholic Church was actually omnipotent in Paris for many centuries. We are too much inclined to think of Paris as the centre of the old monarchy. As a matter of fact, the kings never quite felt at home in the restless metropolis, and again and again they migrated to Fontainebleau or Saint Germain, to the Châteaux of the Loire or to Versailles, and the last King by right divine only re-entered Paris on a fatal day in October to become the prisoner of the people. On the contrary, the Catholic Church always did feel at home in the capital. Any map of Paris will convince us that the "modern Babylon" once was a holy city; that for ages Paris was pre-eminently a city of churches and abbeys—Abbey of St. Germain, Abbey of St. Victor, Abbey of St. Denis, Abbey of St. Martin; and that even to-day there are probably inside Paris more convents than in any other capital outside Rome or Moscow.

III.

In crossing the Seine and in passing from the IVth to the Vth Arrondissement, we enter the Latin quarter, rising on the slopes of the hill of Sainte Geneviève. After the Ile de la Cité, it is the oldest part of Paris, containing its most important Roman ruins, the remains of Roman baths in the gardens of the Musée de Cluny and the remains of a Roman amphitheatre in the Rue Monge.

If the quarter to the north of the Grand Boulevards is pre-eminently the city of pleasure, the quarter to the south of the Boulevard St. Germain is pre-eminently the city of learning. It has been so ever since the twelfth century, when Duns Scotus and St. Thomas Aquinas inspired the old Sorbonne. We see everywhere booksellers and educational institutions, cafés, hotels, and lodgings for the twenty thousand students who have gathered here from every part of the world. In the neighbourhood of the schools the many convents round the hospital of Val de Grâce, as well as the Panthéon—once the church of the patron saint of Paris, Sainte Geneviève—are there to remind us that the Latin quarter is still as much a religious as a scholastic city.

The Latin quarter is almost as cosmopolitan as the West End. You will find here colonies of North and South Americans, of Italians and Spaniards, of Roumanians and Servians, of Poles and Russians—those Russian students being mostly Revolutionists, living in dire poverty. There are several thousands of them. A few years ago the French Government appointed a professor of the Russian language in the Sorbonne. The study of Russian obviously did not appeal to the Parisian student, for, with great difficulty, the French professor could only muster a few casual hearers. One day it occurred to him that, instead of giving Russian lectures to French students, he might give French lectures to Russian students. The idea was carried out, and there was such an invasion of Russian barbarians that even the largest auditorium could scarcely hold them.

Germany might dispute the claim of the University of Paris as the first University of the West; but the Sorbonne is certainly the most democratic and the most hospitable. I wonder how many tourists are aware that they can enter the imposing pile of the Sorbonne, with its miles of corridors and its spacious lecture-rooms, and that they can attend most of the lectures, dropping in at any time and without paying a fee. Paris is probably the one place in Europe where higher education is practically free, and where you can receive gratuitous lessons from teachers of world-wide fame, whether in the fine arts or in the practical sciences or in the Russian or Chinese languages.

In the Vth Arrondissement, for the first time, we come across a phenomenon which is more characteristic of Paris than London, namely, the extraordinary interpenetration of wealth and poverty. You may have just visited a palatial building, and, in turning a corner, you suddenly find yourself in squalid surroundings. For the quarter of schools is also a quarter of slums and rookeries. The student himself, and especially the foreign student, is not generally blessed with the goods of this world, and, like St. Francis, he has taken "Holy Poverty" as his spouse. Plain living and high thinking are nowhere more frequent than in "modern Babylon." You will find in the Latin quarter men of European reputation living in garrets in which a Scottish student would scorn to live. But not only are the student colonies often poor, but they are situated in close proximity to one of the most sordid districts of the metropolis, namely, in the neighbourhood of the "Jardin des Plantes," or Zoological Gardens and Botanical Museum. There are no less than 30,000 two-room lodgings in this part, which is a striking illustration of the contrasts of Parisian life. Nothing more unlike the atmosphere of Oxford could well be imagined than the haunts behind the Panthéon. Yet I must confess that I prefer those squalid surroundings of the Parisian student to the luxurious surroundings of the Oxford student; and I am convinced that it is an invaluable discipline for the young Parisian to be thus acquainted from his earliest years with the distressing problems of modern city life.

THE KINEMATOGRAPH AND THE DRAMA

FROM AN ARTISTIC POINT OF VIEW

By ARTHUR OWEN ORRETT

THE average Englishman is perpetually bubbling over with fatuous tags intended to demonstrate his broad-mindedness. A few years ago a favourite one was, "There's many a play that would do a man more good than a lot of sermons." Now, alas! the theatre has fallen from its high estate, and one frequently hears, "There are lots of plays acted on films that are every bit as good as plays in a regular theatre."

What must be the state of mind of a man who would rather see three or four plays (and a few odds and ends) on a film than a play at a theatre? First, there is the mental confusion which must be caused by the mere number of the plots and stories. Then he must like crude and violent plays, for only great artists can write plays in dumb-show that are not crude and violent, and we know that there is not yet any demand for great artists as scenario-writers for films. The subtle conflict between the poet and the clergyman in "Candida" could not be shown on the film. If the attempt were made, the audience could not but conclude, when Marchbanks eventually stings the other to violence, that the assault was entirely unprovoked.

"Rosmersholm" on the film would be ludicrous. Yeats's "Deirdre" would be undistinguishable from Synge's, and Synge's from "A. E.'s"; all would be equally dull. "Hamlet" would be quite meaningless.

Thirdly, there is the question of the personality of the actor. The film-actor must act extravagantly in order to supply a clue to the plot in his every movement. He must do this, too, in cold blood, before the indifferent eye of the cinematograph operator. Surely never was such a nightmare! An actor sentenced to rehearsal for life, to whom the sweets of applause are eternally denied! In such circumstances, how can acting be other than mechanical? Apart from this, what amount of personality can be shown on a photograph? for the cinematograph is simply the Frankenstein of photography. One need not have a fanatical admiration for present-day actors to assert that a very great many of them have characteristics which the kinema would fail to reveal, and that we should be the poorer thereby. No kinema could portray the tempestuous power of Mrs. Patrick Campbell, or reproduce the facile grace and charm of Miss Marie Tempest.

The man, then, who prefers the kinema to the theatre cares neither for good plays nor for good acting. Obviously, therefore, the drama was crippled by his patronage, which lasted just so long as he had no other entertainment provided for him. Before the days of music-halls and cinematographs he had, of necessity, to be a playgoer, and he kept the drama down to his level. His taste manufactured vulgar acting, timid management, and vapid plays. At last the bubble burst. New avenues of amusement were found for him, and almost simultaneously plays and acting began to improve. Management naturally did not improve. Many provincial theatres practically closed their doors to drama. In fact, the drama may be said no longer to exist in any but the largest of English provincial towns. In London it is different. West-End theatre-going is a cult, and the very provincial who would not bother about seeing a play in his own town will greatly inconvenience himself in order to see the same play performed by "the London Company." London is the last citadel of the vulgarly romantic drama, and not until it falls can the dramatist start with a clean sheet.

When this citadel shall have fallen, the dramatist will be able to write for a public that delights in the dramatic art, and he will not be tempted to write down to a public to whom the theatre is a cult, a habit, a relaxation, an escape from the rain; nor, most important of all, to a public forced to witness a play through sheer lack of an alternative.

This is the way in which the cinematograph is going to help the drama—by weeding out those of its patrons who are a drag on it. The cheery optimists who maintain that the film and the stage-play will advance side by side to better things are—just optimists. The film and the drama are poles apart.

In a protest against elaborate stage-setting in the theatre, Mr. W. B. Yeats insists that each art should concentrate on its own characteristics. When the theatrical producer goes in for realism, he says, he competes with the easel-painter, and the easel-painter can always beat him, because he is practising his own art against a man whose art is something quite different, namely, the production of a picture which will have the effect of reality to a mass of people sitting around a hall. This may be an extreme view, but it is moderation itself compared with the belief that any monstrosity of the photographer's craft can portray human character and destiny with beauty and simplicity, or even with reality.

REV. R. J. CAMPBELL * * * BY E. HERMANN

It is some fifteen years ago now since Sir William Robertson Nicoll discovered in an obscurely situated Congregational church in Brighton a young preacher who had something to say on the mystery of pain—something so vital and noteworthy that Claudius Clear forthwith informed the editor of the British Weekly that this intense young gospeller with the early whitened hair and the wistful eye of grey was a man for whom the hour lay waiting. The years passed, the little backway church grew too small to hold the crowds that thronged to hear this Nonconformist Robertson, and the congregation had to migrate to a larger building. Campbell of Brighton had become a word to conjure with, and it did not take any great gift of divination to prophesy that soon Brighton would know him no more. Then the dying eyes of Joseph Parker, ranging far over all the ranks of eloquent and forceful preachers for one who might, perchance, wield the Ulysses-bow that had slipped from his hands unstrung, alighted on R. J. Campbell. Mr. Campbell was called to take Dr. Parker's place during his last long illness, and the increasing crowds that made the City Temple one of the sights of London began to buzz about its doors. When Dr. Parker finally passed into the long silence, there was no doubt in anyone's mind that the great man's successor had been found.

There is a well-known photograph of Mr. Campbell in a severe and hieratic-looking cassock, and apprehensive Puritans, looking at that harmless garment, whisper with bated breath that there was a time when Mr. Campbell had almost become an Anglican. Of Scotch descent, and born a Free Methodist, Mr. Campbell's boyhood was spent among the Presbyterians of the Black North of Ireland. In his later teens, however, he was confirmed as a member of the Church of England, and in 1891 he entered Christ Church, Oxford, with a view to taking Orders. The austere and rarefied piety of Dean Paget captivated his soul, and opened it to High Church influences. It was almost inevitable that a type of saintliness so surrendered and exalted, yet so restrained and urbane, should be a spiritual enchantment to a young soul fresh from a cruder and more turbulent atmosphere, and its influence accounts for much that is best in the Campbell of to-day. But soon a critical reading of Church history revealed to him that, whatever way his religious tastes and affinities pointed to, his convictions were on the side of the despised Nonconformists. The outcome of this was a memorable talk with Bishop Gore, extending over the best part of a day, and a sorrowful but impregnable determination that the dream of taking Anglican Orders must be abandoned. So Campbell turned his back upon the spiritual beauty of the Church of Keble and Paget, and left Oxford to become the pastor of an all but derelict Nonconformist chapel in the Church-proud town of Brighton.

To attain to anything like a just appreciation of Mr. Campbell's genius is one of the most difficult of tasks. On the surface of it, it would seem to be an easy matter to get a true and clear-cut picture of so salient and arresting a figure. In truth, it is exceedingly difficult. To begin with, he stands in a ghost-haunted place. Who that has listened with sensitive ear to the magnificent contrapuntal word-music which made up the oratory of Joseph Parker can escape the tenacious, imperious, obsessive wraith that haunts the City Temple? As one sits waiting for the preacher to begin, another voice takes up the strain—a voice of soul-shaking quality—whose thunderous pungency summons the blood and whose magic whisper spells rapture. Joseph Parker was a great preacher, not merely by right of a superb and matchless eloquence, but by the diviner right of a vision that saw deep into the dark places of Scripture and into the haunted caverns of the soul, and brought light out of darkness. The rolling music of his words was but the garment of the great creative silence where unspoken things lie warm. While the ghostly echoes of his matchless voice are still launching themselves upon the great spaces his successor begins to speak. Is he a great preacher too? His voice is spare, his delivery unremarkable. He does not enchant, beguile, entrain. It takes some time for the ghostly obsession of a greater than he to lose his grip upon one's mind. It often takes a long time before the genius of this romantic intuitionist breaks upon one's dull senses. But, once it does, there is no doubt as to the preacher's right to stand in so consecrated a place.

There is a second circumstance which makes it difficult to see the naked soul of the preacher. It is the popular identification of Mr. Campbell with the New Theology. No subscriber to cast-iron creeds has ever placed so heavy a millstone about his neck or bound himself with chains so hampering and galling as Mr. Campbell did when he wrote a book which labelled him in the eyes of a half-educated public. It is not merely that Mr. Campbell is far wiser and greater than his book. It is that his true crown does not lie in the realm of the theological discussion at all, but in the empyrean of spiritual intuition. He is not a theologian who happens also to be a preacher. He is a preacher of a certain high, rare, potent type who happens to have written a book upon theology. Dr. Parker laid it down once that every congregation is a séance. So it is, when there is a spiritual clairvoyant in the pulpit.

And, like all preachers of this clairvoyant order, Mr. Campbell cannot be interpreted in vacuo. He must always be taken in connection with that great congregation of questing and bewildered souls whose inarticulate cravings he interprets to themselves. In this preacher's voice a thousand dumb mouths find speech, a thousand secrets are revealed. And the unveiling and interpreting is not the cold accomplishment of the expert; it is the piercing insight of the loving heart. He is not a virtuoso in soul-reading; he is an enthusiast in soul-healing. Sympathy is real and vital in him. It is potent and convincing. Terrible is the loneliness of a great city. More terrible the loneliness of a God-haunted soul. Small wonder that the preacher who can walk with his hearers in those weird regions and through the black defiles of sorrow, shame and despair evokes an almost passionate admiration, an almost unreserved devotion.

A cold examination of his preaching may leave one with the Philistine's question, "Tell us wherein thy strength lieth?" Judged by formal canons, there are greater than he. Judged by depth even of psychological insight, it were not difficult to find those who excel him. But for the revealing and compelling power of a fearless and devoted sympathy, for the magic of evoking a spiritual atmosphere, of naturalising the unsewn on the hard stones of city streets, he stands supreme. His spell defies analysis. It owes nothing to oratory and little to dialectic. It is as elusive as the mist and as mysterious as the wind among the reeds.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

"ESTHER WATERS," BY GEORGE MOORE

It is surely one of the most interesting ironies of contemporary literature that the novel which, more than any other written in our time, idealises and glorifies the simple beauties and strength of motherhood should have come to us from the pen of a novelist whose genius is generally associated with works answering to the generic description of decadent. Mr. Grant Allen, one recollects, was fond of relating that, out of the many fictional efforts that won for him a wide public, one, and one only, was written to please himself, "The Woman Who Did," a disappointing work, quite the dullest he ever penned. One may be pardoned for imagining that Mr. George Moore was possibly a great deal more moved and interested by the ratiocinations and the tedious psychological analysis of the peccant but brilliant Evelyn Innes than by the sorrows of that untutored daughter of the people, Esther Waters. For our part, however, while Evelyn bores us to extinction, Esther Waters has an arresting, a compelling attraction that no other heroine of modern fiction, not even the immortal Tess, yields over us. Esther is not cast in the heroic mould. That is to say that she is not strikingly handsome, nor resourceful, still less original or clever. But the simple, awful tragedy of her life, a tragedy that thousands upon thousands of women endure, in mute sorrow and silent despair, rouses in her qualities that, for all her limitations, her frailty, her crushed and stunted nature, raise her to a height that leaves us breathless and abashed, marvelling at the great reserves of strength that a "common woman" can command.

The story of Esther Waters is an every-day drama. Esther is a domestic servant. "In grimy lodging-houses she worked from early morning till late at night, scrubbing grates, preparing bacon and eggs, cooking chops, and making beds. She had become one of those London girls to whom rest, not to say pleasure, is unknown, who, if they should sit down for a few moments, hear the mistress's voice, 'Now, Eliza, have you nothing to do that you are sitting there idle?'"

She has a sordid, a brutal home, relieved in part by the love of her mother, but rendered intolerable by an inhuman stepfather, who tells her to "get out" when she cannot find a place. At last she gets a regular situation—one at Woodview Lodge, a great house near Brighton, whose master, Mr. Barfield, a careless, rather dissipated man of the world, keeps a famous racing stable and a huge establishment, and whose wife, known as "The Saint," belongs to the Plymouth Brethren, Esther's own sect, for she is deeply religious, albeit unlettered and untaught. A lifelong friendship is born between the two women. "It was one of Mrs. Barfield's practices to have the women servants for half an hour every Sunday afternoon in the library and instruct them in the life of Christ," and in the new, strange atmosphere of the great house, given over to racing, sport, and a happy, genial profanity, Esther, alone among the servants, delights in the meetings:

"She answered her mistress's questions in sweet light-heartedness of spirit, pleasing her with her knowledge of the Holy Book. But in turn the servants had begun to read verses aloud from the New Testament, and Esther saw that her secret would be torn from her. Sarah had read a verse, and Mrs. Barfield had explained it, and now Margaret was reading. Esther listened, thinking if she might plead illness and escape from the room; but she could not summon sufficient presence of mind, and while she was still agitated and debating with herself, Mrs. Barfield called to her to continue. She hung down her head, suffocated with shame of the exposure, and when Mrs. Barfield told her again to continue the reading Esther shook her head.

"Can you not read, Esther?" she heard a kind voice saying; and the sound of this voice loosed the feelings long pent up, and the girl, giving way utterly, burst into passionate weeping. She was alone with her suffering, conscious of nothing else, until a kind hand led her from the room, and that hand soothed away the bitterness of the tittering which reached her ears as the door closed. It was hard to persuade her to speak, but even the first words showed that there was more on the girl's heart than could be told in a few minutes. Mrs. Barfield determined to take the matter at once in hand; she dismissed the other servants, and returned to the library with Esther, and in that dim room of little green sofas, bookless shelves and birdcages, the women—mistress and maid—sealed the bond of friendship which was to last for life."

Mrs. Barfield teaches her servant to read and much else; but, alas! there soon comes an end to their friendship. It is a strange environment that the young girl, with her simple tastes and primitive faith, is thrown into, with the little jockey boys, who look so ugly and ill-fed, and who talked, as did all the servants eternally, of odds and races; but she was happy.

"The simplest human sentiments were abiding principles in Esther—love of God, and love of God in the home. But above this Protestantism was human nature; and at this time Esther was, above all else, a young girl. Her twentieth year thrilled within her; she was no longer weary with work, and new, rich blood, filled her veins. She sang at her work, gladdened by the sights and sounds of the yard: the young rooks cawing lustily in the evergreens, the gardener passing to and fro with plants in his hands, the white cats licking themselves in the sun, or running to meet the young ladies who brought them plates of milk."

Thus her life passed—until the man entered. William Latch is the son of the austere old housekeeper, who is "down on" Esther at first, but learns to treat her kindly even when her graceless scamp of a son, who has disgusted her by taking a groom's place at Woodview, repeats to Esther an old story.

"In the evenings when their work was done, Esther and her lover lingered about the farm buildings listening to the rooks, seeing the lights die in the west; and in the summer darkness about nine she tripped by his side when he took the letters to post. The wheat stacks were thatching, and in the rick-yard, in the carpenter's shop, and in the whist of the woods they talked of love and marriage. They lay together in the warm valleys, listening to the tinkling of the sheep bell, and one evening, putting his pipe aside, William threw his arm round her, whispering that she was his wife. The words were delicious in her fainting ears, and her will died in what seemed like irresistible destiny. She could not struggle with him, though she knew that her fate depended upon her resistance, and, swooning away, she awoke in pain, powerless to free herself. . . . Soon after thoughts betook themselves on their painful way, and the stars were shining when he followed her across the downs, beseeching her to listen. But she fled along the grey road, and upstairs to her room."

It is easy to guess the sequel. William does not stay at Woodview, and when the hour of trial comes, poor Esther is turned out, her kind mistress giving her a reference. The child is born in the lying-in hospital, which Esther leaves almost penniless and unfriended, her mother dead, her family gone to Australia, and with scarcely a soul in London to help her.

The chapters that follow are incomparably the greatest in the book. They tell with wonderful force and convincing realism of poor Esther's desperate straits and still more desperate struggles. Sometimes without a crust, sometimes without a shelter, she fights on for the sake of her child, working hours at the wash-tub, acting as wet nurse to a rich lady's child when her own lies ailing, with her past always cropping up to be flung in her face, but still taking courage to endure. The events, perhaps, are very trite; the narrative has been rehearsed a thousand times by all sorts and conditions of women. But it is a great one all the same. All the cruelties, all the sordidness, all the mean suspicions of our civilisation, are brought out in the telling; but Esther triumphs over them all.

After many vicissitudes, she secures a good place with a considerate mistress, and the child thrives and is well. More, Esther is even engaged to a pious young man, who condescends to overlook her past, when—she meets William! At first she repulses him. Then the old love returns. She listens and relents, accepts his excuses, and a little later they are made man and wife, and ensconced in possession of an old-fashioned public-house down Fulham way. William makes a good husband, for the carelessness of youth has left him, and he really loves Esther, who for the first time in her life tastes real happiness, despite the fact that her life soon brings her in contact with some of the worst results of betting and gambling, which are depicted with extraordinary skill.

The King's Head is a racing "pub," frequented by punters, bookies, jockeys—all the embodiments to Esther of evil and destructive forces. But she has her husband and her boy, and she is happy. Very beautifully indicated is her placid love, which redeems the breezy squalor of the "public." A little later that refuge is lost to them. William has to become a book-maker himself, and shout the odds on the course. Still Esther is happy. Those she loves best in the world are with her, and, like a true woman, that contents her.

But the happiness does not last long. William falls ill, ails for months, then dies, and poor Esther is left again penniless, to provide for her boy as best she can.

She goes back to Woodview, now stripped of its former glory, to live alone with her old mistress, and to help her lad, who has a situation in London—a dull, drab life, and yet made glorious by the fact that it was consecrated to one supreme object—an object brought home to us with irresistible force by the last picture with which the work closes. Esther and Mrs. Barfield are waiting, waiting outside the house for someone they are expecting, waiting for Esther's son:—

"A tall soldier came through the gate. He wore a long red cloak, and a small cap jauntily set on the side of his close-clipped head. Esther uttered a little exclamation, and ran to meet him. He took his mother in his arms, kissed her, and together they walked towards Mrs. Barfield. All was forgotten in the happiness of the moment—the long fight for his life, and the possibility that any moment might declare him to be mere food for powder and shot. She was only conscious that she had accomplished her woman's work—she had brought him up to man's estate; and that was her sufficient reward."

It is on that note that the book closes, and we end it feeling that, in an age which has deafened us with its assertions of every phase of feminine aberration, it has been a great thing to have met, even in fiction, a true woman, faithfully portrayed.

THE FIRST RUNG

By MUNROE CLARK.

THE night before, he got out his new things, gave an extra twist to his home-made trouser-press, and went to bed dreaming of managing directorships and the majestic solitude of the manager's office. He woke early, very early. But he got up straight away, wrestled with the press, and was pleased, on the whole, with the knife-edge crease it had produced.

At breakfast he read the football page with the air of a Sultan, and when his Big Sister stood by his side to serve the bacon he engrossed himself in the "On 'Change" column, oblivious of the wink she passed on to her father.

When it was time to go he took down his soft felt hat—a bowler, he had thought, proclaimed "office-boy" to every casual passer-by—and, with an airy "So-long," shut the door quickly after him in order to get away from the salvo of "Good lucks" which had so much annoyed him when he was taking his exams.

He would not take a car. No, he wasn't going to start that game: so he stepped out, and tried to look as if he had been at it for years, and was quite hopelessly bored. He was annoyed when he found he had arrived a quarter of an hour too early, and was just going off for a stroll when the "cleaner" came along and unlocked the door for him.

"Are you the new young gentleman, then?" asked she, in a motherly tone. This touched him on the raw. Without answering, he looked around him with a critical air, as who should say, "This doesn't seem as decent a hole as my last place." The woman regarded him with a smile, a suggestion of which he just caught.

"Lor' bless yer! the freshness'll soon wear off," she said.

After a morning of humble initiation, he came home with a rush, ate a huge dinner, and ordered two cups of coffee. Over these his mother ventured that he was "launched into the battle of life."

"Oh, cut the sentiment, please!" he implored, and just then the Big Sister came in.

"Well, how's things, kid?" she flung at him, whipping out innumerable hatpins.

"His Lordship does not desire his affairs to be discussed," said Mater.

The Big Sister thought a moment.

"Why, of course not, if you will keep sentimentalising," she said, for she knew her mother.

Then Pater ventured that "it was evidently a naval battle," and was promptly sat on.

"Well, anyhow," said Mater, "you've got to work now—a sight harder than you did at school."

He arrived at the office five minutes late. Going to his desk he picked up some papers with an air of nonchalant interest, and looked up at his neighbour.

"Anything fresh?" he asked in a blasé tone.

"Here, take these letters to the post, and get five shillings' worth of penny stamps," said that gentleman with a frown.

And in the evening he called for Someone, and they went to the Pictures. Now, Someone understood, and he didn't mind telling Her his inmost thoughts. She could sympathise with him, and didn't seem at all bored at his recital of hopes and prospects.

When he had seen her home he went back to supper. Pater glanced at his watch as he came in, and he sat down at the table, which everybody had already left.

Then he went upstairs to the trouser-press.

G. BERNARD SHAW * * * BY RICHARD CURLE

OF all claims to distinction, perhaps Mr. Shaw would cherish most that of being a middle-class Socialist. For it is this attitude which permeates his work, an aggressive attitude that will not be gainsaid, and will not let you take it for granted. Mr. Shaw has the pugnacity of a prophet who must be telling you home-truths lest worse should follow. He is violently dogmatic against all forms of dogma, or, as he himself puts it, "The golden rule is that there is no golden rule." That is all very well, but what is to prevent one questioning the first golden rule? This is just the sort of pitfall one must beware of in reading Mr. Shaw. He is so keen, able, and pellucid that one is apt to take his assertions as indisputable facts rather than as mere statements of opinion. He is invigorating because he is so reasonable. Not outwardly emotional, he has really a wide sympathy for unhappiness and failure. He is not at all a sentimental English democrat like Mr. Chesterton—he would argue that the main reason why poverty and misery should be abolished is that they are bad for society. He is the logical extremist, but he is too much of the Fabian to carry all his convictions into practice. The result is that he gives one a sense of caution in the midst of his fiery language. He can write "The Revolutionist's Handbook," but he would never dream of being a revolutionary.

This is decidedly a long preliminary to a short discussion of Mr. Shaw's work, but really it is necessary to clear the ground. For Mr. Shaw's plays are almost as much pamphlets as works of art. He has Ibsen's habit of formulating his own theories in the guise of universal problems, but he has not Ibsen's power of high and bitter seriousness. Or, rather, one feels that his seriousness is always being masked under a sardonic mantle, as if he knew that to be openly grave would be the end to deep gravity of purpose. However that may be, his plays do lack the final impressiveness of obvious sincerity. They are too "smart," too breathless in their witticisms. And, for some reason or other, they have a horrible trick of sinking into sheer buffoonery.

I.

The truth is, brilliance is a curse to a literary man—it is the whisper of the devil, the most subtle and irresistible of temptations. These scintillating writers are for ever spoiling their work by mannerism and artificiality. Mr. Shaw, for instance, like Mr. Chesterton, cannot escape from his own riotous personality. He repeats himself in a hundred transparent disguises. His characters do not, by any means, lack every atom of reality as do the characters of Mr. Chesterton, but, on the other hand, they lack a great deal of the reality which they ought properly to have. Take, let us say, Major Barbara ("Major Barbara"), Ann, Tanner, 'Enery Straker ("Man and Superman"), Lady Cicely ("Captain Brassbound's Conversion"), Raina, Bluntschli ("Arms and the Man"), Valentine, the old waiter ("You Never Can Tell"), Charteris ("The Philanderer"), Candida ("Candida"), are they not one and all of them close relations of Mr. Bernard Shaw? Of course they are! That is why they are so sparkling, so unexpected—and that is why they are so unconvincing. There is an elf-like quality in Mr. Shaw's figures, a quality of surprise which is charming and yet enervating. But his technical ability is so pronounced, his skill in dialogue so finished, that he does convey an air of considerable reality. And that is not all. He has a conception of personality up to a certain point, but it is a conception that generally suggests a problem—one of Mr. Shaw's problems. His people and his plays soon bore one, just as an argument soon bores one. They only live in the light of crises or polemics—they are without the calm force of ordinary and passionate existence.

II.

One of Mr. Shaw's main dislikes is romance—romantic love, and so on. It is hard to say how far this is an inherent distaste for sentiment, and how far it is merely a reasoned fear of the emotions. It is not savage, like the sex-hatred of Schopenhauer or Strindberg; it is mocking. Mr. Shaw despises the vast influence of such fleeting desires, their vast and ill-regulated influence. And yet theoretically distrustful of marriage, he is, practically, in its favour. There comes in his common sense, overriding the ardent dreams of the perfect Socialist. He has grasped human nature sufficiently to realise its usual limits, to realise its slow progress, its ingrained, indestructible instincts. And, in spite of his sneers, he does comprehend the tragic force of love, though he may bewail its futility. The passionate scenes in such plays as "You Never Can Tell" and "Man and Superman" are actually passionate. Suddenly the bantering tone drops, the lovers look at one another with real, burning eyes. It is in scenes like these that Mr. Shaw shows us power, as apart from infinite nimbleness.

III.

This cleverness of his has, naturally, its points, though, on the whole, it strikes one as so misguided. It gives his work ease, variety of situation, a polished atmosphere. The Ireland of "John Bull's Other Island" does appear quite as Irish as the Ireland of Synge's plays; the Bulgaria of "Arms and the Man" does suggest the savage feeling of the Balkans. Mr. Shaw is, indeed, a distinguished and conscious artist, and, if he were only less of a wit and less of a pamphleteer, he would be still more of an artist. For it is not that he impresses his personality on his work (everyone does that), which is so damaging, but that he impresses his idiosyncrasies, his eccentricities, his crotchets. No doubt he has built up his huge and enthusiastic public on them, but, in the end, they will do him immense harm. Already he strikes one as being old-fashioned. He keeps on destroying dead things, of discussing settled issues. The rebellious daughter has had her day; marriage is no longer looked upon as divine in itself. It is quite true that it is probably Mr. Shaw's teaching that has brought about much of this change, but that is not the point here. The point is, that it dates his work, so to speak, and makes it dusty. Moreover, he is still, in each new play, thrashing out the same problems. But we want something else. Stories of true passion are never old because they are always repeating themselves, stories with actual vitality are never old because people don't really alter in most things. But who cares for Peacock's tirades against paper money? And soon all these designing and emancipated females of Mr. Shaw's plays will share a similar fate. They will die from inanition, they will die because no one will be able to understand the hubbub they caused. Thus will Mr. Shaw's glory as a pioneer dim his fame as an artist.

IV.

In criticism Mr. Shaw is often very astute. His connection with the Saturday Review as dramatic critic gave him a practical knowledge of the different schools (you can read a selection of his weekly articles in two volumes); his book on Wagner proves that he is a student of music; his book on Ibsen proves that he is a student of literature. And yet his criticism is too clever and concise to be satisfying. It has the dazzle of a piercing light, and some of its hardness. Nevertheless, Mr. Shaw is singularly just. A great many people have fallen foul of him owing to his remarks on Shakespeare, quite misreading what he has said. No one better than Mr. Shaw realises the supreme beauty of Shakespeare's language, and no one is more disgusted at the fulsome praise that has been poured on everything Shakespeare ever wrote. There, once again, Mr. Shaw is helped by his common sense. He will not have Shakespeare paraded as a demi-god. It is a reasonable attitude.

But I must stop. Much remains to be said which has to be left unsaid. For the very mention of Mr. Shaw's name is sufficient to call up a whole range of subjects which it would require a volume to deal with.

WOMAN IN THE FINANCIAL WORLD

By LUCY H. YATES.

"OF honourable women not a few" the City of London may make proud boast. But while she owns a steadily growing army of moderate wage-earners, who fill in the great mesh of industry with a network of fine threads, any of which, if taken individually, may seem of slight value, but which, taken collectively, represent a vast sum total of labour and of money, some few of her women workers stand out above the rest for character and achievement, for singularity of position or boldness of enterprise. And among these none are more noteworthy than the handful that have invaded the financial world, and whose success has amply justified their venture.

I.

By virtue of singularity alone the one woman stockbroker should take premier position among the women of the City. It is perhaps rather strange that while there is nothing in the business of stockbroking that is beyond the ability of any well-educated woman to grasp, and while many women have a distinct liking for finance and figures, there should be still only one name to place under this heading. True, women are excluded from membership of the Stock Exchange simply by reason of sex; yet, by dealing on half-profits through others who are members, it is quite possible to make a very excellent business and income, and the work is agreeable, if responsible.

Twenty-five years ago one woman courageously embarked in an attempt to compete on this veritable Tom Tiddler's ground, with quite a small capital, and she has retired from the field with an excellent reputation and with profits that are by no means despicable, to be succeeded by another woman, who holds her position still without a rival. In the case of Miss Bell, the pioneer, natural aptitude and undoubted capacity made for success in the face of keen competition, while she had the great advantage of an education that in many respects would have been exactly the same had she been of the other sex. In the case of

Mrs. Brooke, her successor, the advantages are a social connection among influential people which ensures her a clientèle to begin with, and the ground already prepared and made ready for her by Miss Bell's industry, not to mention the aid of a secretary, also a woman, whose knowledge of markets and of the whole business of stockbroking and insurance can be equalled by few men.

Mrs. Brooke, speaking of her business at the present time, says, "There is an interesting career in the financial world for women. They have more intuition than men, and, as a rule, are more persuasive and more inclined to put themselves in the place of their client. They are not lacking in caution, and are quite able to make as good bargains. My experience is that women are more disposed to gamble than men, and on that account, as a stockbroker, one needs to be level-headed. Of course, I am greatly handicapped in not being able to work directly with the Stock Exchange, and in having to employ others who are members to act for me." In spite of handicaps, however, Mrs. Brooke admits that she is flourishing, and that her business is increasing apace.

II.

The one woman stockbroker has for near neighbour in the City an almost equally busy lady who is a fully qualified chartered accountant. But accountancy has for years attracted women as a profession, and Miss Harris Smith is by no means alone in her glory. They are rarer in the City, it is true; but when we move out on to the Strand and westwards, we find several who have established themselves, and done so well that they have been able to make a competence and retire to enjoy it. Since they have been admitted to examinations and degrees on the same terms as men, the profession will, in all likelihood, continue to attract girls and women who have the mathematical gift. While waiting for clients, the accountant generally fills in time and adds to her income by taking pupils.

III.

While a few banks employ women in behind-the-scenes work, only one bank exists as yet for the transaction of business among women, managed and staffed entirely by women. This is a branch of Farrow's Bank, established some three or four years ago in New Bridge Street. Its first manager, Miss May Bateman, was much liked, and spoke of her work as being in every way identical with that of the ordinary bank, and her salary as comparing well with that paid to men for the same services.

Her successor, Miss Kate Reilly, had previously held a Government post and been for some twelve years in the counting-house of a newspaper office, where all the cheque transactions passed through her hands. The position in this case requires not only a good knowledge of money dealings of every kind, but a good general all-round knowledge of market movements and investment business, as the manager of a woman's bank is, or so it seems, expected to be able to give advice on matters other than banking pure and simple.

Not so directly concerned with finance or accounts as the women whose names have just been mentioned, but occupying positions unique for influence, are two others—Mrs. Shelley Gulick, who is inspector of agents for the great Commercial Union Assurance Company, and whose services are remunerated precisely as if she were a man, and Miss E. Brodstone, of the Union Cold Storage Company, whose work is, I believe, to a large extent at least, honorary.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

THE DEATH OF NAPOLEON * * * BY LOUIS ADOLPHE THIERS

(Concluded.)

LA fin d'avril était arrivée, et à chaque instant le mal devenait plus menaçant et plus douloureux. Napoléon prenait de temps en temps quelques gouttes d'une eau fraîche qu'on avait trouvée au pied du pic de Diane, dans la position où il aurait voulu que sa demeure fût placée, et il en ressentait un peu de bien. "Je désire, dit-il, être enterré sur les bords de la Seine, si c'est jamais possible, ou à Ajaccio dans l'héritage de ma famille, ou enfin si ma captivité doit durer pour mon cadavre, au pied de la fontaine à laquelle j'ai dû quelque soulagement." On le lui promit avec des larmes, car on ne lui cachait plus un état qu'il voyait si bien. "Vous allez, dit-il à ses amis qui l'entouraient, retourner en Europe. Vous y reviendrez avec le reflet de ma gloire, avec l'honneur d'un noble dévouement. Vous y serez considérés et heureux. Moi je vais rejoindre Kléber, Desaix, Lannes, Masséna, Bessières, Duroc, Ney! . . . Ils viendront à ma rencontre . . . ils ressentiront encore une fois l'ivresse de la gloire humaine." Le 1 mai l'agonie sembla s'annoncer, et les souffrances devinrent presque continuelles. Le 2, le 3, Napoléon parut consumé par fièvre, et en proie à des spasmes violents. Dès que la souffrance lui laissait quelque répit, son esprit se réveillait radieux, et il montrait autant de lucidité que de sérénité. Dans l'un de ces intervalles il dicta, sous le titre de première et seconde réverie, deux notes sur la défense de la France en cas d'invasion. Le 3, le délire commença, et à travers ses paroles entrecoupées on saisit ces mots: "Mon fils . . . l'armée . . . Desaix. . . . On eût dit à une certaine agitation qu'il avait une dernière vision de la bataille de Marengo regagnée par Desaix. Le 4, l'agonie dure sans interruption, et la noble figure du héros parut cruellement tourmentée. Le temps était horrible, car c'était la mauvaise saison de Sainte-Hélène. Des rafales de vent et de pluie déracinèrent quelques-uns des arbres récemment plantés. Enfin le 5 mai on ne douta plus que le dernier jour de cette existence extraordinaire ne fût arrivé. Les officiers anglais placés à l'extérieur recueillaient avec un intérêt respectueux ce que les domestiques leur apprenaient des progrès de l'agonie. Vers la fin du jour la douleur s'affaissant avec la vie, le refroidissement devenant général, la mort sembla s'emparer de sa glorieuse victime. Ce jour-là le temps était redevenu calme et serein. Vers cinq heures quarante-cinq minutes, juste au moment où le soleil se couchait dans des flots de lumière, et où le canon anglais donnait le signal de la retraite, les nombreux témoins qui observaient le mourant s'aperçurent qu'il ne respirait plus, et s'écrièrent qu'il était mort. Ils couvrirent ses mains de baisers respectueux, et Marchand qui avait emporté à Sainte-Hélène le manteau que le Premier Consul portait à Marengo, en revêtit son corps, en ne laissant à découvert que sa noble tête.

Aux convulsions de l'agonie, toujours si pénibles à voir, avait succédé un calme plein de majesté. Cette figure d'une si rare beauté, revenue à la maigreur de sa jeunesse et revêtue du manteau de Marengo, semblait avoir rendu à ceux qui la contemplaient le général Bonaparte dans toute sa gloire.

Le gouverneur, le commissaire français voulurent repaître leurs yeux de ce spectacle, et montrèrent devant cette mort aussi extraordinaire que la vie qu'elle terminait, le respect qu'ils lui devaient.

THE end of April had arrived, and every moment increased his danger and suffering. Napoleon was relieved by occasionally drinking some drops of fresh water brought from the foot of the peak of Diana, the spot where he had wished to have a dwelling erected. "I wish," he said, "if it is possible, that I should be buried on the banks of the Seine, or at Ajaccio, in my family domain, or, should my body be fated to continue a prisoner, at the foot of the fountain whose waters have afforded me some relief." This his friends promised with tears, for they no longer concealed from him a state he so well understood himself. "You will return to Europe," he said to those surrounding him. "You will return bearing with you the reflection of my glory, with the honour of your own fidelity. You will be esteemed and happy. I go to meet Kléber, Desaix, Lannes, Masséna, Bessières, Duroc, Ney! They will come to meet me. They will experience once more the intoxication of human glory." On the 1st May the agony seemed to commence, and he was in constant fever, and suffered from continual spasms. Whenever his sufferings abated, his mind was as radiant as ever, and he spoke with clearness and serenity. During one of these intervals he dictated, under the title of first and second reverie, two notes on the defence of France in case of an invasion. On the 3rd he became delirious, and amid his ravings, these words were distinguishable: "My son! The army! Desaix!" It would seem as though he had a last vision of the battle of Marengo recovered by Desaix. The agony continued during the whole of the 4th, and the noble countenance of the hero was terribly distorted. The weather was terrible; it was the bad season at St. Helena. Sudden gusts of wind tore up some of the planted trees. On the 5th May there was no doubt that the last day of his extraordinary life had dawned. The English officers, assembled outside, listened with respectful interest to the accounts the servants gave of his agony. Towards the decline of the day his life and sufferings decreased together; the cold extending from the extremities became general, and death seemed about to seize his glorious victim. The weather had become calm and serene. About a quarter to six, when the sun was setting in waves of light, and the English cannon gave the signal for retiring, those around the bed perceived that the patient did not breathe, and cried out that he was dead. They covered his hands with kisses, and Marchand, who had brought to St. Helena the cloak the First Consul had worn at Marengo, laid it over his body, leaving only his noble head uncovered.

The convulsions of the death agony, always so painful to witness, were succeeded by a majestic tranquillity of expression. That figure, so wondrously beautiful, now restored to the slenderness of youth, and clad in the mantle of Marengo, seemed to present again to the witnesses of that touching scene General Bonaparte in the meridian of his glory.

The governor and the French envoy wished to feed their eyes on this spectacle, but showed all due respect in presence of a death that was as extraordinary as the life it terminated.

"EVERYMAN" CONTINENTAL TOURS

Unique Holiday Announcement

ARRANGEMENTS MADE FOR OUR READERS' BENEFIT.

Continental Travel is no small part of the mental equipment of the cultured man or woman. To wander along the streets of an unfamiliar city—to stand for the first time amidst the solemn grandeur of a range of mountain peaks—to discover the traces of History in ancient Towns and time-worn Buildings—to note with interest and delight the difference in the customs, language, thought and sentiment of nations—these are but a few of the factors which combine in making a Continental Holiday one of educational value and mental improvement.

A holiday amidst the glorious mountains and valleys of Switzerland; in the picturesque valleys of Normandy; in quaint Holland, gay Ostend, or the picturesque Ardennes; in the gay cosmopolitan capital, Paris—this is the Programme for the readers of EVERYMAN.

Who has not longed to spend a holiday abroad? To acquire the culture that travel alone is able to impart? To charm the senses with all the delights it offers? To wander in strange and wonderful countries, seeing new scenes and participating in new experiences?

THE INFLUENCE OF TRAVEL.

Few there are who wholly realise how travel stimulates the imagination, broadens the outlook and enriches the mind. Only those who have visited foreign lands know of the real enjoyment that this detachment from the ordinary affords.

It is often imagined that the expense of a Continental Holiday is beyond the resources of an ordinary purse—that there will be difficulties because the tourist does not speak the language of the country he wishes to visit—that there will be harassing worries about tickets, trains, hotel accommodation and the hundred and one details which beset the traveller.

It is because "EVERYMAN" realises all this that we have arranged for our readers' holidays on the Continent on new and unique lines, bringing travel and all that travel means within the reach of every reader. In arranging these tours in conjunction with a Private Touring Company infinite pains have been taken to plan and arrange for the complete enjoyment of every tourist who comes with us; we shall regard you as our guests and try to perform all the courtesies and attentions that a host owes to those he entertains.

A REAL, HAPPY HOLIDAY.

Our conductors are courteous English gentlemen (not mere guides) whose aim is to enable you to get all that a holiday abroad can offer. They strive to make the tours the most enjoyable holidays; drives, river trips, visits to world-famous places of interest, and over all that spirit of comradeship that makes a holiday so much more than a time of mere sight-seeing. We promise you a really happy holiday with congenial friends, and at charges that are exceedingly moderate.

Everything will be done for you, down to the smallest detail, and our inclusive charge covers everything.

We extend to you a very hearty invitation to come with us, and offer you the choice of many charming tours.

"The travelled mind is the catholic mind, educated from exclusiveness and egotism."

The culture and breadth of outlook that travel gives is so marked that it is esteemed as the greatest of all educators as well as the purest of all joys.

"EVERYMAN, I WILL GO WITH THEE, AND BE THY GUIDE,
IN THY MOST NEED TO GO BY THY SIDE."

For the Forthcoming Season we have arranged many very interesting "Everyman" Tours.

- A Fortnight's Conducted Tour to the Cities of Historic Flanders and the Valleys of the Belgian Ardennes*, with visits to every place of interest in Bruges, Ghent, and Brussels; a Trip to the Field of Waterloo; Excursions to Antwerp and Tervueren; Steamer Trips on the River Meuse (the Belgian Rhine) to Dinant and Hastiere; a Visit to the marvellous Grottoes of Han; Drives through the Valleys of the Meuse and Lesse. The entire inclusive cost amounting to no more than 8½ guineas.
- A Fortnight's Conducted Tour to Rouen and the Valley of the Seine and Paris*. A Tour of unique interest, combining the fascination of a Mediæval Town with beautiful River Trips on the River Seine, and a week in gay, laughing Paris.
- A Fortnight in Lucerne and Grindelwald*, with ten magnificent Excursions—perhaps the finest and most comprehensive holiday to be obtained in Switzerland.
- A Fortnight's Tour to Montreux-Territet*, on the lovely Lake of Geneva close to Byron's Castle of Chillon, and in view of the famous snow-capped Dents du Midi.
- A Fortnight's Tour to Territet and Chamonix*, with nine Excursions. This Tour provides a delightful contrast between the picturesque Town on the Lake and the Mountain Valley of Chamonix, nestling beneath the shadow of the Mont Blanc Range.
- A Week's Conducted Tour to Holland and the Zuyder Zee*, the country of which the Dutch boast that "God made the sea; we made the land"—the quaint, curious little country teeming with historic associations, whose towns and people offer unique attractions for the Tourist in search of the quaint and picturesque.

These and many more equally absorbing holidays have been arranged by EVERYMAN with a special regard for our readers' particular tastes. In spite of all the advantages over the usual "Conducted Tours," our exceptional facilities enable us to take readers on our Tours at exceedingly moderate rates, so much so that an EVERYMAN holiday on the Continent will actually cost you less than a holiday at an English resort.

THE "EVERYMAN" HOLIDAY BOOKLET.

We have prepared a special Illustrated Holiday Book containing all particulars of our Tours and all prices. A postcard brings you this choice little book, which contains a fund of information and some delightful views.

As only a limited number of tourists can be taken, early application for the book is essential. Address:

The Tours Dept., "EVERYMAN,"

Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

TUYET * * * BY JULES CLARETIE (of the Académie Française)

The incidents in this charming story took place during the Paris Exhibition of 1889. The Tonkinois, subjects of the French Republic, caused great interest to visitors to their native village in the Exhibition by their strange appearance, their native huts, pagodas, etc.—Translator's note.

I.

"So Paris is fine; it pleases you, eh?"

The little boy from Tongking, shaking his head affirmatively, smiled sweetly and knowingly, and showed on his yellow face very white teeth, free from betel-nut; and, repeating what he had just said, "Yes, Paris is fine, very," it seemed to me that fairy visions were passing over his dark and deep-set eyes, like fleeting images in a dark room. What he had seen of Paris was little, however; houses, and more houses; streets, heaps of stones hurriedly observed through the window of a facre; some churches, the gilt cupola of the Invalides, which rose up close to the Tongking village, erected for one summer on the Esplanade. Round this bit of land, where bamboo huts recalled the houses of his native land to him, he also saw the crowd of Parisians incessantly moving, visitors, Cockneys, foreigners—the human tide moving along with a noise like a rolling wave. . . .

It was while buying a dish encrusted with mother-of-pearl at one of these little stalls in the Tongking village that I first saw him. Two people were seated behind the counter; he and a poor, dull-eyed fellow, very thin and sad, with teeth much blackened by the eating of betel-nut, who did not know a word of French and looked at the passing crowd with melancholy visage.

As I was about to pay for the dish, I perceived in a corner a porcelain bowl which seemed curious, and which I took up to examine. . . .

"That is a test cup," the child said, "and it tells a story."

I looked at the little boy, who seemed disposed to chat, and who, in his quaint accent, in which the French "r's" were pronounced with difficulty, the letter "r" not being known in his language, said:

"Oh, yes, sir, it is a legend." This little fellow, who, with eyes on a level with his head under a low-crowned forehead, resembled vaguely those Chinese or Japanese babies that the Japanese curiosity dealers sell, seemed to me as wise as a rabbi when he added:

"The fisherman on this bowl is Lee Mong. Since he was six he had been fishing in the River Qui-Son. While fishing he meditated and had attained to supreme wisdom." (I smiled.) When he was ninety-eight the Emperor asked Lee Mong if, instead of always fishing in the River Qui-Son, he would not help him to govern mankind."

"Men are more difficult to catch than fish," I said. Without answering my remark, he continued:

"Lee Mong, the fisherman, became a great man, and, when 128, he died by drowning with the third Emperor of China."

"Was he drowned by accident?"

"By accident."

"And did he govern mankind well?" The child smiled.

"As to that, sir, I do not know. I have told you what I have been told," and he remained dumb, like a guide who has rattled off his tale.

"How much for the bowl?" I asked.

"Two francs—but," he added, "that is not my business."

And as I tendered him the money, Linh (that was the child's name) said in a tone of pride in refusing it, and pointing to the dealer crouching in the corner: "He sells these things. I am the interpreter."

What! Interpreter at fourteen years of age? Functionary, and paid by France! Paid to translate to his countrymen the foolish questions of the visitors! This child, the only tie which bound together these poor foreign workmen who had been brought from the other end of the world to amuse an idle crowd curious to have a nearer view of a people dressed in black gowns, with their hair rolled up under woollen turbans! Yes, little Linh had come from afar. He had crossed the ocean and slept for days and nights on a big ship. He had been enrolled almost like a soldier and received eighty francs per month, which he would draw in a lump sum when he returned. . . . His father, the honest silk merchant of Hanoi, had said, "It is good, very good, that our children should travel. Linh will grow learned. He will see the French at home, who are a strong race, stronger than ours . . . and when he comes back he will fill a position in the service of the Resident-General!"

II.

The noise of Paris had at first deafened Linh more than the noise of the ocean, but, little by little, Paris attracted and charmed him, seeming to the child an enormous toy, a paradise of stone. He had been to the top of the pagoda of Angkor in the Exhibition, and from there, as if from the crow's-nest of a ship, he had looked at Paris, so big, with so many steeples, towers, gilt crosses, which sparkled. . . .

Every fortnight since the opening of the Exhibition Linh wrote a long letter to his parents at "Hanoi, on the border of the lake, near the cocoa-tree." He wrote it at night in his cabin, when silence had fallen on the Exhibition grounds and the bugle of the spahis had sounded "Lights out"; in the cabin in which, cross-legged, Buddhist priests traced out prayers. He told his mother, father, and sisters about all the beautiful things he had seen in Paris. . . . But, in the succession of marvels that Paris revealed to him, something was lacking to his insatiable curiosity. . . . It was that astonishing, unknown, and fairy-like thing about which he had heard so much, which nobody at Tongking, neither his father nor his father's father, had ever seen: snow, tuyet, the white snow which changed trees, fields, houses, and dwelling-places into marble landscapes. The snow! He had often dreamt about it in his little home at Hanoi, and when looking at engravings in French books, at the coloured pictures in Japanese albums, his infantile eyes had remained abstracted before this exquisite whiteness spread over roads and on the mountains. "Tuyet!" . . . To see the snow falling was Linh's incessant longing. If one asked him if he was happy in Paris he would say, "Yes, sir; yes, madam;" but if one asked him, "What would you like to see very much?" a lightning glance would shine in his yellow eyes, his laughing lips would droop as if made suddenly sad by an unrealisable dream, and he would timidly reply, "Tuyet! Tuyet! To see the snow!"

* * * * *

"Sir," he said to me one day, with his bright smile, and somewhat mockingly, "Do you know, I think I shall see it."

"See what?"

"The snow. Yes. Tuyet! I have written to my parents to let me remain in Paris. Either I shall go to the colonial school in Paris or I shall remain as interpreter in the office of a mercantile agent who has a shop at Hanoi and knows the Resident-General very well. He has promised to speak to the Foreign Minister, to the Secretary of State, and, if my parents are willing" (he had a loving smile on his face at this point), "if they will let me—and they will—I shall see it. I shall see—the snow!"

III.

The Exhibition was nearly over. Those summer months, full of fairy-like enchantments, had gone quickly. The people from Java wrapped themselves in thick woollen cloaks, and no longer walked about with bare feet. The little dancing-girls from Kampong looked, wrapped in their shawls, like adders buried in woollen blankets. The east, the extreme east on the Esplanade, grew a sad, shivering, and a frozen east. And now the cold blasts of November made the draperies of the recently opened pagoda flap. Linh now wore over his black dress a sort of double cloak of green silk, very warm, and, as it rained sometimes, he always went about under an umbrella almost as big as himself, and of which he seemed very proud—an umbrella a hundred times finer than was sold at Hanoi, a French umbrella, with which he would make himself look fine in the rue Jean-Dupuis or the rue du Cuivre.

Oh, no! he was not going back to Tongking yet. He should remain in Paris. . . . His parents had not yet replied to his request to stay, and if the answer did not arrive in Paris before the date of the departure of his companions, he would be obliged to leave Paris with the priests. I learnt three days afterwards that a scheme to give his companions the slip was already at work in Linh's brain, and that one morning, when the roll-call was made of native workmen, priests, and interpreters who were to take train and depart, Linh did not answer to his name. He had gone off in any direction in which his steps led him in Paris. His heart certainly beat; he was a bit afraid to find himself alone, lost in the streets of Paris, among all those unknown people, of whom some in fun called out to him, "Ching! Ching!" He asked himself what was to become of him. Suddenly the idea occurred to him to seek a shelter at the commission agent's who wanted to keep Linh and to take him as a clerk in his business. Yes, that was what he would do. He called a cab.

"Rue des Petites Ecuries, No. 10," he said. M. Lecrosnier, the agent, was much astonished to see the child arrive at his office. He, with sweet naïveté and his smiling frankness, told him of his adventure. He had let the others go without him . . . there was not another boat to Hanoi, and nobody would wish him, little Linh, to go all alone. So he remained.

IV.

He went into the commission agent's office, and, at the end of a week, the little yellow-skinned boy from Tongking, as a strange Parisian clerk, was unrecognisable as the boy in the Tongking village. He remained bent over ledgers with green leather backs and red labels. He had divested himself of his Asiatic dress, his long robe, his black turban and white trousers, and he now dressed like everybody else. . . . At times Linh felt a sad longing to see his home again, where his comrades who had but lately left him had now arrived. His sisters wrote to him. Tung, one of these, always asked, "Well, are you happy? Have you seen the snow yet? Can you tell us what it is like when you return?" Linh smiled. No, he had not seen it. He was in despair. Had he not been told that some winters no snow fell? There was fog, yes, a yellow and depressing fog, which seized one by the throat, like a marsh miasma, but no snow.

"Tuyet! Tuyet!"

Perhaps he would not see it. The cold was sharp, however, and, worse, damp and unhealthy. Little Linh slept on the top floor in a well-furnished room, light and bright, which his employer had had arranged for him. At first he was happy and free, being able to think, to dream at his ease, and to sleep in a good French bed. But now at night he felt slight shivers, and it seemed to him as if something like a dry hand pressed upon his neck. He coughed a little and breathed at times with difficulty. Now he shivered, and, next, he was stifled by the heat of his white sheets.

"Are you ill, Linh?" M. Lecrosnier asked him.

"No, sir; oh, no!"

He did not dare to say he was unwell. . . . He feared lest he should be sent to Tongking like a useless cask; yet, perhaps, at the bottom of his heart, a secret wish to leave began to take shape. His master, who heard him cough, was not without his fears. The child was brought down to sleep in the agent's own bedroom. A doctor was called in, who pronounced it bronchitis, which, owing to the bad time of the year, might take a malignant turn. Linh got thin, and grew sad; his frail body was shaken badly by fits of coughing. He kept to his bedroom, and was forbidden to leave it. . . . How long the days seemed to the little sick boy! Certainly Mme. Lecrosnier came from time to time to see and console him and speak to him like a mother. But her visits were short, and reminded him only of that other mother who was far away. Mme. Lecrosnier grew anxious about his health. The bronchitis increased, and all remedies failed. He smiled when told he would soon be better, and said:

"Yes, I know. What I require is my native sunshine!"

He no longer wished to see the snow, but the sun of Asia, which produces big fruit and such beautiful flowers. But still the dream persisted in this soul in a sick body. Growing worse from day to day, he had taken to his bed, and when he had been a whole day in it he said, with his mocking smile, very softly:

"Oh! I shall not see tuyet."

Little Linh had guessed right. The doctor grew anxious, wished that spring would come, so that the child might be sent home. . . . But the illness had gone too far; the cough was racking and fever continuous.

"Still," Linh said, always smiling, "if I could but have seen the snow! It must be so beautiful!"

One morning Mme. Lecrosnier bought him a paper-weight on which, in a glass bowl, was shown a cardboard picture painted white and cut out to represent a snowy landscape. The child took the bowl in his burning hands and said:

"It is nice to the skin! 'Tis cold!"

"Reverse it," said Mme. Lecrosnier.

"So!" said Linh.

He then beheld on this landscape light specks, quite white, which moved about the bowl like atoms. In the landscape there was such a little being, a monk, who was quite white, and standing under a pine-tree still green. The pine-tree and the monk were almost hidden by these white flakes, which raced about as if possessed as Linh shook the bowl.

"That," said Mme. Lecrosnier, "is the snow!"

"That? Tuyet!" Linh looked, was interested, amused, and delighted. Why did they not give him

SCIENTIFIC CONCENTRATION IS THE LOWEST PRICED HIGH GRADE

Course of Mental Training in the World.

There is nothing to touch the Concentro Course—"Scientific Concentration," either in lowness of price, or in the practical, all-round character of its Instruction, among systems of High Grade Mental Training. It stands alone, and is making its influence felt in every part of the civilised world. It affords a Complete Training in Attention, Observation, Memory, Habit & Will-Power, & Thought-Control

It enables you to (1) work quicker, to banish Worry, Self-Consciousness, Mind-Wandering; (2) to speak well, and play well, in Public; (3) to think better; (4) to play games of skill such as Golf, Tennis, etc., with greater efficiency. EVERYTHING is better done by its aid. Send to-day for Free Booklet, and the Finest Testimony you have ever read, to the Concentro Co., 46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

I have it

I have found it. The fountain pen that's right at the business end. The pen that is built for service. The pen that makes writing a pleasure — and "filling" an almost instantaneous process. For simplicity and celerity you should have one.

THE W.H.S. PEN

The W.H.S. Pen is self-filling — certain in service — instantly responsive to the touch. It is guaranteed for two years, and is made in three barrel shapes and twelve patterns of nibs. Every hand suited. The nib is of 14-carat gold, iridium tipped.

Ask to see the New Model—No. 2

3'9 Of Your Stationer 3'9

Refuse substitutes. Accept only the pen with the W.H.S. on the barrel this to take home on the day he had run away so as not to return home? It was really very pretty, all this whiteness, this race between the white flakes and the little man covered with snow, whose black dress reminded him of his priests' dresses. . . . That day and on following days he remained in bed, turning and reversing his glass ball and watching the snow falling. . . .

"Linh is beyond recovery," said the doctor one morning in despair.

"Beyond recovery?" said Mme. Lecrosnier, and it seemed to her as if something was being taken from her that was hers.

V.

Linh, however, pretended he was not ill. He only said he should like to sleep for a long, long time. He was tired. He did not wish to get up or go out. But one morning he uttered a shout of joy, a shout which stopped short in his ulcerated throat. He raised himself on his elbows and pointed with his thin arm to the white roofs and venetian shutters opposite covered with snow. It had fallen in the night, and was still snowing a little, its white flakes flying about in the wind, and sometimes sticking on the sick boy's windows, as if to show itself and say, "Here I am!"

"Tuyet! Tuyet!" and he was so happy, saying over and over again the same word. "Tuyet!" . . .

All day, while the snow fell, Linh lay in bed with his head turned to the window, his little head in which the yellow tints had grown paler, with eyes wide open and a slow, painful breathing between his dry lips.

"How pretty, how beautiful it is!"

Yet he had a vague feeling of regret and deception, and his thoughts were far away in the land where the bamboo-trees sang at night and where snow was unknown. He saw again, in a confused vision, in a feverish hallucination, the little house at Hanoi and his people seated on mats round a smoking teapot, which also sang like the bamboo-trees; and he heard his mother and sisters talking about him to his father, who did not answer: "When will our Linh come home? Do the French mean to keep him?" And suddenly it seemed to Linh that the bright vision faded, blotted out by a cloud, hidden from sight by the white flakes which flew about like a whirlwind.

Then the thought occurred to Linh that snow was white, like a shroud. . . . A shroud! And, during the drowsiness that falling snow induces, Linh heard distinctly the sound of a hammer on the other side of the street. The packing-case maker went on nailing his boxes, and Linh, without seeing them, guessed what they were, with their inscriptions: "Bahia," "Costa Rica." And he also, like a case left to its fate, would be nailed down in a case of light wood, to carry him away, as he knew the dead were carried in Europe, in a long box. Then a shiver shook his frail body, and fear seized upon him.

"Not that! Not that!" he would cry, and his voice, almost voiceless, could not make itself heard. That noise, the sound of the hammer, and those light cases terrified him. The doctor looked on the scene, and Mme. Lecrosnier stood beside him, very pale.

"Hanoi! Hanoi!" the child muttered in a voice already from the Beyond, from the snowless land to which his soul was winging. "The lake! the cocoa-tree!" Once again he said, "Tuyet!" and, seeking in a mechanical way for something near him, his hand met Mme. Lecrosnier's, which was trembling. He took it, pressed it, tried to lift it to his lips; then he let his weary head fall on the white pillow, and, with great tenderness, he seemed to fall asleep, to expire, saying in a whisper, which a phantom might have heard:

"Mama!"

There was snow on the windows of the cold room next day, and the crystals, sticking to the panes, looked like strange, white, fixed eyes looking at Linh, laid out on his bed, still with a smile on his closed lips; little Linh carried off by a breath, like a flake of snow borne upon the wind, the snow—his waking dream!—
Translated by Frank Weaver.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is curious that so clear-minded a writer as the author of "Some Thoughts on the Suffrage Question" should open her article in the way she does. In the last sentence of the first paragraph she refers to "those of the statesmen who have allowed the action of a few thousand out of the millions of women in the country to change their views on this important question." There is clearly a confusion of thought here—these statesmen have not changed their views on the question of women's suffrage—they have merely changed their tactics (or their policy) for the time being. It is surely high time the militants were taught that the Government is not to be coerced into granting them the vote because of their violence and impotency. Even were it obvious that the majority of the women of this country were in favour of the enfranchisement of women, it would still be an egregious act of political folly to surrender to the hysterical band of female firebrands at the present time. Every man knows that, in his dealings with the opposite sex, sooner or later there comes a time when his will has to be enforced, and what obtains in the social relations of the sexes has its analogy in the body corporate today. Whatever the merits of "The Cause," the law and order of the country must be preserved at all costs; otherwise what guarantee can there be for the future that similar methods of rapine and outrage will not be employed to further causes of questionable worthiness?—I am, sir, etc.,

E. P. THOMAS.

Chinley, May 24th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your contributor, Miss (I presume) Shillito, like all other contributors to the Press, decries militancy. How is it that a defence of the militant so rarely appears in the Press? I have been driven to the conclusion that the lack of such defences is the result of deliberate suppression.

Will you allow me to ask your readers two questions?

Firstly, what has militancy done for the cause of women's suffrage? Seven years ago the question of women's suffrage was merely an interesting one to be discussed at debating societies; it was never mentioned in the Press, and was regarded with amusement in the House of Commons. Now it is in the front rank of political controversy, every newspaper gives the latest news of the movement, and even devotes posters to it, and the discussions on it in the House are carried on in a most serious and sincere manner.

When we think that for fifty years constitutional

FOOT'S

ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

Automatic Adjustable Back.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Swift

Sure

Are your Summer Clothes in perfect order? If not, Achille Serre can make them so.

Light Suits, Flannel Suits, Trousers, Hats, Sweaters—all can be made spruce and smart by Achille Serre. In Four Days, and for the modest charge of 3/9, we will clean a complete suit; remove all stains, creases and marks of wear. It is astonishing what a transformation we effect, you must send a suit to realise it.

Write for new book, "Modern Beau Brummels." The cover is reproduced from a fine water-colour by WILL HOUGHTON, and the letterpress is illustrated with clever pen-and-ink sketches by "THEORPE." The book contains much useful information in an interesting form and is well worth keeping.

A postcard brings it.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3110 East.
Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

MAGMILLAN'S LIST.

VOL. III. JUST PUBLISHED.

Trans = Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By SVEN HEDIN. Vol. III. With Illustrations and Maps. 8vo. 15s. net.

*. * Previously published, Vols. I. and II., 30s. net.

Lore of Proserpine.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. 5s. net.

The Globe.—"This extraordinarily fascinating book."

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Inside of the Cup.

By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Richard Carvel," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

A Prisoner in Fairyland.

(The book that "Uncle Paul" wrote.) By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Father Ralph.

By GERALD O'DONOVAN. 6s.

Church of Ireland Gazette:—"Mr. O'Donovan's novel is one of the most important published in our generation. . . . No one who wishes to understand the true inwardness of Roman Catholicism can afford to pass this book by; it is filled with penetrating insight. Moreover, it is written in a spirit of the deepest reverence. As a story it is so fascinating that we have read it twice, and intend to read it again—and again."

SALE NEARLY 5,750,000 COPIES.

Mrs. Henry Wood's Novels.

Cloth, 1s. net per vol. May be obtained at all Booksellers', where a list of the 37 stories may be seen.

SIXPENNY EDITION.

Divine Transcendence and its Reflection in Religious Authority. An Essay by J. R. ILLINGWORTH, M.A., D.D. 8vo, sewed, 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

AN ARTIST in 12 lessons. If you wish to learn to draw humorous pictures, book illustrations, cartoons, posters, etc., in 12 lessons, write for prospectus "E." Describes our new system, also course for beginners. —Northern School Press Drawing, Westhoughton, Lancs

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

HOW TO WRITE SALEABLE "FICTION," by the Literary Agent, who sells MSS. to over 150 Publishers and Periodicals. Strongly recommended by Editors. Syllabus free.—G. Magnus, 115, Strand, W.C.

CONCENTRATION: THE MASTER KEY.

Positively worth £100 to anyone fired with ambition.

Clear, Powerful, Practical, Scientific. Nearly every course on Concentration has lacked the one thing to make it of real value to the reader—the preparation of the mind, which has been fully dealt with here. The most practical and helpful of the many Self-Help through Self-Development courses issued by the Talisman people. It will double your mental capacity and ability. Send 2s. 8d. to-day direct to methods have been used, we must admit that the question has been brought to the forefront by militancy. I believe that militancy has increased the number both of pro's and of anti's, but that the former have increased far more rapidly than the latter.

THE TALISMAN OFFICE, HARROGATE.

Secondly, what is militancy?

It is an effect, and to cure an effect the cause must be removed. The cause is a great injustice, and therefore let those of us who cannot see eye to eye with the militants, neglect militancy, and say, "We are to-day breeding in Britain a type of woman who, for some cause or other, rebels against law and order. Let us remove the cause."—I am, sir, etc.,

South Kensington.

S. F. CAMPBELL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I find it impossible to resist the temptation to point out to your readers some of the points on which I consider the writer of "Some Thoughts on the Suffrage Question" in your issue of to-day has come to incorrect conclusions.

It is doubtful whether or not she suggests in her first paragraph that millions of the women in the country are in favour of the suffrage being extended to them; but it is the only hint she makes as to what proportion of the population of this country, male and female, are in favour of women's suffrage.

The weakness of the cause hangs almost entirely on this fact, that it is only supported by a very small minority in all classes, but especially is this so in the working class. I quote the following facts from an edition of the Manchester Evening News, which appeared while the last Woman's Suffrage Bill was before Parliament. A postal canvass of men and women voters was taken in March last in two Parliamentary constituencies, i.e., N. St. Pancras (Mr. Dickinson's) and Worcester (Mr. Goulding's):—

| | Total Electorate. Men and Women. | Replies. | |
|--------------------|----------------------------------|-----------------------|----------|
| | | For Woman's Suffrage. | Against. |
| N. St. Pancras ... | 9,524 | 1,119 | 3,387 |
| Worcester ... | 10,022 | 1,204 | 4,070 |
| | Women Electors on Register. | | |
| N. St. Pancras ... | 1,172 | 200 | 378 |
| Worcester ... | 1,622 | 307 | 588 |

It is needless to add comment to these figures, and hardly necessary to point out that those in favour of the extension of the suffrage would be the most likely to reply.

According to these figures, the extension of the suffrage to women is most certainly not a democratic step, nor can any academic argument or justice make it democratic; Mr. Belloc very rightly corrects the war cry to "Votes for Ladies."

To add but one more comment, may I ask, sir, what is this White Slave Traffic of which we hear so much? Is it some new and growing evil for which women hold a quick and certain remedy (which for some reason is not disclosed)? or is it an old crime which all righteous men have hated since and even before the time of David, and which is a source of dread to the fathers of families (who, by the way, have the vote)?

I should like to add many further comments, but, instead, must apologise for taking such liberties with your valuable space, and conclude by pointing out that perhaps the wisdom of Gamaliel has not been lost on certain statesmen who consider that the violence of its own partisans is already overthrowing this work of man.—I am, sir, etc.,

C.

Marple, May 23rd, 1913.

'ANOTHER PROTESTANT PROTEST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Adverting to the letter written by the Rev. F. Docker, I firmly hold the opinion that throughout you have been as scrupulously fair as is humanly possible. I am a Protestant, and I appreciate the Reformation at its full value. The case Mr. Docker cites is admittedly difficult—he urges one side, and you have stated another, and I am not sure that the matter deserves any further notice. His point is that you are discrediting Luther's character, the Reformation and Protestantism, but I fear he fails to prove his assertion. Let me hint that we cannot afford to be dogmatic, because the facts of history are not sufficiently numerous, nor are we adequately acquainted with the human motive or the purpose of God behind them—we need "mehr Licht," and to drop your paper and warn one's friends will not help to bring it.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. D. S.

London, N., May 24th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As a reader from the beginning, I was truly sorry to read the very unwarranted explosion in EVERYMAN of the 23rd inst., by the Rev. F. Docker, on your casual remarks in the excellent articles on "Liselotte" re the peculiar matrimonial episodes of the sovereign Electors of Hesse and the Palatinate: you only used the one to illustrate the other, and left the undoubted facts to speak for themselves. Every honest man regrets the complaisance of such a great man as Luther. The times were difficult, and Luther's back was to the wall, and he could not afford to quarrel with an important champion, or, at least, a reliable supporter. The more's the pity. These Electors were decent men, compared with a "Bluebeard" like our Henry VIII., who can only be called a royal ruffian of the worst type, pace Mr. Froude!

No doubt the Pope would have willingly helped Henry to get rid of Catherine, but he stood in awe of her nephew, Charles V. His Holiness was in the same tight corner as Luther! If you'd been the partisan, the rev. gentleman hints, or more than hints at, you might have also reminded us of Calvin's ever-to-be regretted and dastardly conduct re burning of poor Servetus, and sundry other lapses of the reformers, but you were not on the war-path to expose the reformers or anybody.

Let us not be hard on these poor Electors and their lapses, as the best of us are warped and even cruel when our own sweet inclinations are in question! Witness the deplorable bias of the great and good John Milton, who contended in his strange tract, "Tetrachordon," that he, a private scholar, could, ipso facto, divorce his vagrant wife on some-like modern American complaints and trivialities; in a word, to whittle away the law of Moses and the express and emphatic declaration of Christ Himself! All honour to the Church of Rome for still, in this weak and flabby age, resolutely standing up for the solemnity of the marriage tie, unless when concussed by royal power.

Pray go on and prosper with your clever and original EVERYMAN—a real new departure in high-class cheap literature. I hope that the rev. gentleman will think better, and continue a reader, if he wishes, like your humble servant, his views enlarged.—I am, sir, etc.,

PRESBYTERIAN.

Norham-on-Tweed, May 24th, 1913.

Cambridge Manuals

General Editors: P. GILES, Litt.D., and
A. C. SEWARD, M.A., F.R.S.

Price 1s net bound in cloth; in lambskin 2s 6d net

TEN NEW VOLUMES

61. Bees and Wasps. By O. H. Latter, M.A.
62. Submerged Forests. By Clement Reid, F.R.S.
63. Wireless Telegraphy. By Prof. C. L. Fortescue, M.A.
64. The Wanderings of Animals. By Hans Gadov, M.A., F.R.S.
65. Beyond the Atom. By John Cox, M.A.
66. Mysticism in English Literature. By Miss C. F. E. Spurgeon
67. The Theory of Money. By D. A. Barker
68. English Monasteries. By A. H. Thompson, M.A.
69. Plato: Moral and Political Ideals. By Mrs. A. M. Adam
70. Copartnership in Industry. By C. R. Fay, M.A.

When ordering it is sufficient to denote by its number the volume required. A prospectus, giving a complete list of volumes now published and a list of volumes in preparation, will be sent post free on application to M. C. B. at the address below.

Cambridge University Press
Fetter Lane, London

THE ART OF PIANOFORTE PLAYING

By VINCENT JACKSON and
EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN

A New and Systemised Method of
Pianoforte Instruction, to be completed in 4 parts at 2s. 6d. net each.

Parts 1 and 2 now ready.

TIMES

"Its author has conceived the admirable notion of teaching the elements of form and harmony simultaneously with those of pianoforte playing."

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

THE CITIZENS' CHARTER. A Scheme of National Organisation.

To Grant a Charter of Citizenship. To Collect National Information.
To Prevent Crime and Disease. To Simplify Elections.
To Ensure Proper Appointments to Public Offices.
To Effect Economies in Legislative and Administrative Action, Etc., Etc., Etc.

By CHARLES E. INNES.

PRICE 3d.

POST FREE. 4d.

THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, Ltd., 30, Blackfriars St., Manchester.

PHOTOPLAY WRITING.—The New Art. Plots criticised and re-constructed into approved scenario form by Conductor of Scenario Page in Cinema.—Particulars stamp, E. A. Dench, 54, Lr. Thames St., London.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready. Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost. Gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

SHORTHAND.—A SCHOOLMASTER'S EXPERIENCE: "We are still using Sloan-Duployan. Our boys like it, and after a few weeks' practice are able to do fifty words per minute for five consecutive minutes. I admire the system and recommend it to all whom I meet."—From Mr. J. J. McCorry, Methodist College, Belfast. SLOAN-DUPOYAN Shorthand is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for free illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

A Book for Every Lover of Swinburne.

SWINBURNE

AN ESTIMATE

By JOHN DRINKWATER

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

Morning Post.—"From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

Birmingham Post.—"Mr. Drinkwater's study of his character is one of the most illuminating pieces of modern criticism. His book is, indeed, marked with such an insight into the mind and art of a great poet as only a poet-critic is able to arrive at. Nothing fairer, truer, more interesting and enlightening has been written about Swinburne."

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Docker seems still to cherish the somewhat antiquated idea that in matters of religious controversy it is not historical truth which matters so much as which side you happen to be on. Perhaps the rev. gentleman will be kind enough to tell us upon what ground, as a Christian minister, he regards the marriage of Philip of Hesse as otherwise than bigamous? Or perhaps he will furnish us with proof positive that the principle of the Reformation was anything but that of "Cujus regio, illius religio."

No, sir, I venture to say that in these days it is impossible for any man, of whatever religious creed he be, to boldly adopt a brief in toto for whatever leader has ever professed his faith. Truth is of more importance than partisanship, and facts will help a true cause more than any amount of special pleading. EVERYMAN is a real live paper, therefore Mr. Docker must expect that it will treat of these questions not from the standpoint of "what is most convenient from this or that point of view," but from the standpoint of "what is historical fact, so far as ascertained to this date."

I have carefully read this excellent and valuable paper since its first publication, and I have failed to notice the "equally unfair ways" in which Protestantism or anything else is discredited in its columns. Perhaps Mr. Docker will substantiate this accusation if he can.—I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN B. HOWARD.

N. Brixton, S.W., May 24th, 1913.

CANADA AND CANADIAN POLICY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his article on "Canada and Canadian Policy," Mr. Bridle, in his antithetical statement regarding the attitude of the Liberal party in Canada in 1899 and 1913, makes an egregious blunder, surely. He says: "In 1899 the Liberals sent Canadian contingents to the South African war—to crush a people who desired a certain kind of autonomy." That statement might be pardoned in a superficial student, but in a person who seems to speak with the weight of personal contact with Sir Wilfrid Laurier it betokens a wrong reading of fairly recent history. One cannot recount the causes that led up to the Raid, and later to the war, but nothing can be clearer than that both were, in a large measure, due to the blindness of the rulers of the Republic in basing their political existence upon flagrant injustice to the majority of white men in its borders. In its way the Boer Republic was as corrupt as Turkey, and it tried to maintain the country as a closed corporation against those who, by every moral right, ought to have shared in equal privileges, since they contributed the largest amount of its wealth. Readers of the life of Cecil Rhodes (as delineated by Sir Lewis Mitchell, Sir T. E. Fuller, and Phillip Jourdan) will have been struck with the herculean efforts made by the great Englishman to get the Republic to work on common lines with the other South African countries. He did not want to interfere with the internal economy only in so far as it inflicted, by a process of vindictive discrimination, grave disabilities upon the British Colonies and against all white men who were not burghers.

There was no intention to crush a people who believed in autonomy. Before the Raid, Mr. Lionel Phillips, in a speech at the opening of the Chamber of Mines, said, "All we want in this country is purity of administration and an equitable share and voice in its affairs. Nothing is further from my heart than a desire to see an upheaval, which would be disastrous from every point of view." (Cecil Rhodes. Fuller. p. 192.)

Cecil Rhodes tells us distinctly that "the Republic was not to be overthrown. A conference was to be called, the High Commissioner to be the convener. The independence of the Boers was to be guaranteed in return for redress of grievances" (Life by Sir Lewis Mitchell. Vol. II., p. 144).

Every fair and peaceful method was tried to obtain equal justice; the Raid showed that force (the last appeal even of civilised man) was liable to be resorted to in the event of continued failure, but Kruger refused to read the signs of the times. Against men of political insight, like Joubert and others of like mind, he stood stolid for unyielding and corrupt administration. In this no doubt he was aided and abetted by a European power. For at a speech on the Kaiser's birthday Kruger used these significant words: "I know I may count on the Germans in future. . . . I feel certain that when the time comes for the Republic to wear larger clothes Germany will have done much to bring it about! . . ." At length came the day when the Transvaal appealed to the sword, to the arbitrament of battle. So it was not "to crush a people who desired a certain kind of autonomy" that the Liberals of Canada sent to South Africa their flesh and blood, but for the overthrowing of a corrupt oligarchy who had become blinded to the great principles of justice and equal treatment, and had had the brazen effrontery to invade the land of its suzerain power.

If Mr. Bridle calls the adherence to the violation of all moral bases for a civilised state "a certain kind of autonomy," then his little analogy between 1899 and 1913, when Canadian Liberals, "for the sake of their interpretation of autonomy," resist the Naval Bill, becomes the merest trifling with words and the great principles which those words express. It is certainly unworthy one who poses as a guide in the creation of public opinion.—I am, sir, etc.,

LEWIS DAVIES.

Merthyr Vale, May 19th, 1913.

THE EMIGRATION PHENOMENON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your note, on page 162 of the issue of May 23rd, you strike a pessimistic note ("ominous" is your word), for which I contend there is no justification in the facts, and you lead your readers to false inferences which may be mischievous. They may be mischievous because they lead to the formation of a public opinion which may be mistaken, and therefore unwise in legislative effect. It is true that hundreds of thousands are emigrating to our Colonies. But how otherwise are our Colonies to develop? Would you have the Colonies peopled by foreigners rather than by Britishers? And do not our children who go to develop our Colonies open up new markets for our manufactures and new resources for our succour?

The President of the Local Government Board recently stated that in the last decade the reduction in mortality—the saving of life—in this kingdom had equalised the loss in population sustained by us through emigration. So Old England is not "going to the dogs," apparently, though thousands of its sons and daughters are going to the Colonies.

There are doubtless isolated and antiquated districts, in which enterprise has been non-existent, which are losing their population to the Colonies, but what matters that? In Lancashire and Yorkshire and South Wales particularly—to my knowledge—there is a great dearth in houses suitable for the industrial classes. There are more people than there are houses available. At least this proves that the Old Country

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

A NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE."

The New World of the South: Australia in the Making.

By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D., Author of "Fights for the Flag," "Nelson and his Captains," &c. With a Portrait of Captain Cook. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Athenaeum.—"Dr. Fitchett's vivid style is too well known to need description; he has made good use of his opportunities in the present book."

Scotsman.—"Dr. Fitchett's narrative reads with a lively, briskly-moving and adventurous interest, like a good novel. The book is sure to be popular."

Socialism Rejected.

By BERNARD SAMUELSON, Large post 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"J." : A Memoir of John Willis Clark, Registry of Cambridge University.

By Dr. A. E. SIMPLEY, F.R.S., Master of Christ's College, Cambridge. With a Portrait. Large post 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [June 4

NEW 6s. FICTION.

The Dominant Race.

By W. H. ADAMS, late District Commissioner Gold Coast Colony.

Barry and a Sinner.

By JOHN BARNETT, Author of "The Prince's Valet," "Eve in Earnest."

The Secret of Sarm.

By the Hon. H. B. MONEY-COUTTS and W. R. MACDONALD.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

Try this test

Placing the point of a Walker's Wedge-Lock pencil firmly on the paper, make the hand vibrate, and notice how the lead remains rock steady. Can you do this with any other propelling pencil?

Walker's
Wedge-Lock
Pencils

have a propelling lead which is as steady as a cedar wood pencil. Handy for the pocket. Made in black vulcanite.

Sold in three sizes by all Stationers.

1/- 1/3 1/6
Write for illustrated leaflet No. 5 and name of nearest dealer to

JOHN WALKER & CO., Ltd.,
Farringdon House, Warwick Lane, E.C.

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A Remarkable Offer.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vambery, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"'Chambers's Encyclopædia' has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

A FREE BOOK.

TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, Post Free, and without any obligation on my part, Illustrated Booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

.....

flourishes. And then look at the Trade Statistics, and the Savings Banks records, and the new Investment returns, and the small margin of unemployment.

There is need for reform in many directions. But do not let us embark upon it on false or mistaken premisses, lest evil result where good was intended. Rather let the people know "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."—I am, sir, etc.,

J. REDMAN ORMEROD.

Liverpool, May 25th, 1913.

THE NEEDS OF THE COUNTRYSIDE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your observations on the needs of the countryside as to Church work seem so sympathetic and apposite that I am tempted to a remark or two thereon.

Residence of many years in a large town, with its advantages of organisation, prepares one to a comprehensiveness of outlook and a degree of optimism in these matters.

Changing circumstances, however, leading to residence in the "country," the "truly rural," not twenty miles from the great capital, and this no distasteful prospect, now offer fresh fields of observation. First impressions of the new life were distinctly pleasing and hopeful, to be followed shortly by the firm conviction that things "are not what they seem," either in matters social, religious, or any direction affecting the well-being or better life of the people in this and similar rural situations.

With a population approximating 500 adults, together with the usual accompanying "rising flock," there appears to be room for development, but after a careful and unprejudiced study I am forced to believe that the slumland of modern life, of which so much is heard, offers no more disagreeable prospect than does the existence of these people in their everyday life and surroundings. Possessing, locally, the advantage of a spiritual guide drawn from one of the best families, he having as helpmeet a lady whose position is a powerful factor in the situation, inasmuch that at the moment the public eye is fixed upon her as the creator of models of the most exalted type of devotion, loveliness, and the many other virtues, creations of the ever-prolific idealist, one is led to hope for large things of promise, and what do we find? That those who, possessing opportunity many would give their lives to attain, discard them, having practically no interest or knowledge either of the lives or aims of the "flock," nor are they concerned with its development, physically, morally, and only in very remote sense spiritually.

True, they freely issue all the old-time warnings of the "wrath to come," together with copious exhortations on the whole duty of man, forgetful of the influence of example.

Well indeed may we hear so often of the waning power of the Church, when the way is left so encouragingly open to the full growth of immoral weedlings.

The only distraction offered to these "neglected fledglings," many, I know, with yearnings, sometimes expressed, but oftener, in incomprehensible fear of the powers that be, only whispered, while it need scarcely be mentioned that any daring to move for other provision than is offered is anathema—the only outlet for the expectant energy is the "Village Pub," as usual prolific in number and facility—not a single organised, elevated, or educational influence being known.

We must, of course, except those little ordinations reserved for the righteous of the inner sanctum, which, with a strange perversity of idea, are so demonstrably insisted upon and observed. I could enlarge, but probably many similar instances are already known. At the same time, it must be admitted that such conditions, all too common, are a disgrace to our "Christian" influences, and, even from the commonest humanitarian standpoint, are indefensible.

Is no improvement possible? Cannot our spiritual pastors and masters believe that much of the present unrest and dissatisfaction is the result of the conclusions that existing methods have been "weighed and found wanting"?

Unless and until the Church realises that only by a faithful following of the examples of their Master ("Ye have made My House a den of thieves") can there be hope for her or her dependants, she will continue to lose her hold, while evil, hydra-headed, is assisted and assured in the failure to carry out her mission. This, I feel assured, will be the conviction of all who review the subject with unprejudiced mind, even though the admission is made with all regret.

Matters may, let us hope will, improve, but it seems as though "the people" would need to work out their own salvation, and then! with what result? or who shall be blamed for the disappearance of the manufactured ideals? "I asked for bread, and ye gave me a stone." Meanwhile, each may make the most of opportunity, and by combining for mutual progress help to lift some of the worst conditions of the social morass.

We have "Leagues" whose name is Legion—Social Purity, Dumb Animal, and others, to cover almost every condition and class. Is it not possible to cultivate a "Social Progress" League, founded, it may be, on time-tried precept, and with a simple object—the betterment of our social environment? There is certainly room, and need. Let us strive to enlist the cooperation of the more exalted, who, seeking fresh fields to conquer, may become interested, and in recollecting that charity begins at home, we may help to improve our "Fatherland," while yet our opportunity remains.

Who will begin the movement? I, for one, would be happy in taking some humble part.—I am, sir, etc.,
"VERBUM SAPIENTI."

NIETZSCHE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article written by Charles Sarolea on Nietzsche and his teaching is in the main true of the man, and a fairly accurate exposition of his philosophy, but is not entirely free of prejudice.

Nietzsche saw with unerring penetration the pregnable point in Christian morality; and he attacked it with all the force of his revolutionary and defiant nature.

He was the scion of a traditionally religious house, and I believe that it is to the eternal loss of Christendom that he chose to become an opponent instead of a reformer of Christian morality.

The core of the Christian religion is "love"; the basis of Nietzscheism is "power." I believe that the first will inevitably become an absorbent of the second to the incalculable strengthening of the influence of Christianity. An ideal Christian morality should not only appeal to the weak but to the strong, to the courageous and the daring, as well as to the meek and humble, to the leaders of the people as to the people in the mass.

Shall we agree to study Nietzsche in the light of our conception of Christian morality, and perhaps we who call ourselves Christians may be called upon to revalue our values.—I am, sir, etc.,

Baldock.

J. HAMILTON.

THE TEMPLE OF THE MIND

Preliminary particulars of an important work on Mental Science to be published immediately. Unique facilities extended to "Everyman" readers to secure advance copies.

There is no need to dilate upon the question of Mind Training to readers of EVERYMAN; it is well known that they are especially alive to the enormous possibilities ahead of the serious Student of Mind Culture. Never have there been so many opportunities for easily and economically pursuing this fascinating and profitable study. There are to-day many eminent public-spirited men devoting their lives to spreading the message of Efficiency and Success to this generation, and the results of their labours are clearly apparent in the altered mental outlook of the masses.

Men and women are no longer content to "rub along" in the groove in which circumstances have originally placed them; they realise that, in spite of external appearances, every man and woman is born, not with the chance, but the means, to surely and certainly achieve Success. It is not intended to convey that the slum child is necessarily a future millionaire; such a contention is obviously absurd. Success is comparative; if the individual can be taught to increase his or her mental efficiency to an extent that will bring an increase of earning power, at the rate of 50, 100, or 200 per cent., that person is learning the lesson of Success.

HOW IS SUCCESS TO BE WON?

The MIND is the great driving power of all achievement in the twentieth century, and it is upon the correct development and training of the MIND that material success depends.

The name of Frank Hartley needs no introduction to readers of this journal. A large number of EVERYMAN readers are already enrolled among his hundreds of enthusiastic students, all over the world. They have recognised the advantages to be obtained from the Hartley Course of Menti-Culture, which distinguish it from all other systems.

THE HARTLEY COURSE OF MENTI-CULTURE.

It is not sufficient to merely improve your memory, or to acquire Concentration, or the art of thinking and acting logically—not one of these important functions is sufficient in itself. Sound mind training must be comprehensive, scientific, and practical. The Hartley method has been proved to embrace all the essential features. Mr. Hartley, after his first hundred pupils had completed their training, was able to make the following statement:—

"While naturally the chief cause of my satisfaction was that 98 per cent. reported complete satisfaction with the results they had achieved, it was intensified when the cases were more closely scrutinised. Nearly every pupil, in sending in his final report, laid stress on the fact that his training, in addition to effecting enormous general improvement, had corrected some particular weakness, or developed a mental faculty which was hitherto dormant."

Herein lies the chief reason for Mr. Hartley's success in Menti-Culture; he not only teaches a sound and successful method, but at the same time each student is unconsciously taught how to correctly assimilate every principle that is revealed to him.

THE NEW BOOK.

In order that no reader of EVERYMAN may be without the opportunity of learning the fullest particulars concerning the Hartley method of Menti-Culture, a new edition of Mr. Hartley's book is now being printed. It is aptly called "THE TEMPLE OF THE MIND," and besides many chapters of intense interest, it will contain several beautiful illustrations. The first edition will only be a few hundred copies, and, at present, these will be reserved for EVERYMAN readers. To still further extend the utmost help to readers, in addition to the distribution of the book, another concession is made. To those who apply in time and follow the instructions below, the first LESSON will be sent FREE.

It will be readily understood that, in order to protect himself from insincere inquiries, some simple condition must be made. In order to obtain a copy of "THE TEMPLE OF THE MIND" and the FREE LESSON, simply write Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 92, London Institute of Menti-Culture, 9, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C., enclosing sixpence (in stamps or postal order) towards defraying the cost of postage and clerical expenses, and you will receive the book and lesson at once. It should be particularly noted that the small sum asked is merely a test of the bona fides of the inquirer, and is not the price of the book and lesson, which are free, and also that the inquirer is under no obligation of any kind, as Mr. Hartley undertakes to refund the small sum asked, upon request.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In the "Masterpiece for the Week," viz., "The Cloister and the Hearth," in your issue dated May 16th, your contributor confuses two incidents. He describes as magnificent the scene where the two comrades are trapped in a mill. This should read, "in an inn," or, in the words of the tale, "a roadside auberge." It is much later and some time after Denys has been forcibly pressed into the service of the Bastard of Burgundy that Gerard, as a result of seeking shelter, finds himself trapped in the top floor of a mill with a truckle bed for company, which, fortunately, he does not use, as later he discovers that the bed is linged at the foot, and that, presumably on a bolt being drawn, the head of the bed hangs down a cavity, which extends to the bottom of the building. He escapes, according to the tale, by leaping out of the window, and with the assistance of a straw rope, holding on to one of the arms of the mill when at the highest point of its career and allowing it to carry him until he jumps or rolls off at its lowest point. He has his revenge upon his rascally hosts by setting fire to the mill whilst they have gone upstairs to find out why he did not fall with his psaltery, which fell when the bed was let down.—I am, yours, etc.,

West Hampstead, N.W. HENRY BUSKIN.

"THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I read with curiosity the article on the above by Mr. Jones to see if he would draw attention to one little piece of anachronism on the part of him who is said to "have captured the very spirit of the Middle Ages."

In chapter xxxii. Denys describes the midnight revel in the monastery. The monks were having a high time of it, staking their very rosaries—"some had played cards with a gorgeous pack where St. Theresa and St. Catherine, etc., bedizened with gold, stood for the four queens." This took place some time between 1461 and 1483. St. Theresa was not born until 1515! To say that Reade captured the spirit of the Middle Ages is a statement demanding greater evidence than is provided by the production of such a misrepresenting book as "The Cloister and the Hearth,"

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

It is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

- | | |
|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Composer. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace,
Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

whereby he showed himself utterly unqualified by anti-Catholic prejudice to see things as things were seen in the Middle Ages.—I am, sir, etc.,

Helensburgh.

ANGUS MACKINTOSH.

THE BIRTH OF A NEW CIVILISATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The delightful article by the Rev. Lord W. Gascoyne-Cecil contains the statement that "Western civilisation has no respect for authority or antiquity, and thus lacks the element of durability." Another view of Western civilisation, as seen in England, suggests that, because it has so much respect for authority and antiquity, we have been spared the horrors of a "French Revolution," and are still a Conservative people in spite of a succession of Liberal administrations.

It is also suggested that the new civilisation coming via China will "obey the powers that be," and perhaps teach the world what the "Chinese" "squeeze" is. One wonders what the difference is between this particular "squeeze" and the one given by the various vested interests so prolific in England; for instance, the squeeze of the Church, the law, medicine, landowners, the plutocratic hustler, etc. Are these not the powers that be? Ought the democracy to refrain from hugging them in return? Alas! the democratic squeeze is so vulgar.—I am, sir, etc., J. A. SKEET.

Croydon.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

IT is but seldom in these days of problem novels and sensation stories that we meet with a study of middle age. The modern type has crowded out that of a former generation, and if a woman verging on fifty be introduced, as a rule, it is to play a subsidiary, if not a humorous, part. In VIRGINIA (Heinemann, 6s.) Miss Ellen Glasgow has drawn a charmingly pathetic figure, a woman who has seen the world, her world, change before her eyes, and discovers, with a sense of poignant tragedy, that her children, her friends, and, finally, her husband, have outgrown her, outworn her sympathies, left far behind her understanding. Virginia comes from the Southern States of America, instinct with all the courtesy and gentle breeding typical of the days before the Civil War. She is taught that self-control and self-restraint are the two salient qualities necessary for a perfect gentlewoman, and the fruit of her training is shown at each crisis of her life. She marries Oliver Treadwell, who develops into a popular playwright, and incidentally falls in love with the actress who plays the lead in his comedies. In the interview between the wife and the other woman the author reaches a high level of art. The temptation to make the scene a strong and emotional one was almost overwhelming, but with the delicacy of instinct perceptible in her heroine, Miss Glasgow realises that, though tragic, the situation has in it the qualities of farce. Two women and one man—one of the oldest and most painful tangles in the world. Virginia realises in a flash that she is powerless; her sweet graciousness, the fragrance of her personality, go down before the crude vitality, the vividness of Margaret Oldcastle. She realises the battle is lost before the combat is begun, and quits the arena, leaving her rival in possession of the field. She does not reproach her husband; she even feels for him something of the maternal pity that is inseparable from women of her type. She does not 50 Summer Scholarships in Black-&-White Designing and Commercial Art Open to "Everyman" Readers without Entrance Fee.

(Continued on page 220.)

THOROUGH TUITION BY POST UNTIL PROFICIENT

ART in advertising offers a splendid field to all who are willing to learn the few practical requirements of the work. Men like Walter Crane, Bernard Partridge, Simpson, E. J. Sullivan, Hubert Herkomer, Charles E.

Better than Picture Painting.

Dawson and others who matter in the Art world design advertisements not merely because it is more profitable than picture painting, but because they know it's better for our walls and magazines to be covered with designs that are good in line and colour than with advertisements that are bald, crude and vulgar.

FORMERLY the artist was the rich man's lackey. Only the wealthy could buy pictures, and the poor painter had to sell his work or perish. To-day the artist can snap his fingers at the retired usurer or mill-owner, because there is a new and widening market for his work. Artists can now do better than paint portraits of obese magnates, or "pretty landscapes" in gilded frames to cumber up the stuffy dining-rooms of dull-eyed dukes. They may draw pictures for the people—their fellows in the workaday world.

Artists snap fingers.

A Post-Impressionist
Cat.

If you can draw well enough to amuse your friends, you should begin at once to learn how to turn your Talent into Guineas.

MORE and better drawings are wanted daily, new periodicals keep adding to the countless opportunities for the man or woman who can draw for reproduction—these periodicals arise to meet the needs of the enormously increasing number of advertisers. They succeed or fail according to the quantity and merits of their illustrations. Cut out the pictures and tear the cover off a popular magazine such as Nash's and see what it looks like. Who would buy it without its pictures?

Thousands of Pounds Daily.

Advertisers now have such a lively appreciation of the value of illustrations that, in London alone, they spend thousands of pounds a day upon the kind of work that EVERYMAN readers could soon learn to do.

ARTISTS usually sell their work by post, saving time and embarrassment of verbal bargaining. By post anyone with a taste for drawing can enjoy the advantages of a London training at home.

When the Student has earned £10.

The Practical Correspondence College—the All-British Art School, with the world-wide reputation—offers the Full Course of Instruction in Black and White at half fees to the first 50 readers to pass a postal examination. The balance of fees is only payable when the student has earned Ten Pounds. Our interests are mutual, for we succeed or fail with the student.

IF the Course fails to help the student to earn £10, then the student is under no obligation to complete payment of fees.

The College stakes 200 guineas upon the success of the 50 EVERYMAN Scholarship holders.

Earning while
Learning. Most students are helped to earn while they learn, and easily dispose of their work.

Any reader with a taste for drawing, common sense, and ambition, stands a chance of being launched at unprecedented terms right into the most interesting and lucrative of the artistic professions either as a profitable spare-time pursuit or a regular occupation.

NO preliminary training or expenses are necessary. Awards will be made in the order in which specimen sketches are received. Send as soon as possible, but not later than June 30, stamped, self-addressed envelope for full particulars of the world's most successful Course of Home Study in Applied Art at the most favourable terms ever offered.

THE subjects taught include:

Drawing for reproduction, book cover, advertisement designs, lettering, perspective, line, wash and body colour sketches, splatter work, time and labour-saving devices, originating saleable designs, establishing a connection, commercial correspondence, dealing with printers, publishers and advertisers, how, when, and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

Correspondence must not be addressed to the editor of EVERYMAN, but to the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

IT costs nothing and you risk nothing by entering for this unique scholarship. The exclusive and confidential lessons are superbly illustrated. Students' exercises are criticised and difficulties explained away by personal correspondence.

The number of Scholarships available is strictly limited and the sooner you send for the Free Test paper the greater will be the chance of your success.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stenels, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.
Money refunded if not satisfactory.
A. R. QUADRUPLEX Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON, E.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crooksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gammed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

STAMMERING AND ALL DEFECTS IN SPEECH effectually CURED by correspondence or personally. The "Practical Guide" is lent to inquirers, post free.—N. H. Mason, 30, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

FRENCH CONVERSATION GUARANTEED IN FEW WEEKS. Private Lessons, 1/3 hour. Pronunciation, Translations.—Mlle. Dubois-Lens, Parisian Lady Professor, Diplôme University, Paris.—145, Oxford Street, W.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and Dramatic MSS., 8d. per 1,000 words. Carbon-copies, 1d. extra per 1,000 words.—C. A. GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE IS THE NATURAL HERITAGE of every well-educated man and woman. If you suffer from imperfect education send stamp to-day for explanatory booklet 126 and terms.—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

BROTHER RICHARD'S BOOKSHELF.—No. 3. "Modern Wars and the Peace Ideal," by NORMAN ANGELL. Price 1d. Now ready. No. 4. "Hope for the Worker," by CIOZZA MONEY, M.P. Price 1d. Ready June 1913. PRIZES FOR BEST ESSAYS. London Agents: MURRAY, EVENDEN & CO., Pleydell House, Fleet Street. Agents wanted. W. H. SMITH & SONS.

FOR SALE.—£5 Jubilee Coin, 2 S. American Doubloons (1803 H. span., 1833 Chile), several articles Jewellery, Gold Watch, Chain, and Trinkets.—Offers to D. M. Graham, Auctioneer, Forfar, N.B., Trustee, who holds the articles specified.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course," (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

As evidence of this fact it may be mentioned that Messrs. J. Foot & Sons, Ltd., of 171, New Bond Street, who are regular advertisers in our columns, have received instructions from the Physicians attending on H.R.H. the Duchess of Connaught to supply one of their Adjustable Rest Chairs for the use of Her Royal Highness during convalescence.

oppose his suit for divorce, and returns to the country home where she has spent the long years of her married life, feeling there is nothing left for her to live for. Her daughters have outgrown her need; one has her husband, the other her career. There is left only her son. And at the last he does not fail her; life still contains happiness. She finds awaiting her a letter written from England, where the young man is enjoying himself; he has learnt of what has happened, and understands something of what she must be feeling. He writes to tell her he is coming back to her, the mother who has idolised him, and the book closes on the note of quiet content. "Virginia" is a notable achievement of literary charm.

THE BASTARD (Heath, Cranton, and Ouseley, 6s.) is a bustling story, and goes with a certain swing. A romance of Georgian days, there is little to suggest the period either in descriptive or atmosphere; there are occasional lapses into dialect, or perhaps we should say idiosyncrasies of speech, but these are not typical of any time. Miss Mary Husband Morris has the redeeming quality of telling her story in a simple and straightforward style, and for this she is to be commended. The opening situation is well conceived, if the treatment is a touch bizarre. John, the illegitimate child of the Squire's son, is brought to the Lodge, where he makes unchildlike comments on his father and grandfather. John is not believable, either as a child or at a later period; indeed, the characterisation generally is not distinctive, though Harry is convincingly, if mechanically, portrayed. Miss Morris possesses the talent of story-telling, and, if she develops her powers of observation and tries to acquire a more polished style, should achieve something of less transitory interest than her latest novel.

There is nothing striking about DADDY LONGLEGS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). Miss Jean Webster, however, has achieved a book that is likely to be popular with schoolgirls. Young people invariably enjoy stories of life in an Institution, provided the heroine possesses a healthy spice of mischief and realises the desirability of breaking rules. Jerusha Abbott, familiarly known as Judy, writes a series of letters to the trustee who has sent her to college, one Jervis Smith, a member of the committee of the Orphanage where she was brought up. Some of the letters are interesting, and impress one as being the real views of a young girl brought into contact with a fresh phase of life. Others are machine-made, and show a painful straining after humour. Still, Miss Webster's audience is not likely to be highly critical; they will enjoy Judy, and enter into all her schemes, and they will not be disposed to quarrel with the ending, that from the first page of the book loomed before the reader as inevitable. Judy marries "Daddy Longlegs," the trustee who has presided over her destiny from the first.

Mr. Benson Hayes has written a story of Italian life in a quiet and effective fashion. There are times when he gives us very pleasing pictures, and his feeling for nature is intimate and delicate. "As the winding road twists and turns, the traveller first catches a glimpse of a wealth of olives, a distant mass of sheeny silver mingling with the blue of the sky. Soon after, the bell tower of the cathedral, a marvel of harmonious line and tint, rises above the clustering, tremulous foliage. Then the graceful, slender branches divide and define themselves, and the pure outlines of the Gothic cloisters appear between the pale, quivering leaves, seen through a veil of softest, finest lace-work, flecked here and there, at the sunset hour, by touches of warm and golden light." The opening scene is graphically written. We are taken into the middle of a Roman law court, and listen to the judge trying the merits of various cases. The heroine, Elsa Bell, is called upon to give evidence as to which is the aggrieved party in a dispute between a costermonger and a carter. Incidentally, she intrigues the interest of the judge, who hopelessly offends her by a reproof, not wholly undeserved, for loquacity. She disobeys the instruction of the court by disappearing from his jurisdiction, and her subsequent adventures make humorous reading. Ultimately she is discovered, but she is not sentenced for "contempt." The judge decides he will look after her himself in future, and she feels no strong conviction against accepting his proposals. FROM AN UMBRIAN CITY (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley, 5s. net) is a dainty trifle, admirably written.

Infant prodigies have surely had their day, and it is with much misgiving that we find Mr. Raymond Paton reviving these phenomena in THE DRUMMER OF THE DAWN (Chapman and Hall, 6s.). Philip, or "Tin-whumpinny," as he is nicknamed, is an impossible child. He could, we feel, have been lovable if he had not been addicted to making prosy and quite unnatural remarks. His views upon God, men and things are certainly original, but, coming from the mouth of a child, are entirely unconvincing, and fill the reader with an intense desire to spank the budding "genius." Philip is the illegitimate son of a drunken mother and a repulsive father, who goes about the country selling "ole clothes" and "bones and bottles," and occasionally varying this entertaining performance by levying blackmail upon Lady Marion, Philip's mother. Though intended to inspire terror, he merely excites humour. The devices adopted to make this absurd puppet horrible are outworn and threadbare.

"Bones," chanted he, in his unendurable voice, "any bones?"

"Old clothes," rasped the creature in a deeper note. "I want your old clothes."

Philip's aunt and mother, we regret to state, are burnt alive, and the prodigy is cast on the mercies of the world! He is subsequently adopted by the benevolent old gentleman of fiction, whom he doubtless bores—as he has bored us. It needs talent of a subtle order successfully to create a childish hero, and that talent Mr. Paton most distinctly does not possess.

SANCTUARY, by Laurence Morton (Messrs. Jarrold, 2s. 6d. net). This is a charming little book, a book to keep and to grow fond of, to take up at odd moments and read in the garden, or in bed, or by the fireside, at all times and seasons. Mr. Morton knows and understands the value of the unconsidered trifles of life, and the intimate affection which every one of us has for some inanimate thing which has perhaps been our companion for many years, whether it be a battered old school-book, or a picture, or even a chair into whose welcoming arms we have often thankfully thrown our tired selves. The first of these "confidential talks" is instinct with understanding and sympathy. "Fairy Lore," "The Cult of the Needle," "A Box of Photographs" are written in a style that makes us realise how large a part trifles play in the home lives of so many, and how hard and cut-and-dried would be those lives without these intimate touches.

Our best advertisement is the cyclist using a

Renold Chain

The price is a little more than is asked for other chains, but the quality is worlds better.

ONE QUALITY—ONE PRICE—5/6 (Fitting extra).

Write for our interesting booklet, "The Engine Room of the Cycle," containing a Perpetual Time-to-Light-up Table.

HANS RENOLD LTD. (Dept. 14), MANCHESTER.

ADVICE ON DIET.—If you are not so well or vigorous as you would like to be, write to—THOMAS MACINTYRE, Diet Specialist, Cullercoats, Northumberland.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

LEARN FRENCH by Rosenblum's Anglo-French Journal, 1d., monthly, 11d. post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French."

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

A HOUSE FOR 6d. A DAY.—Sixpence a day paid for five years will enable you to secure a house worth £300 in any part of the United Kingdom. Full particulars on application to J. J. Green, 245, Bishopsgate, London, E.C. Mention EVERYMAN.

THE WOMEN'S FREEDOM LEAGUE begs to announce a Lecture by Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman, on "Assorted Sins," on Monday, June 2nd, at Portman Rooms, Baker Street (entrance in Dorset Street). The Chair will be taken at 8 o'clock by Mrs. Despard. Discussion invited. Tickets 2/6 (numbered and reserved), and 1/- (reserved), from W. F. L. Office, 1, Robert Street, Adelphi, W.C., and at Hall doors on night of lecture.

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

PLAYS WANTED!—We are being constantly asked, by Managers and Producers, for good Plays and Sketches of every description. Let us submit YOURS. Honourable dealing and lowest fees. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, Strand, W.C.

DANTE, MAZZINI, KINGSLEY, TOYNBEE, and HOLYOAKE. Penny Studies and Biographies by Gertrude Toynbee, Albert Mansbridge, etc. The five, Sixpence post free.—Co-partnership Publishers, 73, Southampton Row, W.C.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write—we sell. 16pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

Every owner, or prospective owner of a gramophone, should read

HINTS ABOUT THE GRAMOPHONE

Considered as a Musical Instrument.

Cr. 8vo, 68 pp.

ROWELL and SONS,

62-68, Rosebery Avenue, London, E.C.

PRICE 1/6 POST FREE.

(Mention this paper.)

TOURS.

PRIVATE SOCIAL TOURS (Ladies and Gentlemen).
June 20th. HOLLAND. July 4th. TYROL (Magnificent scenery).
Aug. 1st. RUSSIA (Caucasus, Volga, Crimea, Moscow, Petersburg).
Aug. 15th. SWITZERLAND. Sept. SPAIN, ITALY, LAKES & CHATEAUX, Miss Bishop, Haslemere, Wimb'edon Park Road, Wimbledon.

LAC CHAMPEX Tour, 20 days for £9 19s. 6d. Paris, Montreux, Champex for the St. Bernard Hospice, Montreux Tours, £5 5s., Lngano Tours, £5 5s. ONLY ADDRESS—GEORGE LUNN'S TOURS, LTD., 23, Old Jewry, E.C.

A story of domestic life, simply yet graphically told, is at once intimate and stimulating. The situations arising out of the conflict of personality, the emotional antagonisms of everyday life, viewed through the medium of good prose, have an attraction that the sensational melodrama and the tale of wild adventure do not know. Miss Vera Nikto writes of life in the Caucasus. A MERE WOMAN (Duckworth, 6s.) is no chronicle of stirring scenes and hairbreadth escapes from treacherous outlaws, midnight rides over a snow-clad country; but a tale of temperament. Sonia—we could wish the author had selected a less hackneyed name—is sent to live with her aunt, and the sketch of village life is told with a freshness out of the common. Sonia meets with drama, but the crises are arrived at naturally, and the emotion is never forced. A touch of the bizarre now and again appears in the narrative, but for the first half it is well constructed and proceeds on even lines. It is towards the middle of the book that the author throws over her scheme, and plunges Sonia into a whirl of lovers, love, and intrigue, and transforms her, quite unreasonably, from a simple, charming girl into a woman who desires luxury, and does not much mind what she pays for it. The declension from the domestic interior to the heated atmosphere of a boudoir is startling and disappointing. Sonia the heroine of a liaison is not so convincing—certainly not—or so wholesome as the girl we meet in the opening of the book.

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Ambler, A. R. "The Little Inn." (Matthews, 2s. 6d.)
 Aulard, A. "The French Revolution." 3 vols. (Fisher Unwin, 12s.)
 Balzac, H. de. "Gobseck." (Oxford University Press, 3s.)
 Baring, Hon. Maurice. "What I Saw in Russia." (Nelson, 1s.)
 Begbie, Harold. "Rising Dawn." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Bell, Wilson. "Prehistoric Parables." (Milner and Co.)
 Beet, Joseph Agar. "The Last Things in Few Words." (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s.)
 Binyon, G. C. "The Kingdom of Righteousness." (Baylis.)
 "Book of Ballads." (Clarendon Press, 1s. 4d.)
 Boyle, Andrew (Editor of the Everyman Encyclopædia). Vol. III. (Dent, 1s.)
 Brereton, Cloudesley. "Studies in Foreign Education." (Harrap, 5s.)
 Burnett, F. H. "My Robin." (Putnam, 1s.)
 Carr, H. Wilson. "Truth." (Jack, 6d.)
 Carman, Gilbert. "Four Plays." (Sidgwick and Jackson.)
 Chiers. "When Were You Born?" (Herbert Jenkins, 2s. 6d.)
 Clayton, Joseph. "Trade Unions." (Jack, 6d.)
 Common Prayer. (Cambridge University Press.)
 Common Prayer. (Cambridge University Press, cloth, 3s. 6d.)
 De Batz, Le Baron. "Vers. L'Echafaud." (Calmann-Levy, 3 fr. 50.)
 Delzons, Louis. "Le Maître des Foules." (Calmann-Levy, 3 fr. 50.)
 Edwards, John. "Socialism and the Art of Living." (Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 6d.)
 Ferrer, Francisco. "The Origin and Ideals of the Modern School." (Watts, 6d.)
 Franck, Harry A. "Things as They Are in Panama." (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.)
 Garvice, Charles. "Nance." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7d.)
 Garvice, Charles. "In Cupid's Chains." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7d.)
 Grundy, G. B. "Ancient Gems in Modern Settings." (Blackwell, 5s.)
 Haggard, Rider. "She." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7d.)
 "Handbook of the Stratford Festival, 1913." (Allen, 1s.)
 Headley, F. W. "Life and Evolution." (Duckworth, 5s.)
 Heatley, O. P. "Studies in British History and Politics." (Smith, Elder, 6s.)
 Heath, Roger. "Beginnings." (Simpkin, Marshall and Co., 1s.)
 "Heroes of the Farthest North and Farthest South." (Chambers, 1s.)
 Hennessey, David. "The Ontlaw." (Hodder and Stoughton.)
 Hodson, Lieut. A. W. "Trekking the Great Thirst." (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d.)
 Hosmer, J. K. "The Last Leaf." (Putnam.)
 Howard, Keble. "London Voices." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
 Hueffer, Ford Madox. "Mr. Fleight." (Latimer, 6s.)
 Jarrett, Beatrice, O. P. M. A. "Medieval Socialism." (Jack, 6d.)
 John, Edmund. "The Flute of Sardanax." (Jenkins, 3s. 6d.)

- James, Margaret, F.B.E.A. "The Esperanto Manual." British Esperanto Association, 1s.)
 Key, Ellen. "Rachel Varuhagen." (Putnam, 6s.)
 Lamszus, Wilhelm. "The Human Slaughter-House." (Hatchinson, 1s.)
 Levine, Ephraim, M.A. "Judaism." (Jack, 6d.)
 Lyne, R. L. "Mozambique." (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d.)
 Mackereth, J. A. "Idüus." (Longmans, Green, 1s. 6d.)
 Merchant, John, F.B.E.A. "Tri Angloj Alilande." (Northend.)
 Morton, Laurence. "Sanctuary." (Jarrold, 2s. 6d.)
 Nelson's Encyclopædia Year-Book, 1912-13. (Nelson, 1s.)
 Nelson's Encyclopædia of Industrialism. (Nelson, 1s.)
 Nerson-Coblense, Mmie. "Spoken French." (Lockwood, 1s.)
 Noyes, Ella. "Salisbury Plain." (Dent, 10s. 6d.)
 Palmer, William Scott. "Michael Fairless." (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.)
 Paton, Raymond. "The Drummer of the Dawn." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
 Patand Pouget. "Syndicalism and Co-operative Commonwealth." (New International Publishing Co., 2s. 6d.)
 Petavel, J. W. "The Other Great Illusion." (Allen, 6d.)
 Pemberton, Max. "Mid the Thick Arrows." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7d.)
 Phillipa, P., D.Sc. "Light." (Jack, 6d.)
 Pugh, Edwin. "Punch and Judy." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
 Rashdall, Canon, D.Litt. "Ethics." (Jack, 6d.)
 Rippmann, W. "English Sounds." (Dent, 1s.)
 Romance, G. J. "Thoughts on Religion." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 "Roma Æterna." (Dent, 1s. 4d.)
 Rose, Henry. "Henrik Ibsen." (Fifield, 2s. 6d.)
 Rowe, Louise, Joplong. "Poems." (Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d.)
 "Russell, Lord John, Correspondence of." 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin, 21s.)
 "Rutherford, Mark, The Autobiography of." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7d.)
 Schwarz, Herbert F. "Alphonso, Emperor of Germany." (Putnam, 5s.)
 Singer, Ignatius. "The Problem of Life." (Daniel, 1s.)
 Smith, Ra-John, D.D. "Broken Links in Scottish Education." (Nisbet, 2s. 6d.)
 Snedeker, Caroline Dale. "The Spartan." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Spence-Jones, Dr. "The Dean's Handbook to Gloucester Cathedral." (Dent, 1s. 6d.)
 St. Evrémonde. "Pages Choises." (Dent, 1s.)
 Stone, J. Harris. "Caravanning and Camping Out." (Herbert Jenkins, 15s.)
 Storey, Harold. "Economics of Land Value." (Fisher Unwin, 1s.)
 Tabrum, A. H. "Religious Beliefs of Scientists." (Hunter and Longhurst, 2s. 6d.)
 Temple, William. "Repton School Sermons." (Macmillan.)
 Way, W. A. "Poems of Consolation." (J. C. Juta and Co., 1s.)
 Wedderburn, W. Allan. "Octavian Hume." (Fisher Unwin, 5s.)
 Westen and Turner. "The Seashore I Know." (Dent, 8d.)
 Whitelaw, David. "The Little Nan of Peter Wells." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Wicksteed, Philip H. "Daute and Aquinas." (Dent, 6s.)
 Williamson, Mrs. C. N. "The Barn-Stormers." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7d.)
 Wilson, D. A. "The Truth About Carlyle." (Alston Rivers, 1s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar, an London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.

TWO BOOKS BY MISS
EVELYN UNDERHILL.

THE MYSTIC WAY.

The Times.—"Miss Underhill's book is a triumph of erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

Square Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

IMMANENCE.

A VOLUME OF VERSE. 4s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"Miss Underhill gives us in her book the imaginative expression of a visloep of life. Her right use of words differentiates her work from that of the majority of modern religious poets, but it is the spiritual beauty imprisoned in these words which will send readers back to the book again and again."

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF
THOMAS HOLMES' SUCCESSFUL WORK.

LONDON'S UNDERWORLD.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"It is good that rare men like Mr. Holmes exist, for there are not many of us who could spend a long lifetime amongst the human wrecks of the underworld and still retain any confidence or hope in human nature. This is a book that will make people think, and, in a way, it ought to make us hopeful."

SALISBURY PLAIN:

And Its Stones, Cathedral City, Villages and Folk.

By ELLA NOYES. 10s. 6d. net.

Illustrated in Line and Colour by DORA NOYES.

Observer.—"One of the best books of its kind we have seen for a long time."

FRANCE TO-DAY;

Its Religious Orientation.

By PAUL SABATIER.

Translated by HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [In preparation.]

SOME GOOD NOVELS

THE LOST MAMELUKE.

By DAVID M. BEDDOE.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Mr. Beddoe has a powerful, vivid imagination, and his descriptions of the gorgeous Mamelukes at play on horse and foot recall some of the most thrilling pages of Sir Walter Scott."

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS.

Times.—"There is breathless excitement and fun in the tale. The chapter telling how Tamburlaine carries his half-dead master all the way from Dublin to Ardhorce without a rest is full of a tremendous galloping movement that is overmastering."

Morning Post.—"We recommend our readers to get the book for themselves."

DAISY DARLEY;

or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily News.—"A clever, attractive book. Mr. Ryan has made a genuine success in his delightful sketches of the subsidiary characters."

ROSALIND IN ARDEN.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

[In preparation.]

Price Six Shillings Each.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

TO BE COMPLETED IN 12 VOLUMES.

Cloth,
1/- net.

VOL. 5 NOW READY.

Leather,
2/- net.

WORLD:

"The result is eminently satisfactory, and great popularity may be anticipated for one of the handiest and most correct little reference books ever published."

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUSES.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation.

There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave — not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON.

POST IT NOW

POST TO US — GET THE BOOK.

CUT THIS CORNER — POST IT NOW

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

Name

Address

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 34. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JUNE 6, 1913

One Penny.

JOHANN VON GOETHE,
NATUS 1749, OBIT 1832

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of Johann von Goethe | 225 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 226 |
| The Coming Catastrophe in India.—By H. Mayers Hyndman | 227 |
| Dem Unbekannt en Gott (from Nietzsche)—Translated by S. F. Butchart | 228 |
| The New Emigration—By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P. II.— Striking at the Heart of the Empire | 228 |
| Historic Cities of the World. I.—Paris. Part III.—By the Editor | 230 |
| Character Sketch of Goethe | 232 |
| Literary Notes | 233 |
| The Position of the English Author—By Walter M. Gallichan | 234 |
| Shadow-Goblins. Short Story—By A. C. Mason | 236 |
| "The Continental Sunday"—By Rev. James Adderley ... | 237 |
| Everyman's French Page. Mirabeau | 240 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. Galt's "Annals of the Parish" —By Hector Macpherson | 241 |
| Queen Alexandra's Cripples. Poem—By Annie Matheson | 242 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Richard Wagner the Man | 243 |
| Oscar Wilde—A Remonstrance | 243 |
| Irish Protestants and Home Rule | 244 |
| A Dutch Protest | 246 |
| Some Thoughts on the Suffrage Question | 246 |
| The Kinematograph and the Drama | 247 |
| George Borrow | 249 |
| Conscription and the Workers | 249 |
| Theology and Idealism | 250 |
| Books of the Week | 251 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AS usual, his Majesty has approved the bestowal of a number of honours on the occasion of his birthday. The Prime Minister's list is widely representative, and contains no sensational features, unless the omission of new peerages may be counted as one. The inclusion of Dr. J. M. Barrie among the list of new baronets is of interest, as being the first instance on record of a dramatist receiving that honour. Dr. Barrie, it will be remembered, declined the knighthood some years ago. Dr. McClure, of Mill Hill, represents Nonconformist higher education. He is not only a head master of the best modern type; he is also an authority on Church music, and has, perhaps, done more than any other single man to raise the quality of the musical part of Nonconformist worship. He deserves to take his place beside Dr. A. W. Ward, of Cambridge, the only other representative of Education upon the list.

There is no doubt that the ending of the war with Turkey is largely owing to Sir Edward Grey's sharp and decisive intervention. But for his energetic action the Conference of the Concert would still be marking—or, rather, wasting—time in fruitless negotiations. A writer in the Daily Chronicle calls Sir Edward Grey's action a triumph in conciliation, and gives, inter alia, this brief characterisation of an attractive personality: "This was Sir Edward's initial advantage, that he was the spokesman of Great Britain. His second was and is simply that he is himself. By that I mean that his personality, and reputation, and the sort of impression he had created during the past seven and a half years, and the positive achievements of his diplomacy, made Europe turn to him, as the quiet, practical, straightforward, and dependable man is always turned to at a time of crisis. . . . There is about him an atmosphere of sincerity and straightforwardness. It is this atmosphere which has made him among his own countrymen the most trusted, although the least known man in British public life; and it is this which has inspired in all the Chancelleries of Europe a profound confidence in his integrity of speech and intention."

Mr. Balfour's speech on religious education on the occasion of a crowded meeting in support of the National Society lacked neither acuteness nor vigour. Perhaps the most characteristic passage was the one in which, after having expressed his joy over the growing approximation of all denominations, he went on to assert that this wholesome frame of mind (the desire to emphasise common points rather than differences) no longer took what he called the simple form of saying, "Well, if Christians differ . . . the State has only to make some kind of distillation from the various creeds, get at what is common to all of them, put it in a separate vessel, and say that is what every taxpayer may be asked to contribute to without injuring his conscience." "That," said Mr. Balfour, "is preposterous doctrine. It may have been tolerable in the Middle Ages that there should be a forced contribution for an undivided Church which had, or conceived it had, divine sanction and a history going back far beyond the history of any secular State. But the idea that in the twentieth century you are going to have a forcible levy in order to teach at the public expense something which a department and the Law Courts between them might extract from an Act of Parliament as being the common elements of Christianity is an absurd doctrine." However diametrically opposed one's conception of religious instruction may be to that of the National Society, few thoughtful students of the situation will much longer deny that the only way out of the impasse is some form of "Right of Entry" for clergy of all denominations, such as has been worked so successfully in Australia.

A correspondent in the Pall Mall Gazette quotes George Meredith's view of the burning question of conscription, as given to an interviewer in 1904, when Meredith said that "the fear of death is the real cause of the English objection to conscription. Men come to me and say their trade would suffer, or they could not spare two years from their apprenticeship. Their real meaning is they are afraid of being called out and getting shot at. So they pay others to do the killing and dying for them. Every manly nation submits to universal service. In the present state of the world it counts among the necessities for safety. But nothing short of an invasion and the capture of London—some great intestinal disturbance—would induce England to think of it seriously. As it is, 80,000 Germans could march through England from end to end. Many would then be ready to die, but the sacrifice would be fruitless." This is the second Meredithian utterance on the subject quoted by supporters of conscription, and might well serve to initiate a "silly season" correspondence on "Are we as a Nation Afraid?" There can be little doubt, however, that fear of death—that inevitable accompaniment of Western civilisation—is a factor in the outcry against conscription.

Is there to be another Poet Laureate? The question was asked with emphasis at the death of Tennyson, when both Mr. Gladstone and Lord Rosebery declined to make an appointment for an office which many judged to be out of consonance with modern conceptions of the dignity of literature, and is, indeed, reminiscent of the days when the man of letters was dependent on his patron.

THE COMING CATASTROPHE IN INDIA

BY H. MAYERS HYNDMAN*

It is extremely difficult to induce our countrymen to pay any continuous attention to the affairs of our Indian Empire. This is even more true to-day than it was forty years ago. Nothing short of a famine of quite exceptional horror, or a series of assassinations of more than ordinary significance, can rouse the public here at home to the dangers which permanently threaten our domination in that vast and populous country. Even the recent dynamite attack upon the Viceroy at Delhi has produced very little effect; though, if a similar desperate attempt had been made upon the Czar of Russia by an organised secret society—a potentate who rules over less than half the number of people we directly and indirectly control in Hindostan—it would certainly have been more than a nine days' wonder.

As to "Indian Unrest" in general, which, but a few short years ago, created so great a stir at home, as being quite possibly the forerunner of a serious catastrophe, the fear of that has quite died down, together with the memory of all the significant incidents by which it was accompanied. The King-Emperor and his Royal Consort were well received on their visit, the native princes are effusively loyal, the advance of Russia from the Khanates need no longer be apprehended, and the Budget shows a large surplus. What is even more important, "disloyal" (which anywhere else in the world we should call patriotic) speech and writing have been suppressed, inconvenient critics have been put in gaol, with or without trial, and quite a large number of vigorous opponents have been carefully convinced that silence is more profitable than words. So all is for the best in the best of Empires possible. That is the opinion not only of Anglo-Indian officialdom, with all its very wide ramifications, secret and open, but even of so much of our Press as still remains independent and untrusting.

I.

Britain's Disastrous Influence

Yet the real condition of India at the present moment is not in the least better than it was at the height of the scare. Rather the contrary. Those who imagine that the propaganda against foreign rule has been put an end to, are just as much living in a fool's paradise as the wiseacres at home, who think that young Indian students in England are rendered earnest admirers of our methods by the subsidised shepherding of Mr. Mallet. I happened to be in the chair when Begim Chandra Pal delivered a stirring oration in Caxton Hall, which assuredly left nothing to desire in point of revolutionary fervour or scathing criticism. The hall was crowded with young Indians, who cheered him to the echo. It is said that Mr. Chandra Pal has modified his views somewhat since his return to India. It may be so. But I am quite certain that the real feelings of himself and of the young men who applauded him are in direct opposition to the continuance. Just as I have not the slightest doubt that the whole Mahratta country at bottom sympathises with Bal Gungunder Tilak and the larger portion of Bengal with Sarvarkar.

Why not? British rule in India is unsympathetic and unjust; harsh and tyrannical politically, and ruinous economically. We have done all in our power to crush Indian initiative, to destroy Indian culture, to stunt

* A reply to Mr. Hyndman's article, by Mr. W. S. Lilly, will appear in next week's issue.

Indian agriculture and manufacture, and to drive away the wealth of the peninsula to Great Britain; until Hindostan, directly under our domination, has become the greatest pauper warren ever known throughout history. Instead of recognising, as the great men of the East India Company, with all their faults, were proud to recognise, that Hindostan is a land of fine peoples, of noble races who have led the world in many departments of art, science, law, finance, morals, religion, and industry, and are capable of doing even more in the future than their ancestors did in the past, we, as a nation, since 1857 have looked down upon these, our fellow-subjects, and have treated them, and treat them to-day, as inferior mortals. Until the Bengalis, the mildest and most peaceful race on the planet, were goaded into assassination by our abominable misrule, we spoke of them all as the most contemptible of cowards and meanest of men, forgetful of the service of the Bengal Sepoys in establishing British rule, and their splendid intrepidity at the siege of Bhurtpore and elsewhere.

II.

The Bleeding of India

Worse than this, we have from the first systematically bled India of her wealth. "India must be bled," said the late Lord Salisbury, who, to do him justice, was ready to do his best to staunch the bleeding by the reconstitution of native rule, but was thwarted by the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy in India and the dominant class at home. Bled India has been, and is to-day, by a drain of commercial produce, to pay interest, home charges, remittances, military depôts, etc., in Great Britain, to an extent fully sufficient to account for the frightful impoverishment and great development of plague and the disease of poverty throughout British territory. Foreign rule is always bad for the subjugated people, even when unaccompanied by wholesale economic deductions from the wealth of the conquered. But when, in addition to all the inevitable evils of Europeanisation, a magnificent territory suffers for more than a hundred and fifty years from systematic and deliberate extortion from the poorest of its people—the yearly drain to England exceeds on the average by 50 per cent. the total ruinously collected Land Revenue—then the injury done by such monstrous tyranny is incalculable. And the fact that the bulk of Englishmen may wish to be just to India, and believe that their rule is beneficial to Indians, does not mitigate the evil which they do.

III.

Government by State Capitalists

But Lord Morley told us some six years ago that India is "governed on Socialist principles." No more gross misrepresentation was ever made, even by a bureaucratic Radical. India is governed on the worst possible State capitalist principles. The land, the forests, the mines, the railways, the irrigation works, are all owned and managed by the despotic foreigners in the interest, not of the Indians, but of the Government imposed upon them from without. They have no control whatever over their own resources, and this Government—it is a shame to us Englishmen at home that it should be so—while it starves the people's bodies and grudges every farthing spent on Indian education, thinks nothing of spending some £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 on two new capitals for the grasping foreigners at Delhi and at Dacca. I regard our present rule in India as one of the greatest crimes ever committed in all the long history of man's depredations upon man.

But it is pretended that we have seen the error of our ways, and that the policy now being followed in Hindostan means real relief to the oppressed peoples and races who are learning to forget their internecine feuds in common hatred of us. Not a bit of it. The object of the British in India is the same as that of the Austrians fifty and sixty years ago in Italy, to bribe as many capable Indians as they can by posts in the Government itself, and by favoured treatment in other ways to support the system which is ruining their fellow-countrymen. The result, I venture to predict, will be the same in a period of crisis. The Indian officials, like the Indian troops, will quickly side with their own folk when they think there is any hope of success.

IV.

Is there a Remedy?

And the remedy? There is, and can be, no remedy which looks to the perpetuation of the present domination. We have done mischief enough already. It is against the interest, not only of India, but of England, that we should continue our fatal rule. The alternative now is the same as it was when I began writing and speaking upon the question of India more than thirty years ago. Shall we prepare, late in the day as it now is, to retire peacefully from a position that we have neither the right nor the power to maintain, by building up Indian organisations to take our place, as many of the ablest of Anglo-Indians have suggested, from Mountstuart Elphinstone onwards? Or shall we, by foolishly imagining that we can always continue our régime of wrong and rapine, work up deliberately to a crash which will upset a great deal more than British rule in Hindostan?

The decision should lie with the democracy of this island. But that is never consulted. Our masters, whom we pay to be our servants, carefully conceal from us the warnings they receive from all the Provinces of growing disaffection and suspected secret propaganda of revolt. In Indian affairs, as in foreign affairs, the one idea of our "statesmen" of to-day is to deceive the English people to their hurt.

DEM UNBEKANNT EN GOTT

From Nietzsche

Once more, before I farther wend,
And all my glances forward send,
I raise in loneliness my hand
Aloft to thee, to whom I flee,
To whom in heart-felt passion I
Have many an altar set on high,
That to all eternity,
Thy voice again might summon me.

Deeply thereon appears engrained
The one phrase: "To the unknown God."
His own am I, though 'mid the crowd
Of wantons yet I have remained;
I'm His, and yet the chains I feel
That in the combat conquer me,
And still, how'er I try to flee,
Constrain me to His will.

Thee will I know, thou unknown God,
Who deep into my soul hast sown
Thy seed, and through my life hast blown
In storm; Intangible, to me akin,
Thee will I know, and service with Thee win!

S. F. BUTCHART.

THE NEW EMIGRATION

II.—STRIKING AT THE HEART OF THE EMPIRE.

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY.

LAST week I showed how, through the bold policy of advertising for our people, the British dominions beyond the seas are robbing us of population, and we saw that, from the British colonial point of view, we cannot be surprised that colonial Governments should endeavour to increase their exceedingly small populations. We have now to consider the matter on the broadest grounds, not only from the point of view of the United Kingdom, but from that of the Empire at large.

I.

First, let us remind ourselves of the course of the birth-rate and the death-rate in the United Kingdom. If we go back to 1885, the British birth-rate was over 31 per 1,000 of the population. If that birth-rate obtained to-day, the present year would see born in the United Kingdom about 1,400,000 people. The birth-rate, however, has fallen to about 23 per 1,000, so that, instead of expecting 1,400,000 births, we have only to look for about 1,050,000.

Against the decrease in the birth-rate we have happily to put a fall in the death-rate from about 19 per 1,000 of the population in 1885 to about 14 per 1,000 at the present time. It therefore comes about that through this compensation the excess of births over deaths this year will be very much the same as in 1885, in spite of the fall in the birth-rate. In the following statement the facts for the United Kingdom are carried to 1911, and those for England and Wales to 1912:—

THE "NATURAL INCREASE" OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

| Year. | Births. | Deaths. | Excess of Births over Deaths. |
|-------------------------|-----------|---------|-------------------------------|
| 1885 | 1,136,331 | 688,065 | 448,266 |
| 1895 | 1,154,898 | 735,244 | 419,654 |
| 1900 | 1,159,922 | 757,732 | 402,190 |
| 1905 | 1,163,535 | 669,638 | 493,897 |
| 1910 | 1,123,010 | 630,620 | 492,390 |
| 1911 | 1,104,986 | 672,138 | 432,848 |
| ENGLAND AND WALES ONLY. | | | |
| 1910 | 896,962 | 483,247 | 413,715 |
| 1911 | 881,241 | 527,864 | 353,377 |
| 1912 | 872,767 | 486,967 | 385,800 |

The importance of these vital facts cannot be exaggerated. We see that the fall in the death-rate has so far compensated for the fall in the birth-rate, but a moment's thought will show that that compensation cannot go much further. We ought to be able to bring the death-rate down to 10 per 1,000, or less, and, if we did, we should save an army of lives every year. Unfortunately, however, the birth-rate continues to fall, and it is now only about 23 per 1,000. We have seen in the case of France how the birth-rate of a modern civilisation may fall until the population comes to a standstill without the assistance of emigration.

But, supposing the fall in the birth-rate to go no further, what is likely to happen in the present year? There may be about 1,050,000 births, while the deaths will probably be about 650,000, leaving a natural increase of population of about 400,000.

If, therefore, emigration, as is quite probable, reaches 300,000, our population will increase in the year by only 100,000, or at the rate of 1,000,000 per decade, as against an increase of nearly 4,000,000 in the decade between the last two censuses.

Having reached this point, it will be seen that it needs but a slight further fall in the birth-rate, accompanied by a slight further increase in the emigration rate, to bring our population to a standstill, and but slight further increases to cause England and Wales to follow the example of Scotland and Ireland and actually lose population.

II.

I know of no series of facts demanding the closer attention of the nation. We are threatened with a blow at the heart of the Empire which would weaken the economy of the United Kingdom, and, by weakening it, strike at the Empire itself.

When we granted old-age pensions to persons aged seventy and upwards in the United Kingdom we were astonished to find that the number of pension claims in Ireland far exceeded our expectations. What was it that we had forgotten? It was simply this—a thing of profound significance in its relation to the problem we are discussing. For many years young Irishmen and Irishmen in their prime had been fleeing from their country to America and elsewhere, leaving behind them the old people. Consequently, when it came to granting old-age pensions, there was found in Ireland an undue and accusing proportion of those eligible for old-age pensions.

We must try to realise that the same thing is happening now in Scotland and in England and in Wales. Few men over forty-five, and scarcely any over fifty-five, are answering to the call of "160 beautiful acres for nothing." It is the young, it is the best, of our working population in town and in country who are week by week crowding the emigrant ships. At this moment the great steamship companies are booked up for months ahead in respect of all their third-class accommodation to Canada. A single day sees 3,000 people fleeing from Scotland! Young men and young women are leaving us for ever in an endless stream. Do we realise what the departure of 300,000 persons in a year means? Three hundred thousand is three-fourths of the population of Sheffield. As I once asked the Sheffield people, what would be said if in a single year Sheffield disappeared from the map of England? But what we are losing this year is more than a Sheffield, for Sheffield consists of old and young, of rich and poor, and all sorts and conditions of men, women, and children. The yearly army of 300,000 British emigrants in 1913 is not an average lot, but a picked lot—not a chance dip, but a selection of good lives from our towns and villages.

III.

If the thing goes further, the consequences will be very serious, and the whole body of the nation will feel them. Every social problem will be aggravated. The national production will fall, because there will be fewer to produce, and because those left to produce will be of a reduced average efficiency through the loss of picked men. Although women are emigrating as well as men, the men, of course, are in the great majority, and therefore the feminine surplus, already great, will increase every year, with social effects of the most lamentable character. The rate of sickness experience under the National Insurance Act will rise through the increased average age of the community. The claims for old-age pensions will increase. The cost of these and other increased social charges will have to be borne by a smaller number of people, who will thus feel an ever-growing burden. The power to sustain armaments will decrease, and the naval burden will be increasingly serious. Indeed, there is no department of the national life and national affairs which will not be profoundly affected.

IV.

All this matters a great deal to the United Kingdom, but it matters no less to the British Empire. The United Kingdom is the necessary head and front of the Empire, and to weaken it is to weaken the Empire at large. The British Dominions, therefore, must think seriously what they are doing before they carry their advertising operations beyond the point at which our population is in danger of reduction. It may be thought by the superficial observer that the Empire cannot suffer if so many people are taken from one part of it and planted out in other parts, but that is a careless view. The British Empire is scattered all over the globe, and to add a few millions to outlying States, and to deduct those millions from the centre, is to weaken the Empire for purposes of defence, for it is very difficult for scattered States to maintain sea power in common, while land forces scattered up and down the Empire are powerless to help each other without the maintenance of common sea power. The integrity of the Empire now depends, and must for long depend, upon the maintenance of central Imperial power in the British Isles. The maintenance of that power is impossible unless the United Kingdom not only keeps its present population, but makes increase. The 100,000 to 150,000 increase of 1913 is not enough; the least figure which is consistent with our proper economic and political progress is 250,000 a year, and I should not quarrel with the man who thought 250,000 too few.

V.

Is there a remedy? Having frankly stated a view which I have not formed lightly, but which has grown in me with ever-increasing conviction for some considerable time past, let me state what I believe to be the remedy.

I believe that the United Kingdom can easily support more than twice its present population at a very much higher standard of comfort than now obtains, and it ought to be quite unnecessary for a man to leave these shores for the uncertain climate of the Western Prairie or Australia. It is true that we have not the wide territories of the great Dominions, but we have a much more important thing from an economic point of view, and that is cheap coal in such quantities as they do not possess. The possession of cheap coal means the power to do industrial work very much more economically than it can be done in the colonies. National organisation—national organisation of land, of transport, and of power—can enlarge our industries far beyond their present limits. But something more is wanted, and that is the organisation of social life, the beautification of towns, the erection of beautiful and attractive dwellings for the working classes. A nation which houses its people in beauty and comfort, and enforces a minimum standard of existence, need not fear that they will easily leave it to enter upon such a tremendous speculation as emigration to the unknown wilderness.

THE Editor desires to direct special attention to the contents of No. 35 of EVERYMAN. This issue will contain a special portrait of Sir J. M. Barrie, the latest addition to the ranks of literary baronets, with a character sketch written from an intimate point of view, and of vivid interest to the many admirers of the author of "The Little Minister," and "What Every Woman Knows."

HISTORIC CITIES OF THE WORLD

I.—PARIS * * * BY THE EDITOR

PART III.

I.

IN the Sixth Arrondissement we are still in the Latin quarter, in a quarter of colleges and convents, of museums and academics. The Picture Gallery of the Luxembourg, the Fine Arts School, the Medical School and the Mining School, the Palace of the Institute are all concentrated in this part. But whereas the Fifth Arrondissement is mainly tenanted by students, the Sixth is mainly inhabited by teachers and men of letters, by civil servants and priests, and it is probably the composition of its population which gives the district that atmosphere of respectability and dignity and of almost sacerdotal repose which is in such striking contrast with the noise and bustle of the Boulevard St. Michel.

As we are still in the City of Learning, so we are still in the City of the Past. The Sixth is rich in historical monuments and associations. The tourist will visit in succession the church and seminary of St. Sulpice, the nursery of the Parisian clergy, and closely associated with the history of the Gallican Church; the French Academy, identified with three centuries of French literary history; the Palace of the Luxembourg, once the official residence of Bonaparte, first Consul of the Republic, now the Palace of the Senate; and last, not least, the Church of St. Germain des Prés, the oldest church of Paris in Romanesque style. In the neighbourhood, the Rue du Pré aux Clercs, or "clerics' meadow," evokes the many battles fought between the friars of St. Germain and the riotous hordes of mediæval scholars, who, although living in an age of authority, were much less law-abiding, and probably less industrious, than the much-maligned Parisian student of to-day.

The Sixth Arrondissement contains many points of attraction for the cultured tourist. The Jardin du Luxembourg, already glorified in the seventeenth century by Molière, is one of the most exquisite parks of the capital. The arcades of the Odéon, under the national and State-supported theatre of the same name, are one of the favourite haunts of the book-lover. The thrifty student can here at leisure practise the difficult art of reading a book without cutting its pages, and of absorbing its contents without having to pay for it.

There is much less poverty in the Sixth than in the Fifth Arrondissement. There are only a few rookeries round the Mint in the Cour du Dragon—appropriately named, for its inhabitants are in the jaws of the dragon of misery. There lives, in this neighbourhood, quite a tribe of second-hand book-sellers, the tenants of those bookstalls extending for a mile on the parapets of the Seine, which are one of the features of old Paris. Those bookstalls on the quays are a survival of a bygone age, when scholars with short purses could make wonderful bargains, and would pick up rare first editions for a few pence.

Latter-day bibliophiles have ceased to find those wonderful troves, but they are amply compensated in their crude exploration of the quays by the glorious surroundings, by the Palace of the Louvre, overlooking the Seine, by the beautiful vista on both sides, and especially by the splendour of the river, not defiled, as in London, by the smoke and grime of factories.

II.

Each district of Paris has its particular feature. We found the Fifth a district of great poverty, and the Sixth one of cultured ease; and we shall find the Eighth a centre of international plutocracy. The Seventh has a dignity all its own. It is the geographical centre of the old-world aristocracy, of the Faubourg St. Germain, still surrounded with the halo of pre-revolutionary and imperial days.

Some of the old ducal and princely mansions still remain, but their number diminishes from year to year. This quarter more than others is suffering from the mania of destruction and reconstruction, which is so rapidly pulling down the old Paris. Only a few months ago one of the most interesting relics of old Paris, the Abbaye au Bois, sacred to genius and beauty, to Chateaubriand and Mme. Récamier, and one of the last salons in the history of French literature, was demolished to make way for the new Boulevard Raspail, and to-day only the name of the Rue Récamier is there to remind us of the brilliant society which enjoyed the hospitality and worshipped at the shrine of the adorable Julie.

If the Seventh Arrondissement is reminiscent of the old aristocracy, so it is reminiscent of modern politics. Here are gathered the most important Ministries, including the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Foreign Embassies, the Chamber of Deputies, the Legion of Honour, the Invalides, the tomb of Napoleon, the Church of St. Louis—a temple originally erected by the great King, but dedicated by fate to the glory of the great Emperor—the Champ de Mars—the site of the Federation celebrations of 1790, and now the site of the French World Fairs—the Eiffel Tower—which from every point dominates the Metropolis—and finally the palace of the Archbishop of Paris.

The old archiepiscopal residence may have been more appropriately situated near Notre Dame, in the heart of the ancient Cité, but the tenure of its occupants was tragically precarious. Three Archbishops of Paris were murdered within a period of twenty-five years, and when the Communards sacked and burnt the palace and murdered their shepherd, the Government of the day were well advised to transfer the ecclesiastical headquarters out of reach of the Faubourg St. Antoine to the quiet precincts of the Faubourg St. Germain.

III.

The Eighth Arrondissement is the plutocratic quarter—the home of the American millionaire, of the Russian prince, of the Jewish financier. A casual glance at a directory reveals that the majority of names are foreign. It is a district of luxurious mansions, of magnificent avenues, of splendid vistas, the Avenue des Champs Elysées being probably the finest urban prospect in Europe, only rivalled, perhaps, by the view of the Pont Alexandre, the gorgeous bridge which commemorates the Franco-Russian alliance.

The Eighth Arrondissement is also a district of

CHARACTER SKETCH OF GOETHE

NO less than three books on Goethe have been issued in the course of the last few months, and the fact is sufficient evidence that the Cult of the Olympian Jupiter of Weimar, which was first inaugurated eighty years ago by Carlyle, is in no danger of dying out in England. Prof. Hume Brown has given us a penetrating and judicious study of Goethe's youth, such as one had a right to expect from the eminent Scottish historian.* Mr. Joseph McCabe has given us a comprehensive survey of Goethe's life, and an objective and critical appreciation of his personality.† Both are in profound sympathy with their subject, but neither is a blind hero-worshipper. In Mr. McCabe's life we are not only introduced to the scientist who is ever in quest of new worlds to conquer, we are also made acquainted with the pagan Epicure ever engaged in amorous experiments! We are not only introduced to the sublime poet and prophet, we are also introduced to the incurable Egotist, who could only find time to visit his old mother once every ten years, whilst, as boon companion of a petty German Prince, he always found time for his pleasures. We are not only admitted to contemplate the pomp and majesty of his world-wide fame. We are also admitted to the sordid circumstances of Goethe's "home." And our awe and reverence are turned into pity. We pity the miserable husband of a drunken and epileptic wife rescued from the gutter; we pity even more the unhappy father of a degraded son, who inherited all the vices of one parent without inheriting the genius of the other.

I.

The first quality which strikes us in Goethe, and which dazzled his contemporaries, and continues to dazzle posterity, is his universality. He appears to us as one of the most receptive, one of the most encyclopædic intellects of modern times. A scientist and a biologist, a pioneer of the theory of evolution, a physicist and originator of a new theory of colour, a man of affairs, a man of the world and a courtier, a philosopher, a lyrical poet, a tragic, comic, satiric, epic and didactic poet, a novelist and an historian, he has attempted every form of literature, he has touched upon every chord of the human soul.

It is true that, in considering this universality of Goethe, it behoves us to make some qualifications. His human sympathies are by no means as universal as his intellectual sympathies. He has no love for the common people. He has the aloofness of the aristocrat. He has a Nietzschean contempt for the herd. He takes little interest in the religious aspirations of mankind or in the struggles of human freedom. The French Revolution remains to him a sealed book, and his history of the campaign in France is almost ludicrously disappointing.

With regard to what has been called his "intellectual universality," the elements which compose it cannot be reduced to unity and harmony. It would be difficult to co-ordinate them into a higher synthesis, for that uni-versality is at the same time di-versity and mutability. Goethe is essentially changeable and elusive. In his works we find combined the antipodes of human thought. There is little in common between the poet of Goetz von Berlichingen and Werther on the one hand and the poet of Tasso and Iphigenia on the other hand. The intellect of Goethe is like a crystal with a thousand facets reflecting all the colours of the rainbow.

And it may well be asked, therefore, whether this encyclopædic diversity can aptly be called universality. Universality must ultimately result in Unity and Harmony, and it is impossible to assert that Goethe's mind ever achieved Unity and Harmony, that it was ever controlled by one dominant thought.

At any rate, whether a defect or a quality, there can be no doubt that this encyclopædic diversity has turned, to the great advantage of his glory. It is precisely because Goethe is an elusive Proteus that all doctrines may equally claim him. Romanticists turn with predilection to the creator of Werther or the first "Faust." Classicists admire the plastic beauty of Tasso and Iphigenia. The cosmopolitan sees in Goethe the Weltbürger, the citizen of the world, the incarnation of "die Weltweisheit." The patriot acclaims in him the poet who has sung the myths and legends dear to the German race. The sensuous and voluptuous libertine is enchanted by the eroticism of the "Roman Elegies." The domesticated reader is drawn by that chaste idyll, Herman and Dorothea. The Spinozist and Pantheist are attracted by the general tendencies of his philosophy. The Christian is at liberty to interpret "Faust" in a sense which is favourable to his religion. The Liberal politician can point to the author of Goetz and Egmont. The Conservative and Reactionary can claim all the works of Goethe's maturity, when the poet had become the perfect courtier.

II.

There is a second quality which Goethe possesses in a supreme degree, and by which he is distinguished from his contemporaries, namely, mental sanity and serenity. Most of his fellow-poets reveal some morbid characteristics, are afflicted with some Weltschmerz, with some internal spiritual malady. They live in an atmosphere of strife and discord. The marvellous vitality of Goethe has escaped from the contagion. Like his fellow-poets, he passed through the crisis of the "Sturm und Drang." But it seems as if he had only known it in order to give to his experiences a final artistic expression. He communicated the "Wertherian malady" to a whole generation, but he himself emerged triumphant and unscathed. The hurricane which wrecked so many powerful intellects spared his own. After the Italian journey he never ceased by example and precept to recommend harmony and balance, and he became so completely the perfect type of intellectual and artistic sanity that the world has forgotten the Bohemian days of Frankfurt and Leipzig, the merry days of Weimar, the repulsive vulgarity of his drunken mistress and wife, the degradation of his son, and has agreed only to contemplate the Olympian majesty of Weimar. Whether the repose and sanity of Goethe were unmixed virtues, or whether they were partly the result of indifference, of impassivity or selfishness, is another question. Certain it is that there is no other trait in Goethe's personality which has done more to raise him in the esteem of posterity. He has proved to the world that internal discord and distraction and morbid exaltation are not the necessary appanage of genius, and that, on the contrary, the most powerful genius is also the most sane, the most balanced, the most self-possessed, the most harmonious.

* "The Youth of Goethe." By P. Hume Brown. 8s. net. (Murray.)

† "Goethe, the Man and his Character." By Joseph McCabe. 15s. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

III.

Without going here into the purely formal and artistic qualities of Goethe's works, there is one fact which, perhaps more than any other, impressed itself on the imagination of the world, and that is the realisation of his own personality, the achievement of his own destiny. Of all his poems the rarest and most perfect is the poem of his life. Hitherto no such life had ever been allotted to a favourite of the Muses. He seemed to have received a bountiful abundance of all the gifts of the fairies—superb health, comfort, and wealth, the love of an adoring mother and sister, the loyalty of illustrious friends, the favour of princes, the homage of women, and the admiration of men. To him was opened every province of human activity. He exhausted every form of enjoyment. His life until the end was like the unfolding of a glorious version of a happy dream. At eighty years of age he remained the one surviving giant of the golden age of German literature. In his lifetime he was considered by Europe, as well as by Germany, as the most glorious exemplar of his race, and the city of his adoption had become a pilgrimage attracting worshippers from all parts of Europe. Death was merciful to him. The last act of his life was as beautiful as the others. It was not preceded by the gradual dissolution of his physical and intellectual strength; rather was it like the burning out of a flame. He passed away in an apotheosis, and the last words uttered by the dying poet, "Mehr Licht, mehr Licht"—"More Light, more Light"—have become for all future generations the final expression of his philosophy and the symbol of his personality.

LITERARY NOTES

WHERE are the magazines of yesteryear? The announcement that Harper's, so long identified with the great house of that name, is to change hands serves to remind us of the many famous monthlies that have drooped and died, to our sorrow, this last decade or so. Where, for instance, is Longman's Magazine, in which poor Andrew of the brindled hair discoursed so charmingly "At the Sign of the Ship"? Where is that Argosy which sailed once upon a time under Mrs. Henry Wood, to say nothing of that Temple Bar which delighted our youth? And now Harper's is going—Harper's which gave us "Trilby," and some of her clever creator's most fascinating sketches, to say nothing of Mary Wilkins' charming stories or those of Richard Harding Davis. But stay, what is this? We are wrong. It is only Harper's Weekly that is leaving the old firm for the capable hands of Mr. Norman Hapgood. The monthly is still with us, so all's well with the world.

Sir J. M. Barrie, the latest baronet of literature, has been this week one of the most interested and constant spectators of the Chesterton-Isaacs trial, and, despite the sweltering heat of the crowded court, has spent several hours listening intently to the rather prolix, if sensational, evidence. Noted trials, by the way, seem to exercise a potent fascination alike over authors and actors, and it is rare that the curtain is rung up on any Old Bailey drama worth hearing that the audience does not include some half dozen of them as spectators. It was a distinguished actor, who, hearing him make one of his great efforts in court, hit off in a phrase a certain peculiarity of Sir Edward Clarke's oratory that had puzzled many observers. "He speaks like an actor," he said, "with the gesture first, and the word afterwards." A true bill, as those who have watched Sir Edward will agree. * * * * *

The death of Lord Avebury removes from our midst one of the most potent forces for culture that our generation has known. The author of "The Pleasures of Life" had the great satisfaction of interesting in literature more thousands of men and women, to whom books had previously made no appeal, than any other man of his time, and his suggested "Hundred Best Books" opened a fascinating and stimulating discussion, echoes of which still break upon our ears. Lord Avebury's own works achieved huge sales. One is in its two hundred and fifty-ninth thousand, and still going strong. This is nearly the record—nearly, but not quite. We believe that the work with absolutely the largest number of readers on record is one by Dr. James Cantlie, co-author of that fascinating volume "Sun Yat Sen and the Chinese Revolution," and dealing with first aid to the wounded. Next comes "Black Beauty," published by Jarrold's, whose "Mystery of a Hansom Cab" makes a good third.

We note that an esteemed contemporary declares that public opinion demands something more of a Laureate nowadays than the turning out of innocuous verses on special occasions. He must represent, as Wordsworth and Tennyson represented, the high-water mark of the poetry of his age. True, O King; but where does public opinion suggest that we should find such a one? The Globe strongly backs Mr. Kipling for the vacancy, and that the author of "Recessional" comes nearer to being a poet and a national poet than any other living writer of verse seems to us incontrovertible. But will he do as Laureate? We fancy ourselves reading a list of questions addressed to our already sufficiently harassed Prime Minister as to whether the Rudyard had been Kipling in his official capacity, or merely as a private person. No; the suggestion, interesting though it be, is likely to remain—a suggestion. But that is no reason why readers of EVERYMAN should not discuss it. * * * * *

The fact that the Pall Mall Gazette actually dares to suggest that the Laureateship should be bestowed upon a lady, none other, of course, than Mrs. Meynell, reminds us that we have travelled far indeed from the days when Robert Southey told Charlotte Brontë that a woman had no business to have inky fingers. In fact, whereas it used to be the fashion years ago for women novelists to adopt a male nom de plume, so warmly have the public cottoned to the idea of the lady serialist that a mere man journalist told the writer the other day that he thought of adopting a feminine pseudonym, some such high-sounding title as the authors of society romances loved to confer on their heroines years ago, as, for instance, Lady Ermyntrude de Vere or Evangeline Strode. But has it really come to that?

The question of literary pseudonyms is always interesting. Some of the most popular writers of our time have owed not a little to the potency of some happy, if enigmatic, nom de plume. We remember, for instance, Mademoiselle Ixe, not to mention "Ouida" or Fiona MacLeod, and whose identity only death revealed. Again, "Max O'Rell" was a happy inspiration, and Mark Twain—but we must not emphasise the obvious.

THE POSITION OF THE ENGLISH AUTHOR BY WALTER M. GALLICHAN

I.—SOCIALLY

SOME years ago I was walking in the country with an author, a younger man than myself, who announced that he was more in sympathy with the traditions, the ideals, and the manners of the upper class than with those of the middle section of the community, including the professional "intellectuals" who write books.

"There's one thing about authorship," he said with conviction; "it is a passport into good society."

My sardonic chuckle somewhat astonished him.

"You don't think so?" he asked.

"Certainly not. 'Society,' using the word in your sense, does not want to know authors as authors. 'Society' disapproves of artists of every species. You are thinking of a few literary lions, who are sometimes on view in the drawing-rooms of the high-born and the wealthy. But those lions, my dear fellow, are rarely there because they are literary artists. Outside of literary circles it is no distinction to be a fine writer. The author who is 'received' in English aristocratic and landed gentry company is not often there through his claim as an artist. He is there because he was born in one of those classes, or because he has a seat in Parliament, or because he is rich or socially influential. His art gives him scarcely any prestige in 'society,' nor, indeed, amongst the community at large. We don't like authors and artists merely on account of their artistic achievements. When we accept them it is for other reasons."

I did not convince my friend. Since that conversation he has written many books and gained a recognised place in his profession. Some of his works have been lavishly praised. I do not know what efforts he has made to penetrate the sacred portals of "good society," but I know that he still frequents the symposia of impecunious "intellectuals," and that Mayfair knows him not.

I.

Generally speaking, the author in this country does not yearn for recognition in the social sense. I am not referring to socially ambitious literary tradesmen, tainted with the snobbery of their compatriots, but to authors who take their art seriously, and are without any ambition greater than attaining excellence in their work. Such writers are as aloof from "society" as small shopkeepers. And, unlike the small shopkeeper, they have no desire to enter it. It is well, for the upper ten, the smart set, and the sporting set will have nothing to do with them.

The other day a man of letters, whose wife is a highly distinguished writer, came up to me in a club and hailed me as a prophet.

"Do you remember, some time ago, when I was going down into the country to live, telling me that the 'good families' would not seek our company? Well, you were right. Nobody who was anybody was interested in us. In the same village was a very gifted painter. Some of the 'good families' had never heard of him. When someone revealed his fame they said, 'If he is famous why does he live in a little cottage?'"

This comment is pregnant. It reveals the common British attitude towards the artistic class. If the writers and the painter in this charming Philistine village had possessed conventional credentials above and beyond their acknowledged power of expressing beautiful things, the doors of county society would have been wide open to them.

II.

I am citing concrete instances to make good my contention that Great Britain, of all civilised countries known to me, cares the least for letters and the arts. Here, then, is another instance. An author, who describes himself as "a minor novelist," called upon me lately and said that he intended to live in France for the future. Now, this novelist has not only won a success of esteem among critics and brother writers; he has also contrived to make a fair income by his novels. But the atmosphere of Philistine dislike in which he finds himself as a novelist in England, impels him to seek a home where the level of intelligence is higher, and where the man who follows an art conscientiously is valued for that alone, whether he is patrician or vulgar, rich or poor.

It was not always so in our country. Unless I am deceived by my reading, there was more general esteem for the makers of art in the days of Johnson, Reynolds, Goldsmith, and Garrick than exists to-day. The new conditions have arisen with the decay of cultured ancient families, the enormous increase of illiterate plutocrats, a growing vulgarity of life and aspiration, and a setting up of commercial standards and valuations. The worth of things in cash is all that counts nowadays. Commerce has enslaved, corrupted, and overwhelmed us. If the artist is a man of property he is considered successful as an author, or a painter, or a musician. This is the absolute criterion. The impecunious poet, or dramatist, or composer, no matter how divine may be his faculty of expression, is ignored socially by his compatriots. Why doesn't he "push," "hustle," and advertise like the rest of the throng who are making piles of money by sharp methods in business?

III.

'And there is lamentably true counsel in the gibe. For it is well known by those who observe, that even the true artists amongst us often remain undiscovered on their merits alone. They must be "boosted," "puffed," "boomed," like a new soap or pill. The public is too unintelligent to discover talent. There must be flamboyant "expert publicity."

Socially, the literary artist has no status. He is almost a pariah. He finds no sympathy and no understanding of his aims and endeavours, except in his own class. And his own class is extremely circumscribed in England. Those who speak his own language are few indeed. Often he is one of the loneliest souls in the community. His books are read by his fellow-writers, by professional reviewers, by publishers' readers on the watch for potential "sellers" for their firms, and by a scanty following of admirers who have the sense to recognise his gifts. That is all. His guerdon is the satisfaction yielded by sincere work. He is wise if he realises that he will never be regarded by his neighbours as a useful member of the community nor as a man worth knowing.

II.—FINANCIALLY

When we pass to the consideration of the position of the serious author as a paid professional man we unfold a dreary tale of penury. The emotional sufferings of the artist are inevitable. They are always acuter than the pains and sorrows of men and women of less imagination and sensibility. The artist rejoices exceedingly, and derives raptures from things that hardly stir the senses and emotions of his less impressionable fellow-men. But he has to bear more than the normal heritage of spiritual tribulation, and to this are often added the cares of a sterilising poverty. An acquaintance with need may be salutary, even in the case of the most sensitive author, for experience is one of the Muses. But a prolonged conflict with poverty is devastating to an artist. "Indigence is the death of the soul," wrote George Gissing.

I.

A writer constantly beset by the sordid cares of poverty must tend to view life in grey tones. Pecuniary anxiety is quite incompatible with that zest for living that the artist should experience at least in the same degree as he feels grief. The outlook for the young author who respects his art and refuses to prostitute his gifts, is fraught with the menace of actual want. A first book may gain very high critical esteem and be announced as a literary success; yet the writer may receive only a few pounds in royalties for his labour of months. There are recognised novelists whose incomes are barely a hundred pounds a year. They earn about fifty pounds from a novel and produce two books in twelve months. I am not referring to unpopular inferior writers, whose work has a meagre commercial value, but to minor authors of distinction in the artistic sense.

I know an author who has not made more than twenty-five pounds from the total sales of four novels. And yet a leading daily paper, not given to sentimental literary appreciations, acclaimed him some time ago as a novelist of the first rank.

The author who aims at creating literature, instead of turning out literary shoddy, is, financially speaking, often the worst paid man in the community.

II.

Whatever authors may think of their treatment at the hands of publishers, it is a fact that publishers often make the barest profit from a book that has aroused the enthusiasm of critics; and in some instances such volumes show a loss. Testifying from twenty-five years' experience as an author, and from the evidence that I have gained as a literary agent, I can only compare the lot of many conscientious and able-writers with that of the sweated worker in the meanest of industries.

Readers are singularly ill-informed as to the monetary position of accredited authors. Even well-known writers who have won a position, frequently receive not more than three hundred pounds for a book that has absorbed their chief energy during six or eight months of toil; while many brilliant literary men consider themselves fortunate if they make half that sum. There can be no comparison between these rewards and those of any other professional man of equal ability. It is a fact that many books of merit do not yield one penny piece to the authors. It is also true that much of the finest work is never published at all.

III.

I shall be asked, "What is the cause?" and, "What is the remedy?" The principal cause why many excellent authors never escape from Grub Street is that the average Englishman rarely reads books. Unless he can borrow books he does not read anything but newspapers. A rich man will give splendid hospitality to his friend, an author, and spend the price of a set of his books on wines and cigars; but he rarely buys a single copy of his friend's works. Most people, if they buy a book at all, grudge the expense ruefully, and resolve to be more careful another time. Books are regarded as sheer luxuries by people who expend hundreds of pounds yearly on their wine-cellar.

I have no ready method for inducing my compatriots to acquire a passion for reading worthy books. That is the perennial problem for authors, publishers, and booksellers. I have some theories, that is all.

The hard case of the author is often ascribed to the rapacity of the publisher. Undoubtedly there have been, and still are, publishers who drive grinding bargains with inexperienced writers, but their number is dwindling. The average publisher is a keen business man, "out" to do the best that he can for himself. He is not invariably a shameless exploiter of unwary geniuses. Publishers certainly take risks with untried and young writers, and sometimes they have reason to regret buying the "literary book" that adorns their list with extracts from adulatory reviews.

If a writer sets out to develop his aptitude and give only of his best powers, he must either be prepared to face need for some years at least, or find a wealthy man who will subsidise him till he has a secure position. I am writing seriously. Why should not a rich man derive as much pleasure and excitement from running a young author of real promise as from running a racehorse? The matter could be put on a business basis. Let the speculator claim a percentage of the author's income as soon as he is fairly established as a "seller" at libraries.

In this article I have dealt only with writers of genuine æsthetic merit and high endeavour. It is these who have harrowing tales to recount, and not the purveyors of popular serial tales and meretricious volumes of fiction that sell in tens of thousands.

FROM BALZAC.

WRITERS, officials, the Church from its pulpits, the Press in its columns—all to whom chance has given any kind of influence over the masses—ought to proclaim it again and again: "Hoarding is a social crime."—The Member for Arcis.

We must not expect that different natures should resemble each other in the expression of their feelings, any more than we look for the same fruits from different trees.—Béatrix.

SHADOW-GOBLINS*

* * * BY A. C. MASON

PETERKIN stole away from the great lawn where all the guests were enjoying themselves. He did not like gentlemen to pick him up and ladies to lift him on their knees. It was very kind of them, but, deep in his childish brain, he objected, and longed to leave everything for his own friends and playmates, the flowers and the birds. He was a strange little boy, and loved to wander in remote parts of the grounds where everything was wild. He went there now, towards the big pond with the fish in it, and the fir-trees round the banks. Here he would often sit for hours, watching, when the sky was cloudy, the shadow-goblins race over the water, hurrying after something they could never catch. His nurse, when she found out where he went, had frightened him with stories of the shadow-goblins, how they pinched little boys and sometimes smothered them. She hoped by these means to make him afraid of the pond; but instead of fearing it, he grew to love it more than ever, although on very gloomy days, when the water looked black and the shadow-goblins loitered on the surface, he felt that he would like to run as fast as he could indoors again and tell his mother everything. But he never did so. His mother was too clever and always too busy to have his small confidences. Therefore the shadow-goblins remained his secret, to be watched at furtive intervals and be observed in silence save for the questions of the breeze and the songs of birds.

On his way to the pond, a butterfly asked him to follow, and away he ran after it. The butterfly settled on a rose, to refresh itself, and he watched it. His eyes were very wide as the butterfly drank, wings a-quiver, for he was thinking about the story of the angel who was very, very tired and could find nowhere to sleep. At last the angel saw a rose, which alone of all the flowers offered her shelter. She slept, and awakening, wondered how she could repay the rose's kindness.

But here Peterkin could not remember what happened. He still watched the butterfly, and wondered if butterflies and angels were much alike; he could easily imagine the butterfly asleep beneath the petals of a rose. Then, as he looked, the butterfly flattened its wings and fluttered away, alighting on a beautiful pale rose-bud a little further on. Peterkin followed, and all at once he knew that butterflies and angels were each other, for this rose was a moss-rose, and he now remembered the end of the tale. Grateful for the shelter so sweetly offered, the angel gave the rose a coat of moss, so that this kindest and most gracious of all roses should be distinguished from the others.

Peterkin was so excited after remembering this legend, that he looked under several moss-roses very carefully, hoping to find an angel sleeping. He was disappointed, but felt happier when he remembered it was still daylight, and angels would not be sleepy yet. He would wait until it was nearer their bedtime. Soon after this, the butterfly fluttered away again, and lost itself in a bed of pansies.

Peterkin missed the butterfly, but forgot to look for it. There were so many other beautiful things in that wild garden, so much to interest him. The bees! they were having a splendid game, hurrying in and out of the flowers, gathering honey with which to feed their queen. It was kind of them to work so hard for her, but he hoped that soon they would have stored enough food, and could then build her a nicer palace than the funny straw one at the other end of the garden. He knew the bees, and the bees knew him. One settled on his hand and walked about, then flew off to a lily and went inside, right up to the top of it. Peterkin tip-toed very softly to the lily, and drew it down until he could peep in and watch the bee crawling round and round. It was all very beautiful, and he wondered if God lived on honey and the angels brought it to Him.

* The author dedicates this story to all those parents and others who try to control and guide children by frightening them.

Soon he returned to the roses, because he loved them best. Touching one, so that he could smell its fragrance, a drop of dew rolled out from amidst the blend of petals. At once Peterkin was sympathetic. He knew the rose was crying, and he knew the cause: it was because it had not offered to let the angel sleep beneath its leaves, and it had been sorrowful ever since. He understood perfectly, for, sometimes, when he forgot to be polite or felt cross or tired, he was miserable himself and cried.

A thrush began to sing its prayers somewhere in the trees overhead. Looking up, at last he saw it, perched on the topmost branch. Too happy to move, he waited for the answering prayer. And presently he heard its full, glorious notes throbbing through the air from a distance. He listened for a long time, until, suddenly, as it had started, the thrush above him ceased to pray. Then the bird went to bed, and Peterkin knew that the angels must be going to bed as well. Very quietly he moved back to the moss-roses, and peeped under their leaves. He sought one after the other, hoping for his desire, longing to talk with an angel about Heaven. But he grew tired, and was very disappointed, for he could not find any. Still he persevered, until at length it became more difficult for him to see: the shade beneath the roses was denser, and he knew that even were an angel nestling there, it would be hard to find her.

It was cold. Standing up, Peterkin looked round him, and felt lonely. Dusk was near, and all at once he spied the shadow-goblins creeping over the ground. He had never seen them so large, never before seen them so terrifying, and he was frightened. The garden was still; the song of birds had died with the throstle's hymn, and everything was hushed. He was very frightened, and ran as fast as he could to get away from those wicked shadow-goblins, who pinched little boys and sometimes smothered them. Without knowing it he ran towards the pool, stopping breathless when he saw the water. Although there were no ripples, although it looked so dark, yet he was not afraid of it. He only feared the shadow-goblins.

He loved the lake, and knew it would protect him; the lake was his friend. At the edge he knelt down, looking for the silver fish; but instead of the fish, he saw another little boy looking up at him, as if asking him to go and play. He was glad to see him, and wanted to join him very much, because he was frightened and lonely. For a moment he hesitated, but one glance round determined him. Very near, almost within reach, a shadow-goblin crept—silently, stealthily, filling him with dread. He paused no longer, but, looking down into the water, held out his hands to the little boy he still saw there.

Later, rain-drops fell from the fringe of a passing cloud, mingling with the waters of the pool—angels' tears indeed.

"THE CONTINENTAL SUNDAY" * * * BY REV. JAMES ADDERLEY

THIS is a plea for the dispassionate consideration of the Continental Sunday. I think we must confess that, with all our enthusiasm for the British Sunday and our contempt for that of our neighbours', we have not succeeded in doing anything very much better than they in securing one day's rest in seven. And, first, of our own Sunday. Is it not time that we more frankly allowed that the old-fashioned Sabbatarian argument will not hold water? Can these statements be denied? (1) That, historically speaking, the Christian Sunday is not the same thing as the Jewish Sabbath; (2) that our Lord's attitude towards the Sabbath was revolutionary, in the sense that He went against the religious view of His day, which is the view that modern Sabbatarians want to rehabilitate and fasten on to the Christian Sunday; (3) that St. Paul knew nothing of a Christian Sabbath on the first day of the week; (4) that the "first day of the week" was a day of joy and worship, and had no connection with the Sabbath; (5) that even when Constantine, in the fourth century, combined the Mithra Festival and the Christian Lord's Day and decreed a holiday, he did not forbid some work, and therefore was not reconstituting the Sabbath; (6) that the first Reformers were opposed to making Sunday a Sabbath, as savouring of Judaism.

I.

If all this is allowed, we are enabled to start afresh in modern times to make our Sunday useful and health-giving. We can take what we like in the Sabbatarian idea and leave what we do not like, without any sense of disobedience to Divine law. We can get at the spirit without being at pains to attain uniformity in the letter. Catholics can insist on their Mass, Protestants on something else, while Secularists and all can agree in securing a seventh day rest. Peace will never come so long as Christians try to force a law which they think is Divine upon people who either suspect that the law is not Divine, or reject the God whose law it is supposed to be. We all agree that we want a weekly rest. Why should we quarrel over the particular day, and why should we try to coerce our fellows in the name of religion? We do not dream of doing this about any other religious duty, not even about religious duties the sanction for which is undoubted. Why should we choose the one religious practice the sanction for which is extremely doubtful and impose it on others?

I know that it is argued that the Sabbatarian idea of Sunday is the only bit of religion left in many cases, and that it would be perilous to disturb it. But does any good ever come from obscurantism? Have we any right to deceive ignorant people and make sad those whom the Lord has not made sad? This we do if we transfer the restrictions of the Hebrew Sabbath to the Christian Sunday. Of course, it is right to be very tender with old-established prejudices, and, as Robertson of Brighton pointed out long ago, it would be as wrong to ride roughshod over a Scotchman's feelings about Sunday as it would be to do the same over an Italian peasant's Mariolatry. But there is no need to ride roughshod over anybody. We want liberty and common sense. We need to learn from all quarters in this as in everything else.

II.

And this brings me to the Continental Sunday. I am not going to argue for the imposition of the French Sunday or the German Sunday upon English people, but I do believe that we can learn from them in some directions how to improve our own. In the first place, we should leave off making wholesale condemnations. We should divide the subject of our criticism, and know exactly what it is we are judging at one particular time. For example, to compare the Sunday morning of the Grand Prix with the same morning at St. Paul's Cathedral is no more fair than to compare the Oberammergau Passion play with the Brick Lane bird market. If we compare the churchgoing public of Paris with the churchgoing public of London, I think the balance weighs in favour of the former. If we compare the occupation of the French, German, and Belgian townspeople between church hours with the occupation of the Scottish people at the same time, I should again say that the foreigners have my vote. I once spent a Sunday in France with ordinary middle-class and working people, and it compared very favourably with the many Sundays I have spent under similar circumstances in Birmingham. We all went to Mass in the morning. In a truly Christian way, I was offered the "Pain bénit," though a Protestant. After church, some of the men sat on a committee to deal with sick and poor relief, while the boys went to their club and played games. In the afternoon there was a fête at the neighbouring town, and everybody seemed to be thoroughly happy. No doubt many of them went to Vespers or Benediction in the evening, though I could not stay.

III.

Now, what happens in England under the same conditions? In the morning probably nothing happens, for these kind of people are in bed, if Britons. But, granting that they get up for an "early morning school" or Matins, is their worship as much like what we read of in the Acts as that of my French friends? It is more likely that they go to an evening service only. All the rest of the day is spent in hanging about dull and empty streets. There are no amusements, scarcely any music, no cafés. The only objection to these things is the Sabbatarian objection that some Divine law would be infringed if they were open, and this, as we have seen, is very doubtful. Would it not be much better for all parties if we agreed to drop the religious argument and adopt the purely philanthropic one, that the "Sabbath was made for man"? Let us all combine on the securing of one day's rest in seven for every worker. By this means we are much more likely to secure liberty for the Christian to keep a good Sunday, and, at the same time, we shall not be irritating the Secularists by trying to impose upon them a law which they see no reason for obeying. The Secularists have surely as much right to have their opinions respected as the Mohammedans or the Jews under British rule. We do not interfere with these in India or in London. This does not mean that all Sunday restrictions are to be done away. It means that we should approach the subject as citizens first, sympathising with the prejudices of all parties, and fastening on the points where we all agree, rather than endeavouring to force our own point of view as Christians on the masses who are not so. We must do this quite openly and honestly, not trying to squeeze in a little Christianity mixed up with the philanthropy and statecraft, or trying to capture the Secularist by pretending to believe in a seventh day rest for his body, while secretly we want to run him into our Bethels by shutting up all other doors but these. Above all, let us avoid that cant about "charity" which concedes the Sunday cinematograph, provided the proceeds are given to us. This hypocrisy comes from mixing up religion and politics. If it is wrong to have picture shows on Sunday, it is wrong, whatever the financial object. It is not really wrong; but we have not the courage to say so.

Now, if we will treat the subject as citizens, we shall soon find the way clear to benefiting all alike, whether Christians or not. This is the policy of our Continental brethren, and the result is most satisfactory to all parties. They begin by recognising facts. It would be perfectly useless to try to shut up the restaurants or all the places of amusement on Sundays. They therefore devote their energies to reforms in regard to opening other shops or factories. But even here they are not in too much of a hurry, and they insist on the one day a week before attempting to make it necessarily Sunday. At the same time, having regard to the religious people, they do secure time for churchgoing to a very large number of people. This is the important point: it is "churchgoing" they want to protect, and not Sunday idleness. And here, too, the Roman Catholic authorities are sensible in recognising facts. They make arrangements by which those occupied on Sunday mornings can fulfil their religious obligations in the week, or can have them modified during busy seasons. Another thing to be noticed is this. The Sunday closing laws are no more "Sabbatarian" in Protestant countries than in Catholic ones. In fact, there are, so far as I can see, more restrictions in Paris than in Berlin. But in all of these cities there is an elasticity and a common sense that is most refreshing, and, what is best of all, practically succeeds in securing to the hard-worked man more rest than he gets in England. Of course, when I say "rest" in this connection, I do not mean "doing nothing." I take the essence of rest to consist in "change."

IV.

Let me conclude with setting out the chief features of Sunday law in Germany, France, and Belgium, so that my readers can judge for themselves whether, things being what they are in those countries and in ours, the "Continental Sunday," as it is at present, does not suit the modern situation more rationally than the British one. In France. By law all factories and shops are closed on Sundays, but the exemptions are many and various. Factories where it is necessary to keep furnaces going, and where the men work in shifts, and in some other cases are exempted. So are all theatres, restaurants, tobacco shops, and places where food and drink are sold. Some places of business are exempt from Sunday closing on certain days, or for a certain time of the day. But for all these (except, I think, the theatres) one day's rest in seven is secured for all employees. The museums and art galleries are closed on Mondays. The national theatres are able to give one day's rest in seven, owing to the fact that they vary their programme every night and work in shifts. It does not seem clear that the scene-shifters and suchlike in places of amusement, or the waiters in cafés are uniformly allowed this one day's rest. But at least it would be agreed that the French law has resulted in the closing of an enormous number of places, and in the one day's rest for an enormous number of persons. A great deal of official inspection is necessary, and a great deal of vigilance on the part of trade unions, but, on the whole, it seems to work well, and the tendency is to extend the law, so that in time the anomalies and injustices will be minimised.

V.

In Germany. By Imperial law—i.e., all over the Empire. (a) Shops. Work is forbidden on Christmas Day, Easter Day. On other Sundays no more than five hours' work is allowed, except where there is other local State regulation. The maximum five hours must not coincide with the hours of Divine service. (b) Factories, mills, etc. Ordinary workers must not be employed during Sunday. Twenty-four hours must be completely free from work. Exceptions are made for men watching furnaces, etc., and there is further protection for juveniles. (c) Exemptions. Hotels, restaurants, railways, trams, theatres, dispensaries are exempted, but labourers employed in these are given a free day during the week. Local laws in some States go further than the Imperial law, and further restrictions are in contemplation by Imperial law, reducing the hours from five to three in shops.

I am told that there is unquestionably very much less Sunday labour in Berlin than there used to be. Of course, in this Protestant city, the theatres are open as in Paris. In fact, whereas the opera is closed in Paris, it is open in Berlin.

VI.

In Belgium. (1) Sunday is the normal day of rest. Six days' labour only is the rule. (This does not apply to domestic servants, members of a family who work for their parents, and certain trades, such as water transit, fishing, etc.) (2) The exceptions are many and various—e.g., urgent cases, where work must be finished at once, eatables and perishable goods, caretakers, etc. (3) Workmen can be employed thirteen days in fourteen, or six and a half days in seven in certain trades, such as hotels, tobacco, flowers, chemists, baths, newspapers, carriages, light and water supply, transport. The one day's rest in fourteen, or the two half-day's, need not necessarily be on Sundays. The half-holiday must be before or after 1 p.m., and work on that day must not exceed five hours. The rest-day is enforced by a strict system of fines, varying from 20 francs to 5,000 for repeated offences, involving a very elaborate system of inspection.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

It is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

- | | |
|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Composer. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace,
Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

“EVERYMAN” CONTINENTAL TOURS

Instant Success of our Unique Holiday Announcement.

A GRATIFYING RESPONSE.

We are particularly gratified at the great response to the Unique Holiday Plans which we unfolded to our readers last week. From all parts of the United Kingdom applications have come for the EVERYMAN Tours Book; indeed, the response has been so widespread that there is the clearest indication that the EVERYMAN Tours fulfil a real and long-felt want.

A UNIQUE HOLIDAY.

It is because we have struck a new note in foreign travel that we are confidently expecting large and successful parties at the various holiday centres which have been selected for our Tours this summer. From the time the party leaves London until the visitors bid each other “good-bye,” all are looked after by a cultured and experienced conductor, and everything possible is done for the comfort and enjoyment of each member of the party. All that is most interesting and delightful in the places visited is shown. The whole conception and atmosphere of the Tour is friendly, refined and congenial—a combination which will secure for our readers the maximum amount of pleasure which a holiday can provide.

PICTURESQUE SCENERY AND MEDIÆVAL CITIES.

Wherever our readers travel—whether amidst beautiful mountain or river scenery, or in the fascinating educative environment of mediæval cities—they will have nothing but the happiest experiences, and the happiest of memories will remain after the holiday has passed. The mediæval cities of Flanders, redolent with artistic and historic associations, alternating with the picturesque valleys of the Ardennes, the quaint, old-world towns of Holland, the ancient streets of Rouen, and the bright, sparkling boulevards of Paris, are some of the places which our readers will visit. In Switzerland four of the loveliest centres have been chosen for our Tours—the beautiful lakeside towns of Lucerne and Territet, and the mountain villages of Grindelwald and Chamonix, the one at the foot of the towering Wetterhorn and the other nestling beneath the mighty Mont Blanc range.

NORMANDY AND PARIS.

One of the Tours which is especially attracting our readers is the fortnight's Tour to Rouen and Paris, the alternation of the mediæval city, with its magnificent Gothic buildings and its historic associations, and the picturesque scenery of the Seine, with the gay, brilliant atmosphere of Paris, being exceptionally delightful and interesting.

ROUEN, THE CRADLE OF THE ENGLISH RACE.

Here in Rouen is the beginning of English history. The foundations of the Empire came from the ancient capital of Normandy, and days of sight-seeing, wandering along quaint, old-world streets, visiting the majestic Cathedral, the beautiful Gothic churches of St. Ouen and St. Maclou, the places where William the Conqueror died and where the gentle Maid of Orleans was cruelly put to death, are pleasantly followed by drives and steamer excursions in the Valley of the Seine to such delightful spots as Bonsecours, Caudebec (beloved of artists), Les Andelys and the famed Château Gaillard, and St. Adrien, with its picturesque church cut into the solid rock.

PARIS.

And then to Paris! Paris, the gay, brilliant, beautiful centre of modern civilisation! Paris, the city of a thousand lights, of merry laughter, of bewildering, cosmopolitan crowds.

The week in the bright city passes all too soon—days of sight-seeing, mornings in the busy streets, afternoons in the Bois de Boulogne or at St. Cloud or at Versailles, evenings on the Boulevards spent in watching the eyer-passing, laughing throng.

THE RECKONING.

The whole of this fortnight's Tour, crammed with fresh interest and delight from beginning to end, costs, inclusive of travelling, hotels (three meals being provided each day), all excursions, and the services of the conductor, the astonishingly low sum of 8½ guineas, and another 8s. 6d. provides all gratuities and conveyance of luggage between stations and hotels for the fortnight.

BOOK NOW!

This is but one of a large and comprehensive programme of Tours. In inviting you to join one of the parties, we urge you to book at once. The parties will soon be filled, and, once the number is complete, no more can be taken for that Tour.

THE “EVERYMAN” HOLIDAY BOOKLET.

We have prepared a special Illustrated Holiday Book containing all particulars of our Tours and all prices. A postcard brings you this choice little book, which contains a fund of information and some delightful views.

“Everyman, I will go with thee, And be thy guide. In thy most need to go by thy side.”

Address: The Tours Dept., “EVERYMAN,” Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

MIRABEAU

IL était né gentilhomme, d'une famille antique, réfugiée et établie en Provence, mais originaire d'Italie. La souche était toscane. Cette famille était de celles que Florence avait rejetées de son sein dans les orages de sa liberté, et dont le Dante reproche en vers si âpres l'exil et la persécution à sa patrie. Le sang de Machiavel et le génie remuant des républiques italiennes se retrouvaient dans tous les individus de cette race. Les proportions de leurs âmes sont au-dessus de leur destinée. Vices, passions, vertus, tout y est hors de ligne. Les femmes y sont angéliques ou perverses, les hommes sublimes ou dépravés, la langue même y est accentuée et grandiose comme les caractères. Il y a dans leurs correspondances les plus familières la coloration et la vibration des langues héroïques de l'Italie.

L'éducation de Mirabeau fut rude et froide comme la main de son père, qu'on appelait l'ami des hommes, mais que son esprit inquiet et sa vanité égoïste rendirent le persécuteur de sa femme et le tyran de ses enfants. Pour toute vertu, on ne lui enseigna que l'honneur.

Entré de bonne heure au service, il ne prit des mœurs militaires que le goût du libertinage et du jeu. La main de son père l'atteignait partout, non pour le relever, mais pour l'écraser davantage sous les conséquences de ses fautes. Sa jeunesse se passe dans les prisons d'Etat, ses passions s'y enveniment dans la solitude, son génie s'y aiguise contre les fers de ses cachots, son âme y perd la pudeur, qui survit rarement à l'infamie de ces châtiments précoces.

Retiré de prison, pour tenter, de l'aveu de son père, un mariage difficile avec mademoiselle de Marignan, riche héritière d'une des grandes maisons de Provence, il s'exerce, comme un lutteur, aux ruses et aux audaces de la politique sur ce petit théâtre d'Aix. Astuce, séduction, bravoure, il déploie toutes les ressources de sa nature pour réussir : il réussit ; mais à peine est-il marié que de nouvelles persécutions le poursuivent, et que le château-fort de Pontarlier se referme sur lui.

Un amour que les "Lettres à Sophie" ont rendu immortel lui en ouvre les portes. Il enlève madame de Monnier à son vieil époux. Les amants heureux quelques mois se réfugient en Hollande. On les atteint, on les sépare, on les enferme, l'une au couvent, l'autre au donjon de Vincennes. L'amour, qui, comme le feu dans les veines de la terre, se découvre toujours dans quelque repli de la destinée des grands hommes, allume en un seul et ardent foyer toutes les passions de Mirabeau. Dans la vengeance, c'est l'amour outragé qu'il satisfait ; dans la liberté, c'est l'amour qu'il rejoint et qu'il délivre ; dans l'étude, c'est encore l'amour qu'il illustre. Entré obscur dans son cachot, il en sort écrivain, orateur, homme d'Etat, mais pervers, prêt à tout, même à se vendre, pour acheter de la fortune et de la célébrité. Le drame de la vie est conçu dans sa tête ; il ne lui faut plus qu'une scène, et le temps la lui prépare. Dans l'intervalle du peu d'années qui s'écoule pour lui entre sa sortie du donjon de Vincennes et la tribune de l'Assemblée nationale, il entasse des travaux polémiques qui auraient lassé tout autre homme, et qui le tiennent seulement en haleine.

MIRABEAU

HE was born a nobleman and of ancient lineage, refugee and established in Provence, but of Italian origin: the progenitors were Tuscan. The family was one of those whom Florence had cast from her bosom in the stormy excesses of her liberty, and for which Dante reproaches his country in such bitter strains for her exiles and persecutions. The blood of Machiavelli and the restless genius of the Italian republics were found in all the individuals of this race. The proportions of their souls exceed their destiny: vices, passions, virtues are all in excess. The women are angelic or perverse, the men sublime or depraved, and their language is as emphatic and lofty as their aspirations. There is in their most familiar correspondence the colour and tone of the heroic tongues of Italy.

Mirabeau's education was as rough and frigid as the hand of his father, who was styled the friend of man, but whose restless spirit and selfish vanity rendered him the persecutor of his wife and the tyrant of his family. The only virtue he was taught was honour. Entering the army at an early age, he acquired nothing of military habits except a love of licentiousness and gambling. The hand of his father was felt everywhere, not to aid him in rising, but to crush him still lower under the consequences of his errors: his youth was passed in State prisons; his passions, becoming envenomed by solitude, and his intellect being rendered more acute by contact with the irons of his dungeon, his mind lost that modesty which rarely survives the infamy of such precocious punishments.

Released from gaol, in order, with his father's consent, to attempt to form a marriage, beset with difficulties, with Mademoiselle de Marignan, a rich heiress of one of the greatest families of Provence, he gets accustomed, as a wrestler, to all the stratagems and daring schemes of politics on the small stage of Aix. Cunning, seduction, courage, he used every resource of his nature to succeed, and he succeeded; but he was hardly married before fresh persecutions beset him, and the stronghold of Pontarlier closed its gates on him. A passion, which his "Lettres à Sophie" has rendered immortal, opened its gates and freed him. He carried off Madame de Monnier from her aged husband. The lovers, happy for some months, took refuge in Holland; they were seized there, separated and shut up, the one in a convent and the other in the dungeon of Vincennes. Love, which, like fire in the veins of the earth, is always detected in some crevice of a great man's destiny, lighted up in a single and ardent blaze all Mirabeau's passions. In his vengeance it was outraged love that he appeased; in liberty, it was love which he sought and liberated; in study, it was love which he illustrated. Entering his cell obscure, he quitted it a writer, an orator, a statesman, but perverted—ripe for anything, even to sell himself, in order to buy fortune and celebrity. The drama of life was conceived in his head; he wanted but the stage, and that time was preparing for him. During the few short years which elapsed for him between his leaving the keep of Vincennes and the tribune of the National Assembly he employed himself with polemic labours which would have weighed down another man, but which only kept him active.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

GALT'S "ANNALS OF THE PARISH" * * * BY HECTOR MACPHERSON

AN Edinburgh reviewer, writing on Galt's masterpiece on its appearance, said: "Before the novelist of the north had conjured away our sympathies from inexorable fathers, wilful daughters, waiting maids, ensigns, rope ladders, and post-chaises; ruined the market for sentiment, shrieks, and swoons; sent into abeyance the whole class of Strephons and Philhisses, the Lydias and Edwins, and made obsolete even the Lovelaces and Grandisons—what chance of escaping derision would have been the man's who should have proposed to work up into a novel such raw and crude materials as the everyday incidents of a remote Scottish parish?" The reviewer goes on to say that Galt owes allegiance to Scott, and that the "Annals of the Parish" would not have been written had the Waverley Novels not appeared. That Scott provoked a reaction against the spasmodic, sentimental, and melodramatic novel of the eighteenth century is admitted, but it is quite a mistake to say that he was the founder of the realistic school to which Galt undoubtedly belonged. So far from Galt being an imitator of Scott, the "Annals of the Parish" was written and offered to Constable three years before the appearance of the Waverley Novels. The manuscript was rejected on the ground that Scottish novels would not succeed.

It is not difficult to understand the decision of Constable, as at that time Scottish literature was not much in demand. A publisher of wide experience, he was in a position to gauge the public taste in the matter of novel-reading. The Union, beneficial to Scotland in many ways, had a detrimental effect upon native literature. England set the fashion. Leading Scotsmen like Hume, Adam Smith, and Robertson, ashamed of their native language and conscious of the backwardness of their country in all that pertained to culture, shook themselves free of the least suspicion of provincialism. To be citizens of the great world of letters was of greater value than to be patriotic Scots. In the eyes of Hume the common people were the "vulgar": their sayings and doings were of no account to the cultured cosmopolitans who from Edinburgh dominated literary Scotland. As Lord Rosebery has remarked, "from the time of the Union of the Crowns, and still more from the legislative Union, Scotland had lapsed into obscurity. She had, indeed, her Robertsons and her Humes writing history to general admiration, but no trace of Scottish authorship was discernible in their works; indeed, every flavour of national idiom was carefully excluded." The revival of the national spirit in literature we owe to Burns and Scott, the one in poetry, the other in fiction. After the appearance of the Waverley Novels no publisher could say that tales dealing with Scottish life could not succeed. The change in the public taste justified Galt in publishing the "Annals of the Parish," which has long since taken its place as a Scottish classic.

Galt owed nothing to Scott. True, Scott, like Galt, is very much at home in dealing with Scottish humble life, but the dominant note of the Waverley Novels is Romanticism. The realistic touches are subordinated to the general design, which is national, not provincial, historic, not domestic. Master of what he himself calls the "bow-wow" style, Scott had no taste for the microscopic methods of Galt. In dealing with the commonplace side of life, another novelist, Susan Ferricr, had achieved a reputation for character drawing, but her sphere of observation and treatment was confined to the higher middle classes, especially the vulgar section. With great satirical power and fine command of humour and insight she has left pictures of Scottish middle-class society in the early nineteenth century life-like in their realism.

Galt struck quite another and distinctive note in Scottish fiction. In his autobiographical sketch he outlines the ideas which were in his mind when he began the "Annals of the Parish." He says: "When very young I wished to write a book that would be for Scotland what the "Vicar of Wakefield" is for England, and early began to observe and to conjecture in what respects the minister of a rural parish differed from the general inhabitants of the country." As an artistic creation Mr. Micah Balwhidder may well be placed alongside of Dr. Primrose. Apart from Galt's success in his portrait of the parish minister, he deserves commendation for his courage in giving a life-like delineation of an evangelistic pastor. In his time, when Moderatism was in fashion, it was considered the correct thing to caricature the evangelical type of clergymen. There is no plot in the novel; yet so delightfully drawn is the character of the worthy divine, with his quaint simplicity, his simple piety, his innocent self-importance and kindliness of heart, that he endears himself to the reader, whose interest in his fifty years of faithful service is maintained to the end. Lord Jeffrey, in his review of the "Annals of the Parish," notes a feature of the book which greatly explains its fascination—what has been aptly called the "juxtaposition of the pathetic and the humorous, the tragic and the commonplace, which we meet with frequently in the world." As Jeffrey puts it, "The natural and tranquil manner in which he (Mr. Balwhidder) puts down great things by the side of little, and considers as exactly on the same level the bursting of the parish mill-dam and the commencement of the American troubles—the victory of Admiral Rodney and the donation of £50 to the kirk session—illustrates in a very pleasing way that law of intellectual as well as of physical optics by which small things at hand appear uniformly greater than larger ones at a distance."

The charm of the "Annals of the Parish" lies in the inimitable way in which Galt has blended the delineation of Mr. Balwhidder's pathos, humour, and simplicity. As illustrative of this take the picture of a parish rake who had been over a love affair, and who, after long service in the army, was found in Chelsea Hospital: "And who should this old man be but the very identical Rab Rickerton that was act and part in Meg Clark's disowned bairn, but had turned out a good soldier, and so in his old days was indoor pensioner and very comfortable; and he said that he had spent his youth in the devil's service and his manhood in the king's, but his old age was given to that of his Maker, which I was blythe and thankful to hear, and he inquired about many a one in the parish, the blooming and the green of his time, but they were all dead and buried; and he had a contrite and penitent spirit, and read his Bible every day, delighting most in the Book of Joshua, the Chronicles, and the Kings."

'As a master of pathos, Galt is seen to advantage in his description of Mrs. Malcolm, the widow of a Clyde shipmaster, who was lost at sea: "She was a genty body, calm and methodical. From morning to night she sat at her wheel, spinning the finest lint, which suited well with her pale hands. She never changed her widow's weeds, and she was aye as if she had just been ta'en out of a bandbox. The tear was often in her e'e when the bairns were at school; but when they came home her spirit was lighted up with gladness, although, poor woman, she had many a time very little to give them."

Apart from its fictional interest, the novel has great value as mirroring the social and economic conditions of the time. It pictures life in the reign of George the Third, when Scotland was in transition from the purely rural to the manufacturing and commercial stage. Into the quaint rural parish came the disturbing and distracting influences of new methods and new ideals; and the charm of the novel largely consists in tracing the effects of the new régime upon the minds of the simple-minded pastor and parishioners. The curious thing is that Galt never meant his book to be received as a novel. He meant it to be, as he himself says, "a kind of treatise on the history of society in the West of Scotland during the reign of George the Third," but he goes on to remark that "the public consider it as a novel, and it is of no use to think of altering the impression with which it has been received." A treatise on social conditions it certainly is, so minute and accurate that, as has been well said, it might almost be printed as an appendix to the old Statistical account of the parishes of Scotland drawn up by the ministers; but the marvellous way in which Galt has subordinated dry economic details to the human element makes his novel a study in psychology as well as sociology. The rise of industrialism, with its influences upon the habits of the people, is described with masterly touches, and while revealing the sordid side of village life indulges in none of the forbidding details of the pessimistic school. Sir George Douglas describes Galt as the forerunner of the realistic movement in Scottish fiction, and rightly remarks that "The Provost" and "The Annals" might almost belong to the age of Tourguenieff and Mr. Henry James. Between them, Scott and Galt have given Scottish life and character a lasting place in fiction. What the one did for the Highlands, the other did for the Lowlands. Galt is the novelist of the commercial, professional, and industrial classes, while Scott represents the feudal class, with its peasantry racy of the soil.

It is remarkable that Galt has had no successor. Certainly the time is ripe for the appearance of a candidate for his mantle. We are in the midst of the industrial revolution, the beginning of which in Galt's day had a marked effect upon Scottish village life. Never was there ampler material for a successful Scottish novel on the lines of the "Annals of the Parish." 'As I have said in my "Intellectual Development of Scotland": "The complexity of modern life, the feverish struggle for existence and success, the thirst for pleasure, the disintegration of religious beliefs, the smug respectability of the middle classes, the Socialistic aspirations of the working classes, the awful contrast between riches and poverty—these things which characterise the Scotland of to-day afford ample scope for a Scottish novelist who has the courage, not to pander to the sentimental side of his countrymen, but to paint a true picture of the time." The hour awaits the novelist who, after the style of Galt, will epitomise the social and industrial history of the Scotland of to-day as revealed in the beliefs, hopes, and fears of the common people.

QUEEN ALEXANDRA'S CRIPPLES

TO THE RICH

A Plea for more Country Homes like that founded by Sir William Treloar at Alton

CHILDREN dear, who run and play,
(Ah, we watch!) for us the way
Seems so long; will you to-day
Think perhaps of how we too
Should so love to race like you?
Can our dream at last come true—
Country home, all peace within it,
Sweet flowers round it, birds about it,
All for us?—Oh, who'll begin it?—
Is it true?—Or must we stay
Here, where streets are close and grey,
Shut in London town, without it?

Even the great Lord Mayor can't quite Build it all; or, if he might,
Thinks perhaps 'twould not be right,
Since we're all kin, here on earth,
Not to let you, born for mirth,
Share the claim, that's yours from birth
Of your sisters and your brothers.
Oft we wish, who have no money,
Each of us could help the others;
But our pain seems all we're worth—
Pain and hunger, dust and dearth—
Life is not all bread and honey!

You have your own tasks to do?—
You are sometimes hurt?—We knew
That before; but if we grew
Straight and strong, we shouldn't mind
Half so much when life's unkind.
We are crippled, left behind,
In the life you share together.
Trees of apples, birds that eat them,
Bees that buzz among the heather,
Streams that thro' the meadows wind—
These in books alone we find:
In the country you may meet them!

We are glad that you have seen
Lakes of blue and meadows green,
Where the daisies laugh between;
But, if you are kind to-day,
Folk who cannot walk, yet may
Lie among the wild flowers gay,
Watch the streamlet kiss the flowers,
Where to silver thread it narrows,
Rest in honeysuckle bowers—
Children dear, oh, can it mean
You'll obey God's thought, that's been Mindful of the fallen sparrows?

He who counts poor feathered things,
Hurt and lamed in legs or wings,
That the tempest earthward flings,—
He who took the whole world's pain
Deep into His heart again,
Bears it still, and not in vain—
He perhaps in tenderest fashion
To your loving hearts hath spoken
With that voice of His compassion,
"More than many sparrows, please,
Count these crippled children, these Birds whose joy-wings are not broken!"

—ANNIE MATHESON.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

RICHARD WAGNER THE MAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the course of an article on Richard Wagner in your issue of May 23rd, Mr. Cuthbert Hadden writes: "There is no denying that Wagner the man, as distinct from Wagner the composer, was neither a very estimable nor a very lovable personality. His relations with women were not beyond reproach"; which has much the same spirit of meanness about it that was intended by the critics and caricaturists of the middle of last century mentioned by Mr. Hadden in the first part of the article.

It is remarkable that with such books as Glasnapp's "Life" and the "Richard Wagner—Mathilda Wesendonck" correspondence before the public, writers still insist on Wagner's immorality; which is, in short, what Mr. Hadden does.

The Wesendonck letters alone, once and for all time, show the world with unmistakable clearness Wagner the man. Ashton Ellis, who translated the letters some eight years ago, very beautifully and sympathetically, in the introductory, speaking of Frau Wesendonck, says: "No one admitted to the honour of Frau Wesendonck's society during the last twenty years of her life—and here I speak from personal experience, however slight—could for a moment believe her to have ever been the heroine of what the baser sort imply when they speak of a 'Tristan and Isolde romance.'"

"This placid, sweet Madonna, the perfect emblem of a pearl, not opal, her eyes still dreaming of Nirvana—no! emphatically no! she could not have been swayed by carnal passion. And these letters, in bulk and in detail, most flatly contradict that implication; nay, more—they prove the justice of my old contention, not mine alone, that the second act of Wagner's drama excludes all possibility of his Tristan, his Isolde, being victims to a coarse desire. In these letters all is pure and spiritual, a Dante and a Beatrice: so must it have been in their intercourse. For my own impression of their recipient—whom I first met in the sad year at Bayreuth, when the master was no more—it was that of the silver moon reflecting a sun that has set long since. Not a word ever fell from her lips of such a love as is revealed here; but every accent of her voice, the gathering moisture in her eye, spelt worship, and from her it was I earliest learnt a truth which added years have simply verified: that in Richard Wagner we have more than a great—a profoundly good man."

May I further trespass on your space with a very few words from this wonderful woman herself? In a letter to Ashton Ellis, she writes: "The tie that bound him to Mathilde Wesendonck, whom he then called his 'Muse,' was of so high, pure, noble, and ideal a nature that, alas! it will only be valued by those that in their own noble chests find the same elevation and selfishness of mind."—I am, sir, etc.,

LEONARD SPALDING.

London, S.W., May 27th, 1913.

OSCAR WILDE—A REMONSTRANCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Pray grant me leave to enter a caveat against a statement made by the writer of your "Literary Notes" in EVERYMAN of May 23rd last, for the benefit

INVEST IN CANADIAN LAND.

A "Swift Current" TO FORTUNE

We Offer an easy instalment plan of investing your Savings in a Security which cannot fail to bring enormous returns.

Swift Current is the fastest growing town in Canada.

Freight yard at Swift Current ready to handle the grain.

CAMERON & ANDERSON, Ltd., 56, Bishopsgate, London, E.C., are offering KENSINGTON GARDENS, Swift Current, at only £10 per lot, 25 feet wide by 120 feet deep, freehold, payments to suit your convenience.

Swift Current has nine banks, seven lumber yards, five churches, flour mills, etc.

Swift Current has seven grain elevators which handled over 2,000,000 bushels of grain last year, and expect to handle 6,000,000 this year—enough to feed every man, woman, and child in Manchester for a whole year.

Swift Current has made this wonderful development on ONE line of Railway (the main line of the Canadian Pacific.)

Swift Current will this year be served by 4 additional lines of railway. This will, of course, enormously increase its rate of development.

We are giving you the opportunity of purchasing, for investment, the cheapest building lots in any Canadian town, and furthermore you can pay for them out of your income.

Let us send you particulars of this wonderful chance, which cannot last long.

Fill in and post the attached coupon to-night.

It binds you to nothing and may lead you to fortune!

COUPON.

Messrs. CAMERON & ANDERSON, Ltd.,
Dept. B, 56, Bishopsgate, London, E.C.

Please mail me, post free, map, booklet and full particulars of your freehold lots in Swift Current.

Name

Address

E.M.

This is where
I keep my Seal Pen—flat
in my pocket
—and there's no risk!

The Seal Pen cannot leak—even when carried upside down. When the cap is on the Seal Pen becomes a sealed tube.

The Seal Pen

writes the instant it is brought into action, for the nib is in the ink whilst the pen is sealed. It writes smoothly and pleasantly.

The Seal Pen has a large ink capacity and fills without taking apart. It is made in three barrel shapes and 12 nib styles. The nib is of 14-carat gold, tipped with costly iridium. Each pen guaranteed for 2 years.

Your Stationer
Sells the Seal

W. H. Smith & Co., Manufacturers Stationers, Kean St., Kingsway, W.C.

of those of your readers who are, as yet, unfamiliar with the work of the late Oscar Wilde. Your reviewer therein declares that both Wilde and Walter Pater (not to mention R. L. Stevenson) "wrote English as if it were a dead language," and that their craftsmanship produced nothing but a "dead loveliness." Does he really mean this?

Leaving Pater's "Renaissance" Essays to take care of themselves, surely no modern prose-writer of genius ever wrote more vivid, bracing, and living English than did the brilliant but ill-starred "lord of language," who was Sebastian Melmoth. From "Ravenna" to the famous "Ballad," every line Wilde wrote was, at any rate, intensely "alive" and stimulating. A "lifeless" author could never have achieved the extraordinary success which Wilde's work has achieved, and more than ever enjoys at this moment, all over the Continent of Europe. In Germany, France, and Russia this is particularly so. The fact that his temporary brain-storms made him a pariah is "nothing against his prose," and if your reviewer will but turn once more to the essay on "The Decay of Lying," or "The Happy Prince" and other fairy tales, to "The Soul of Man," or "The Importance of Being Earnest," he will surely make the amende honorable to the literary genius of one whose work, after a twenty years' test, can no longer be claimed a succès de scandale, and whose prose is being proved not so much "dead" as undying.—I am, sir, etc.,

R. N. GREEN-ARMYTAGE.

Weston-super-Mare, May 28th, 1913.

IRISH PROTESTANTS AND HOME RULE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your contributor, Mr. J. M. Hone, in his article on "Irish Protestants and Home Rule," says it is a "fact that the 'aristocracy' of Irish Protestantism is Nationalist, at least outside of Trinity College." Again, "Were Trinity College Nationalist, one might say that all the intellect of Protestant Ireland was for Home Rule."

I am afraid these statements are made for English consumption, for every Irishman, down to the pauper in the workhouse, knows that nine out of every ten educated Irishmen are Unionists. The whole force and basis of Home Rule rests on the ignorant and uneducated voters. I may explain here that by "educated" I mean those who are in the habit of reading and thinking for themselves, and by "uneducated" those who are not. Messrs. Gwynn, Shaw, Moore, Yeats, etc., are not forces in the matter at all. We, the Unionists, look on them as clever cranks, and they are merely tools in the hands of the real Nationalists. Home Rule was but the pious aspiration of a few enthusiasts till it was married to the land question by Davitt, much against Parnell's desire. When the farmer, the real source of power, through the ballot-box, found that his rent was reduced and that Home Rule promised him a further and greater reduction, he became an enthusiastic Home Ruler. Ireland returned eighty Home Rulers, and is now within measurable distance of Home Rule. This is the real genesis of Home Rule, and every practical man in Ireland knows it. To put the matter in another way. If the uneducated voters were struck off the registers, in all Ireland, from Cork to Antrim, not one single Nationalist member would have a chance of re-election. Mr. Hone thinks that Trinity College is the enemy, but I assert that, if "Trinity" was also struck off the registers, there would still remain an enormous majority for the Union. I am sorry that I cannot sign my real name, Kill that Germ!

with Hall's
Distemper

Hall's Distemper is the greatest protection the householder can have from unclean and infectious walls because when first applied it is a thorough disinfectant and germ destroyer.

It is also the most pleasing of wall-coverings, quick, clean, and inexpensive to apply, and quite free from the objectionable smell of paint.

If you strip your walls of the layers of wallpaper and decorate with Hall's Distemper, your rooms will have a purer atmosphere, and you will gain the refreshing effect of a change to a new home.

"How to Decorate Your Home." Write to-day for this beautifully illustrated pamphlet, showing in colours how to artistically decorate every room in the house. Post free from the Sole Manufacturers—

SISSONS BROTHERS & CO., LIMITED, HULL.

London Office—199b, Borough High Street, S.E.

Liverpool 55, Monot Pleasant, Glasgow 113, Bath Street, Reading 6, Guo Street.

as, in the event of Home Rule, it might expose me to unpleasant consequences. I have already suffered for my opinions.—I am, sir, etc.,

AN IRISH READER OF "EVERYMAN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Hone's article on Irish Protestants contains some statements calculated to stagger humanity, or at least Irish opinion.

(1) That the aristocracy of Irish Protestantism is Nationalist, at least outside Trinity College.

(2) Were Trinity College Nationalist, one might say all the intellect of Protestant Ireland was for Home Rule.

(3) Bernard Shaw and W. B. Yeats are the two Irishmen most widely known outside these countries.

As a non-Catholic Home Ruler I, and many commonplace persons like myself, might be pleased to think, on Mr. Hone's authority, that we belong to the aristocracy of Irish Protestantism, or, that if we had Trinity College (where there are many differences of opinion among fellows and students) that we should constitute the intellect of Protestant Ireland. Bernard Shaw and W. B. Yeats the most widely known Irishmen outside these countries! Possibly in the literary, dramatic, and artistic worlds—a small and select fraction of the masses vitally interested in social and political movements; but I, for one, and many others who have taken a lifelong interest in Irish politics, don't know whether they are Home Rulers or not. I hope they are.

Now that Home Rule is in the ascendant there are many Home Rulers who were never heard of as such before, and there has always been a class who call themselves Home Rulers, but whose Home Rule consists in criticising and carping at the only party who have done and are doing efficient political spadework, in belittling the workers, damning them with faint praise, and voting we know not how.

Is it not a fallacy to judge the merits or demerits of political and social reforms by claiming that intellect and education are on this or that side? Common sense is not the exclusive possession of the so-called educated classes, and on such vital questions as Tariff Reform there is no unanimity among those who have had a university education. I live in a district where the Catholic population is to the Protestant as 5 to 2. Measured by house value, exclusive of labourers' houses, the wealth of the Protestants is five times that of the Catholics. The Protestants and a very few Catholics are anti-Home Rulers. Their politics are not a question of religion, but of economic and social circumstances.

The well-to-do have all they want—good houses, ample or sufficient incomes. The poorer class want better wages, better houses, better schools, libraries, baths, wash-houses, open spaces, and all the advantages that it is in the power of local authorities to give them, and they want them at the expense of the richer class, if possible.

Froude, describing one of his hosts, said "he was a Tory of the Tories, a man with whom the destinies had dealt kindly, in whose eyes, therefore, all existing arrangements were as they should be, and those who wished to meddle with them were enemies of the human race."

So it is here, largely through Ireland, and England also.

Those who have all they want think the world goes very well. They want no change for themselves, and often don't know enough of their poorer neighbours' circumstances to understand why they should.

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME

No form of bathing accomplishes such perfect cleanliness as the combined HOT-AIR and VAPOUR BATH. It not only cleanses the outer surface, but also opens the pores, eliminates impure matters, and stimulates a healthful flow of—life's principal—the blood, clears the skin, re-energises the body, quiets the nerves, rests the tired, and creates that delightful feeling of invigorated health and strength.

PHYSICIANS AGREE THAT "FOOT'S" IS THE BEST CABINET

and recommend its use for the prevention and cure of Colds, Influenza, Rheumatism, Kidney and Liver Troubles, Skin Diseases, &c. A FOOT'S Cabinet possesses every desirable feature of efficiency, and has several exclusive advantages, including Improved Outside Heat and Vapour Generator, Adjustable Seat, and Heat Regulator. The Bather is not fastened to the Cabinet; Exit is Easy and Immediate; No Assistant required. Can be used in any room, and folds into a small, compact space.

Our "Bath Book," No. 30, contains much interesting information not generally known about Thermal Bathing, and illustrates and describes our Cabinets in various qualities. Sent Free on request.

FOOT'S

(Dept. B. 30),

171, New

Bond St., London, W.

Swift

Sure

You'd better look out your last Summer's Suits

if you want them to be smart and fresh-looking for the summer's wear. No doubt being put away all the winter has creased them somewhat, and unnoticed spots and stains seem suddenly to have become visible.

We only take four days to clean and tailor-press a suit. We only charge 3/9.

Write for new book, "Modern Beau Brummels." The cover is reproduced from a fine water-colour by WILL HOUGHTON, and the letterpress is illustrated with clever pen-and-ink sketches by "THORPE." The book contains much useful information in an interesting form and is well worth keeping.

A postcard brings it.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

THE MEN AROUND THE KAISER.

By FREDERIC W. WILE
(Correspondent of "Daily Mail" in Berlin). With Portraits. 6s. net.

"This book will enable its readers to acquire a glimpse of most things that are believed, hoped, aimed at, or being done in modern Germany."—Daily Telegraph.

RUE AND ROSES.

By ANGELA LANGER. Introduction by W. L. COURTNEY. 5s. net.

"A story that has been felt all through, and the result is that its simple chronicle is deeply and lastingly impressive."—Daily Telegraph.

MADAME ROYALE.

A Biography of the Duchesse d'Angouleme. By ERNEST DAUDET. 10s. net.

DAUBER.

By JOHN MASEFIELD (Author of "The Everlasting Mercy"). 3s. 6d. net.

THE HAND IN THE DARK and other Poems. By ADA CAMBRIDGE (Author of "The Three Miss Kings"). 5s. net.

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D. A Series of Greek and Latin Texts, with English Translations on the opposite page. Cloth, 5s. net; Leather, 6s. 6d. net. Five New Volumes Now Ready.

- (1) Apostolic Fathers II. (2) Appian III.
(3) Julian I. (4) Sophocles II.
(5) Quintus Smyrnaeus.

Please write for Prospectus giving full details of the Series and New Vols. for 1913.

LATEST 6s. NOVELS.

N.B.—Mr. Heinemann announces "THE SIXTY-FIRST SECOND," a Detective Story by OWEN JOHNSON.

| | | | |
|--------------------------|---|---|----------------------------------|
| THE 61st SECOND | ; | ; | Owen Johnson |
| JAMES HURD | . | ; | R. O. Prowse |
| THE KINGDOM | . | . | Harold E. Goad |
| LU OF THE RANGES | | | Eleanor Mordaunt |
| VIRGINIA | . | . | Ellen Glasgow |
| GOSLINGS | . | . | J. D. Beresford |
| THE AMBASSADRESS | . | | Wm. Wriothlesley |
| THE LIFE MASK | | | |
| | | | By the Author of "He Who Passed" |
| THE WEAKER VESSEL | . | | E. F. Benson |
| GROWING PAINS (2nd Imp.) | . | | Ivy Low |

LATEST 2s. net NOVELS.

New Editions of three Popular Novels by F. A. STEEL.

IN THE PERMANENT WAY. A SOVEREIGN REMEDY. IN THE GUARDIANSHIP OF GOD.

The Novels of E. F. BENSON.

PAUL. THE OSBORNES. VINTAGE.

Also Novels by Robert Hichens, Duncan Schwann, Eleanor Mordaunt, etc.

Send for List of Cheaper Novels.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The equalisation of incomes by the shifting of taxation will be quite as burning a question and as popular a policy in Ireland as in England. Neither religious opinions, nor a university education, nor special intellectual attainments are required to decide such questions, nor will they be asked for.—I am, sir, etc.,

Dublin, May 25th, 1913.

AN IRISHMAN.

A DUTCH PROTEST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been a regular reader of EVERYMAN since it was first published. I was not a little surprised and shocked to read "The Protestant Protest on the Romanist Bias of EVERYMAN," by your correspondent, Mr. F. Docker. I have always admired the fair and impartial way in which EVERYMAN has opened its columns to so many eminent authors and thinkers. I, for one, should be heartily sorry if EVERYMAN were going to follow the advice of Mr. F. Docker, especially as there are in Holland besides myself many readers who like to remain "au courant" of contemporary English literature by means of a high-class English periodical, unbiassed by party spirit or bigotry.—I am, sir, etc.,

Maastricht (Holland). MAURICE ENDEPOLS.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have lived my youth in the country and my early manhood in the town, in a busy commercial and industrial centre and in the university. In all my experiences the women's movement towards the vote is based on the activities of three types of woman. I say "type"—there are individual exceptions! In the first place, there is the militant; in the second place, there is the university woman, who revels in academic discussion; and, in the last place, there is the high society woman who has nothing to do. Your correspondent rather wildly prophesies, "Let our statesmen beware lest . . . they instigate a sex-war." In the event of these words being realised, these three types will strike, for it will be a long time ere the leaders of the movement can break up the millions—aye, the millions of happy families—who care nothing about the vote. You must be lords of life and limb before you can ruthlessly break up families, for that, I presume, would be the sordid aim of a sex-war.

The loss of these three types would be a blessing to men and women, and the sooner they volunteer and go to the front and see the ruthless impossibility of this ridiculous threat, the better.

The woman who can breed men can fight. But she will never join in a sex-war. The woman of the countryside, having bred our best men in business and politics and in all the various aspects of our life, will not be there. The wife of the miner, of the mill-hand, and of the sailor will not be there, and without these a sex-war would be ridiculous. Statesmanship is quite as discerning as it ever was, and that is a blessing.—I am, sir, etc.,

D. T. JONES.

Cardiganshire, May 26th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. (or is it Miss?) Shillito gives a reader the impression that all worth considering is the suffrage question as it is interpreted by the "small band of women willing to sacrifice even life itself to gain the vote." He (assuming it is Mr. Shillito) overrates enormously the importance to the community of those women who vainly imagine that Englishmen, as a whole, are likely to be influenced by mysterious antics. The suffrage question, as it is understood by myself and thousands of others, is not at present one of sex at all. For more years than one likes to think a battle has been going on to educate people's minds against a deeply rooted superstition, viz., that property, per se, gives its possessor a greater right to legislate than that of a fellow-citizen, possibly more intelligent, whose property is intangible. That battle has gone on and is going on, and universal manhood suffrage without property and residential qualification is still a long way off. When this anomaly has been rectified it will be quite time enough to raise the sex question of voting. The importing of this bone of contention has had the effect (as was probably intended) of drawing off people's minds from the issue as to whether humanity or property was to be first considered in legislative action. Hence, apart from any other reason, it is well that our present Parliament have shelved this premature, much-advertised, much-overrated measure.

I have had the privilege of being associated in its early days with a great movement for the protection of women and girls, and in that connection met many devoted, public-spirited women, whose very presence seemed to lift to a higher plane the thoughts and deeds of those amongst whom they worked. Among many, many of these women, whom I have known to work devotedly and unobtrusively for their own sex and for humanity at large, I cannot recollect one who ever expressed a desire for tub-thumping and attitudinising in public halls or police courts. But the good work done by these women and their example is far beyond what the so-called minds of many "militants" are capable of imagining. With a fairly open mind seeking enlightenment, I went in the autumn to a "militants'" meeting, addressed by Mrs. Brailsford and Miss Annie Kenney. Of eloquence there was plenty, and real oratory a good deal, but of logical argument, reason, historical accuracy not a jot, and I came away feeling that the good sense of the millions of women in England would cause this fungus growth to wither away even as mushrooms die off after a forced growth. One word more. Mr. (or Miss) Shillito gives a mock heroic warning to our statesmen lest they instigate that greatest of all evils, a sex-war. Let Mr. (or Miss) Shillito look to it that this militancy (sic), which has already done so much to weaken the chivalrous regard and innate reverence which every right-thinking man feels towards a potential wife and mother is not replaced by a sex feeling, unbridled and uncurbed.

Public opinion in England has been purified during the last twenty-five years by the continual efforts of numbers of devoted women, in whom militancy excites only disgust and aversion. But a lax administration of existing laws, as applied to the protection of women and girls, would be a fatal price to pay for the doubtful blessing of a vote given by a neurotic woman for a noisy, sexless legislator.—I am, sir, etc.,

Edinburgh,

HENRY WEAVER.

THE KINEMATOGRAPH AND THE DRAMA.
To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent's criticism of the film actor is, to say the least, unjust. To anybody who has followed at all closely the progress of the kinematograph industry it is apparent that, among other things, the quality of the acting in film plays has im-

The Best of the World's Books

SEND A POSTCARD

(mentioning "Everyman") for any of the following Lists.

200-PAGE CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, English and Foreign, at GREAT REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

CATALOGUE OF

THE BEST BOOKS

on all subjects, at the Lowest Cash Prices;
forming a Guide to the best Literature.

New List of Six-Shilling NOVELS

BY THE BEST WRITERS,

FROM 1/- EACH.

Newly-published Books.
Colour Books at less than half-price.
Books in Beautiful Bindings.
Books in leading Foreign languages.
Books on Art and Music at reduced prices.
Newspapers and Magazines, with rates to all parts.
Stationery and Library Requisites (Illustrated).

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB
376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

Winston Churchill's New Novel.

THE INSIDE OF THE CUP. By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Richard Carvel," etc. Extra Crown 8vo. 6s.

Algernon Blackwood's New Novel.

A PRISONER IN FAIRYLAND.
(The Book that "Uncle Paul" wrote.) By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

FATHER RALPH. By GERALD O'DONOVAN.
6s.

DAILY MAIL.—"The book is vivid and powerful, poignant, and human. Every type of Irish priest is most skilfully drawn. Irish Catholic society, too, is most admirably presented, and the tragedy of Ralph's separation from his bigoted mother has real and restrained pathos."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

"The brilliant critical essays by the Editor (Stephen Phillips) and the series of powerful poetic dramas distinguish 'The Poetry Review,' and give it a unique value and importance."

THE POETRY REVIEW

for JUNE contains an arresting article on

A NEW DEVIL IN POETIC DRAMA. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS.
A SURVEY OF CALIFORNIAN POETRY.
MR. WATSON AND THE CONTEMPORARY MUSE. By the EDITOR.
PREMIUMS FOR VERSE AND APPRECIATIONS.
DONNA MARINA, A ROMANTIC DRAMA. By CHARLES CAYZER.
Sells at all Booksellers, 6d. net, or 7d. post free from
THE POETRY SOCIETY, CLUN HOUSE, SURREY STREET, W.C.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

STAMMERING.—Descriptive booklet sent free to any sufferer mentioning EVERYMAN, by W. A. YEARSLEY & T. E. BIRCH, "Rosador," St. Annes-on-Sea, Gold Medal Speech Specialists.

AN ARTIST in 12 lessons. If you wish to learn to draw humorous pictures, book illustrations, cartoons, posters, etc., in 12 lessons, write for prospectus "E." Describes our new system, also course for beginners.—Northern School Press Drawing, Westhoughton, Lancs

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

HOW TO WRITE SALEABLE "FICTION," by the Literary Agent, who sells MSS. to over 150 Publishers and Periodicals. Strongly recommended by Editors. Syllabus free.—G. Magnus, 115, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write—we sell. 16pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

MARRIOTT WATSON'S

NEW NOVEL

ROSALIND IN ARDEN

will be published in a few days. ORDER NOW.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

RECENT SUCCESSFUL NOVELS.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL. By GRACE RHYS, Author of "The Wooing of Sheila." 6s.

Manchester Guardian.—"The real hero Tamburlaine is not a man, but a horse—quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted."

DAISY DARLEY; or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street. By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

THE LOST MAMELUKE. By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

Standard.—"The Lost Mameluke" is certainly a book to be read."

Pall Mall.—"Mr. Beddoe has a powerful, vivid imagination, and his descriptions of the gorgeous Mamelukes at play on horse and foot recall some of the most thrilling pages of Sir Walter Scott."

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

proved, until now it is, in some cases, well nigh perfect, and in all cases well up to the level of "good." It may interest Mr. Orrett to know that it is the aim of every film actor to avoid just that very extravagant and mechanical acting which he deprecates, and that it is the aim of the modern picture playwright to devise scenes which depend for their effective interpretation more upon subtle and expressive acting than upon elaborate and ludicrous gesticulation.

Both the playwright and the actor have, it may safely be said, to a great extent realised their ideals. For months past the acting of some of the American companies in particular has been superlatively good: as a matter of fact, most of the "stars" in these companies are actors and actresses who were formerly well known on the legitimate stage. In England, too (where the level of the acting has slowly but steadily risen until now it promises to equal, if not to surpass, that of the foreign companies), there have been instances of leading actors performing for the kinema.

Mr. Orrett surely does not think that men like, say, Mr. Forbes-Robertson are going to indulge in "extravagant and mechanical acting"? Mr. Forbes-Robertson, or, to take another instance, Sir Herbert Tree, would consent to act for the kinematograph only if they were convinced that by so doing they would be doing nothing derogatory to their art.

Mr. Orrett's statement that "there is not yet any demand for great artists as scenario-writers for films" is entirely wrong. There is a demand; film-producing companies realise that they must supply the best they can procure; and, mainly as an inducement to eminent writers who have not as yet considered scenario-writing to be a sufficiently lucrative employment, the "Cines" Company of Rome are offering a prize of £1,000 for the best scenario in a forthcoming competition.

As regards the artistic side of film-producing, I might mention that the world-famous R.A., Sir Hubert von Herkomer, has entered the business. Films produced under his supervision are to be seen in the near future.

Again, Mr. Orrett's statement that the kinematograph is helping the drama by weeding out the patrons that are a drag upon it is really an insult to the great mass of the public which frequents picture palaces. Seeing that the kinematograph is steadily bettering the tone of its pictures, and, consequently, the taste of its audience, it is much more likely to help the drama by creating a public which will be more able to appreciate a good play than it was before the coming of the kinematograph.—I am, sir, etc.,

London, W., May 30th, 1913. S. L. JACOBS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—From an artistic point of view, the popular kinematograph entertainment can only be regarded with abhorrence. The wonder is that so little has been said against this form of amusement compared with the disproportionate amount of praise which has been bestowed on it.

Can any person of taste overlook the blemishes which mar the pictures shown at the majority of picture palaces? Can anyone fail to see their crudity? How is it possible to produce anything but broad effects by the medium of portrayed movement alone, when even that passing craze, the wordless play, needs copious interpretation by a synopsis of the plot? The much-vaunted "Sumurun" is mechanical and dull compared with Mr. Barrie's little gem, "The Twelve-Pound Look." Yet "Sumurun" would not lose much by reproduction on the kinema, but a motion-picture of "The Twelve-Pound Look" would be impossible.

The screen admits only of stereotyped methods of expressing emotions, which must be exaggerated to be noticed. Shades of feeling are impracticable, and that test of the true actor—vocal expression of controlled emotion—is alike unknown to the screen and the wordless play.

It is a pity that the popular inartistic productions should find such a huge public, but as your contributor rightly points out, there is compensation in the help they afford in lifting the stage out of the depths of melodrama (whose main support was the kinema patron) by purging the modern theatre audience of the undesirable element that has retarded the production of plays of real artistic merit.

We should not, however, class the kinema with the music-hall. The humour of a screen-play is infinitely below the humour of scores of music-hall turns, which in many cases rises to the level of pure wit, and even of clever satire. The music-hall is far above the average kinema, both in comedy and in tragedy, and is often the home of good, satisfying music.

It may be too much to hope that the sensational and inane picture-play will die a speedy death (it is too remunerative to be allowed to do so); but its worthlessness may be emphasised, and children may be discouraged from supporting any but the best, and this, at least, would be a progressive move.—I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN CARLTON.

Hornsey, N., May 31st, 1913.

GEORGE BORROW.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with keen interest E. Hermann's admirable character sketch of George Borrow, which appeared in a recent issue. He does well to place so much importance on the irresistible charm of Borrow's style, which, for directness and limpid clearness, is not altogether unlike Mark Rutherford's.

But I should like to draw attention to one point barely touched upon by your contributor, and that is Borrow's intercourse with gypsies and his unique knowledge of their language. I wonder how many intelligent readers of EVERYMAN know that a language—not a dialect of, nor in any wise connected with English or Gaelic—flourishes, unheard of, in our midst. My curiosity being aroused when reading "Lavengro," I ventured to question a member of one of those nomadic tribes who roam about in the "ultima thule of civilisation," as Samuel Smiles calls Caithness, concerning this gypsy language, of which, hitherto, I had never heard. By dint of diplomacy and perseverance I elicited from him about a hundred words (which I noted down, phonetically), and I was agreeably surprised to find that some of these were also used in "Lavengro" with precisely the same meaning. Regarding the origin and the mode of acquiring this language, all that I managed to draw out was that it came from Egypt long ago, and that it was a "gift" left to gypsies.

I doubt not but that the brilliantly versatile Editor of EVERYMAN or some interested reader can shed light on this extremely fascinating philological question.—I am, sir, etc.,

D. B. G.

Caithness.

CONSCRIPTION AND THE WORKERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In a previous number of your paper I notice that Mr. Bracher, in his letter on "Conscription and the Workers," quotes a resolution which was passed at

A Prize Competition for NOVEL readers

If you were a publisher which of these novels would you pin your faith to for a great popular success

What does the Public really like?

WE ask the public to choose between four novels, so different in character and appeal that, although they were all placed among the first six novels in our recent £1,000 Prize Novel Competition, and are obviously stories that count, not even the Adjudicators themselves could agree as to their order of merit.

My Father's Son
By John Harwey 6/-

Now Ready

A powerful and realistic novel dealing with life in the suburbs, at the 'Varsity and in business. A vivid record of life as it is—told with the utmost conviction. Not a sensational novel, but one that rings true from first page to last.

A Garden of Spices
By A. Keith Fraser 6/-

Now Ready

A perfect little cameo. Full of delicate sentiment and delightful fancy. Not in the least like the other books, but probably appealing to the heart more than any of them. Readers will find in it the indescribable charm that sold "The Lady of the Decoration" by hundreds of thousands.

The Sin of Eve
By May Edginton 6/-

Now Ready

One of the most outspoken, vivacious and courageous novels published for a long time. MODERN in all its thought, and impulsive to a degree, it contains a particularly striking love story.

The Wilderness Lovers
By E. R. Punshon 6/-

Now Ready

A very effective, original and picturesque Western romance, dealing with strong, lawless men and held-up trains, with robbery, and love triumphant over all.

WRITE TO HODDER & STOUGHTON,
Warwick Square, LONDON, E.C.,
for particulars of a Prize Competition in connection with these books.

JUST PUBLISHED.
CZAR FERDINAND AND HIS PEOPLE.

By JOHN MACDONALD.

The origin of any great movement is to be found, most commonly, in an outstanding personality. When the historian probes the mystery of the recent upheaval of the Slav he will find his clue in the forceful and fascinating character of CZAR FERDINAND of Bulgaria, whose life story, interwoven with that of his people, is so ably depicted by Mr. Macdonald.

Many Plates. Cloth Clit, 12/6 net. At all Libraries.

JUST PUBLISHED.
THE RENAISSANCE AND ITS MAKERS.

By J. D. SYMON and S. L. BENSUSAN.

When I am weary and life monotonous, said a great writer, I turn again for zest and refreshment to the story of the Childhood of the Modern World—the Renaissance. I am at once in a world of hope, the pulse throbs quick with expectation. I am in the company of mighty personalities—men large in endeavour and with noble utterances in deed, in speech, and in painting. I breathe a large air. . . . It is to this fascinating world that Mr. Symon and Mr. Bensusan introduce us in "The Renaissance and its Makers."

Illustrated in Colour and Black. Binding by Jos. Simpson, 10/6 net. At all Booksellers and Libraries.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 67, Loeg Acre, W.C.; and Edinburgh.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

YOUR WILL-POWER

can be developed to double its present strength in a few months by means of "The St. Settel Course of Will Culture." Your powers of Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism will also be enormously increased, while your face and bearing will denote greater strength of character and personality. "The St. Settel Course" is warmly recommended by "Public Opinion," Rev. T. Alexander Seed, etc. The fee for the whole course (four absorbingly interesting lessons) is only 2/6 (abroad 6d. extra). The course is sent in plain sealed package. You will gain information worth many guineas.

THE ST. SETTEL INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, SCOTLAND.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

A HOUSE FOR 6d. A DAY.—Sixpence a day paid for five years will enable you to secure a house worth £300 in any part of the United Kingdom. Full particulars on application to J. J. Green, 245, Bishopsgate, London, E.C. Mention EVERYMAN.

GLAISHER'S BOOK CATALOGUES.—PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS in Great Variety and at Greatly Reduced Prices. Supplementary List for June, 1913, Now Ready. Gratis and Post Free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

CAN YOU SKETCH? Learn to draw for the Press. We give a thorough COURSE OF INSTRUCTION by POST, in MAGAZINE, BOOK and NEWSPAPER ILLUSTRATION. PUPILS' DRAWINGS SOLD TO THE LEADING PERIODICALS. Write for Prospectus (post free) to Dept. 17, THE LONDON SKETCH SCHOOL, 11, Chalsey Road, Brockley, London.

SLOAN-DUPOYAN SHORTHAND is acquired in a few weeks and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use. See EVERYMAN, Feb to May, for series of remarkable testimonies. Illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc., free.—SLOAN SHORTHAND CO., Ramsgate.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crooksmare Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by the PLEX Duplicator.

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, inoleap size.

Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

Money refunded if not satisfactory.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

the recent annual conference of the Queensland section of the Australian Workers' Union. This resolution recommended the alteration of the Federal Defence Act by an amending clause prohibiting the use of the Federal military forces during strikes or internal disturbances.

In this connection, may I be allowed to point out that the National Service League, which is working for compulsory military training in this country, advocates that such training should be carried out for and in the Territorial Force, and that the regulations regarding that Force lay down that it shall not be used as a military body in aid of the civil power in the preservation of peace?—I am, sir, etc.,

A. KEENE (Colonel).

THEOLOGY AND IDEALISM *

THERE are indications of a renewal of friendship between Theology and Idealism. In the 'eighties of last century, when the voice of Science, in pronouncing on ultimate questions, was much more confident than it is to-day, the theologian, under stress of weather, so to speak, was glad to seek the shelter of Hegelianism. That shelter seemed a safe and roomy place, where all the interests he cared for were secure. Then came what Professor W. P. Paterson has called the "Ritschlian revision," answering to a certain feeling of uneasiness that was springing up in the theologian's mind. The Hegelian interpretation of Christianity yielded results that were imposing enough from some points of view, but which seemed surprisingly meagre when looked at in the light of religious experience. Theology came to distrust what might be called the Aeroplane Apologetic, and, at the call of Ritschlianism, Pragmatism, and allied movements, sought the high-road of fact, history and the moral certainties. After attempting to mount up with wings as eagles, it became her ambition to walk without fainting.

But on the dustiest highway the sunlight falls. Theology cannot live without the vision of the heights; it must at least lift up its eyes to the hills. One hears, therefore, to-day of the "revival of mysticism," of Theology finding its way to the school of Eucken, and listening to his clear call to men to disengage themselves from the details of living, and to yield to the sway and uplift of the spiritual life, while, in "Foundations," the most recent Oxford manifesto on Theology, Mr. Moberly, in his chapter on "God and the Absolute," declares that Theology has most to learn from Idealism. It is his conviction that James and Bergson are "moving on by-paths," and that it is the great idealist thinkers who are "on the highway of philosophic progress." "It is with the type of philosophy known as 'Absolutism' that the theologian has really to reckon." If Mr. Moberly had had the opportunity of consulting Mr. Bosanquet's second series of Gifford Lectures before writing these words, they might have been even more emphatic. His indebtedness to the first series is amply acknowledged.

If Theology, then, is realising afresh the significance of Idealism, no one has contributed more to this than Mr. Bosanquet. The volume under notice may be truly described as the most serious effort yet made by Idealism to face the problems of the religious life. And this may be said without forgetting for a moment the work of Green and Edward Caird, or, it may be added, the debt that Mr. Bosanquet owes to these thinkers.

* "The Value and Destiny of the Individual." The Gifford Lectures. Delivered in Edinburgh University. By B. Bosanquet, LL.D., D.C.L. (London: Macmillan and Co. 1913.)

Candour is one of the most engaging features of Mr. Bosanquet's work. He has been round all the schools. He is not afraid to lay bare the processes of his own thinking, to share his scruples, hesitations and hopes as well as his conclusions. The very titles of the divisions and chapters indicate the spirit in which the work is undertaken. "The Moulding of Souls," "The Miracle of the Will," "The Hazards and Hardships of Finite Selfhood," "The Security and Stability of Finite Selfhood," "The Gates of the Future," are titles that show more than the author's literary aptitude, they reveal his serious purpose. That purpose is to outline a view of the universe that shall do justice to the religious consciousness. Religion for Mr. Bosanquet is no side-issue. It is life's prime concern. It holds the secret of man's worth and destiny. And it is open to thought, because logic is no mere exercise in dialectics, but the very spirit of life itself, the impulse under which the self comes to its own, and comes to feel at home in the universe. Mr. Bosanquet watches the history of the self from the moment when, in some way inexplicable, it announces its presence as a spiritual fact, to the moment when, in the midst of its struggles in the "world of claims and counter-claims," it finds emancipation in religion, and, with that emancipation, learns the secret of love and humility. It comes to itself and its own in a "world of spiritual membership," the features of which are described by Mr. Bosanquet in terms that are curiously and significantly reminiscent of St. Paul. It certainly is more suggestive of the Pauline world of grace than of any other. It cannot be said, of course, that the old difficulties that attend Idealism, from the point of view of Theology, are absent from Mr. Bosanquet's volume. He has his school's ancient grudge against Theism. To Christian Theism, even at its highest, Idealism has all along felt itself unable, on intellectual grounds, to give assent. It is here that the final adjustment must be made between Theology and Idealism, for Theology has "no wings to fly from God," even in the direction of the absolute. In his effort to make the doctrine of the absolute attractive to the religious consciousness, Mr. Bosanquet will be held by many to have failed. Few will question the sincerity and power of the effort, or deny the author's extraordinary sensitiveness to the present religious situation.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

A GARDEN OF SPICES (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is written with a simplicity and freshness reminiscent of the country about which Mr. Keith Fraser tells us. Only an intimate lover of gardens could have written this book of sweet memories. There is a close knowledge of the charm of every flower; one realises that the author recognises in them distinct qualities, almost, one had said, personalities. "Roses and stocks are blooming all around me. Sweet peas are fluttering like butterflies in the breeze, stately Madonna lilies stand sentinels by the gate. In the evening, when the tide is low, and the bees have ceased their humming, and the moon shines in a silver pathway over the sea, I still lie here, in an atmosphere heavy with the fragrance of night-scented stocks, and evening primroses opening their pale chalices to the moonbeams. It is a garden of sweet scents." Against this background of spicy odours a simple story is enacted. The characterisation is excellent, and the author is to be commended on the names he bestows on the principals in this dainty idyll. Elspeth exactly suggests

For the Man and the Occasion.

From our very wide range of collars you may select just that style and fitting which best suits the occasion and yourself—a collar which fits and emphasises the personality of the man who wears it. There's a "Horbros" for every neck and every purpose.

"HORBROS" COLLARS

Embody the concentrated knowledge gathered from a lengthy study of the collar question—combining grace and ease with materials which wear well and withstand the onslaughts of the laundry longer than most others do.

6d. each. 5/6 per dozen.

Write to-day for the Collar Folder illustrating 36 styles and giving full details. Kindly mention this paper

Horne BROTHERS

388, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.
And Branches throughout London.

LEARN FRENCH by Rosenblum's Anglo-French Journal, 1d., monthly, 11d. post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French."

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN who move in good society, and feel the disadvantages of a neglected education, should send stamp to-day for our explanatory booklet 126 and terms. — BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burley.

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included. — Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

Just a postcard will bring you a beautifully illustrated catalogue of—

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

For the Home. Cash or Easy Payments. Prices from £27/6. The popular size, 6 ft. 4 in., costs £5/5/0. Seven days' free trial.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
ONDINE WORKS, ACCRINGTON.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

TOURS.

TWENTY-FIVE DAYS Montreux, St. Niklaus, Zermatt, £10 10s. Tour. Montreux Tours, £5 5s. Lugano Tours, £5 5s. ONLY ADDRESS—GEORGE LUNN'S TOURS, LTD., 23, Old Jewry, E.C.

HOW TO STUDY

Rapidly, Effectively & Scientifically,
with the Minimum of Fatigue.

To study rapidly and effectively you must understand how to pay attention, how to observe, how to employ your memory so that you may remember what you read. You must know how to develop your Will-power so as to enlist its valuable aid when your Will flags. You must know how to control your thoughts so as to inhibit alien ideas, and to shut out distracting influences. You must know how to guard against Fatigue, for to engage in study when your mind is fatigued is to make your study of no value. You are taught how to secure the above in an easy, sure, and scientific manner in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration," the finest all-round Mental-Training you can undertake. It will revolutionise your outlook on life and make you much more efficient in study, or in your Profession or Business. In every part of the civilised world men and women in every walk of life testify to this. "Scientific Concentration" is highly recommended by the late Mr. W. T. Stead (Editor of the "Review of Reviews"), "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Public Opinion," "Great Thoughts," etc. Learn all about this splendid All-Round Mental-Training by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46 CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

STAMMERING AND ALL DEFECTS IN SPEECH effectually CURED by correspondence or personally. The "Practical Guide" is lent to inquirers, post free.—N. H. Mason, 30, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Learn to SKETCH in 2 hours

... An entirely new method of drawing has been invented by A. A. Braun, Director of the Association of Designers, Artists, and Illustrators (the well-known commercial studio). The A.B.C. or Hieroglyphic System of Drawing, which is taught by correspondence, enables students to produce creditable sketches after the first lesson. The complete Course contains hundreds of original devices (the outcome of experience) for obtaining immediate facility in remunerative commercial drawing. Write to-day, enclosing 1d. postage for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of leading illustrators, to A.B.C. SCHOOL OF DRAWING; 46, Chancery Lane, London.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time.

the personality of its heroine, and Janet the nurse-housekeeper is hit off in a phrase. She is a dragon! One realises all that can be said when Mr. Fraser tells us that "in her pocket she carried a pair of leathern tawse, and she believed in no spoiling of the child by sparing of the rod."

Once again we are introduced to a dancing girl. Miss Kate Horn, however, modifies the conventional type, and COLUMBINE AT THE FAIR (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.) feels no joy in the twinkling of her pretty feet. Effie is a morbid soul, and that the author should have placed her on the stage and made no allowance for the healthy effect on morbidity by that rough-and-ready criticism that appertains to the theatre seems to us to be a glaring defect in characterisation. The heroine is a Puritan of a virulent type. And by Puritan we mean that she feels that in accepting the simple joys of life she countenances hidden evils. And that all the time she dances she hears the voices of the underworld calling her, and that when in pure ecstasy of art she performs a particularly graceful dance, she is, in effect, offering oblations to the god Pan. She meets with quite a nice man, by name Andrew Granate. He wishes to make her his wife, and after she has accepted his proposal, desires to kiss her. She rushes from him and from the theatre, apparently, also, from the god Pan, and takes a situation as mother's help. The conclusion of the story is banal. Effie rescues a small child from fire, is very much disfigured by the burns, and marries a blind man, who cannot see her marred appearance. She feels utter and complete satisfaction, however, inasmuch as she has lost all power to dance—a priggish and most unconvincing suggestion.

Madame Marie Von Vorst has a distinct faculty for visualisation scenes, and with a few deft touches she brings a living picture before the eyes of her readers. In THE BROKEN BELL (Messrs. Constable, 5s. net) she conjures up delightful scenes which captivate the fancy and stand out like a cameo, perfect in every line. The scene of the novel is laid in Italy, and we cannot resist quoting from the description of a little village in the Apennines: "Pieve seemed deserted, but full of sweet sounds, for she heard the doves coo from under the roof and the lowing of the cattle, and the bleating of the lambs as they came flocking down the street, their sharp feet pattering on the stones. The dust rose in a cloud as the shepherd girls trotted behind their flocks, their wooden shoes striking the stones with the tiny feet of the sheep and the softer footsteps of the cattle. Maria had left her carriage, and from the steps of the inn looked down on the herds. Behind her, into a large clean kitchen, the door was open." The author does not overcrowd her story with unnecessary characters, with the result that the reader is able to appreciate to the full the individuality of each. Maria Sant Alcione is the wife of an Italian count, whose constant amours are a source of trouble to her. She finally decides, after the death of their child, to go on a pilgrimage into the mountains, and there she meets the Marchese Della Gandara. How she is tempted and how she overcomes that temptation it would be a pity to reveal. Suffice it to say the book is charming and well worth reading, in spite of the fact that the end is weak and inconclusive.

THE HOUSE OF SANDS (Martin Secker, 6s.) is concerned with the doings of certain people in the reign

(Continued on page 254.)

50 SUMMER SCHOLARSHIPS

WITHOUT ENTRANCE FEE IN

Free-Lance Journalism and Short Story Writing,

FOR READERS OF "EVERYMAN."

By ELIZABETH STEWART.

"WHAT to do with our sons and daughters?" has long been a familiar question. Is it not time to change the query to "What will they do with themselves?"; for surely nothing worthy the name of work can be forced from unwilling hands, much less wrung from an unwilling brain.

The writer speaks, therefore, to those who have not yet chosen their work; to those also who, having had their work chosen for them, are finding in their daily tasks a species of penal servitude.

To the former I would say, "The world is certainly all before you, but the world is pretty full. Look well about you, and choose for your workplace a field where you will have room to sow and to reap." To the latter my word is more emphatic. "Discontent may be the seed of salvation. To 'be content with such things as you have' is a command that can only be rightly read in the light of reason. Contentment is doubtless a grand virtue, but its grandeur depends on the quality of your possessions."

Remember that it is your duty to see to it that the things you have are the best you can get through the careful expenditure of your talents.

Get this BEST and then be content.

There are false economists abroad who rail at our bitter bread, offer to glut us with the fat of the land—and thrust into our hands, at a given price, a stone. Bitter bread there is in plenty, and stones there are in almost equal abundance, gilded, sugar-coated stones, fair enough to the eye, but stones all the same.

"Be famous," "Be rich," cry the tempters, and, judging by results, there are many thousands of discontented men and women ready at all times to snatch the false opportunity.

The writer does not invite you to be famous or to be rich; but she offers sweet bread for bitter, and suggests that you be reasonable.

The sweet bread takes the form of good, honest, remunerative work, work which awaits you as soon as you are equipped for it, work for which the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, is able and ready to equip you.

The work is Journalism and S.S. Writing, and you would do well to give earnest attention to these four statements with regard to this Profession:—

To do interesting and profitable work necessitates the following qualifications:—

1. Common sense.
2. A knack (cultivated) of seeing the interesting side of things.
3. A knowledge of everyday language is more important than "fine writing" and the pedantic "prize essay" style.
4. Practical Training in Press Work.

The openings in Journalism are more numerous, more interesting, and, above all, more lucrative than most people realise. As a spare-time hobby or a regular occupation, you can earn from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. per hour if you know what to write and where to sell articles, gossip, short stories, and the interesting little paragraphs which constitute one-quarter of the contents of dailies and weeklies.

A young friend of the present writer, of twenty-two years of age, who began work for the Press three years ago, now earns the comfortable income of £2,000 a year. She had no introductions or influence; her success is solely the result of her knowing how to do just the work that's wanted. She works no harder than the average woman teacher, but she makes every stroke of her pen tell, and every Editor she works for knows exactly what to expect from her; he knows she is in every way dependable.

FIFTY SCHOLARSHIPS.

The P.C.C. Course of Journalism and Short Story Writing is now offered to the fifty EVERYMAN readers who show sufficient aptitude for the work to make it worth while to train them at the nominal terms offered. You can earn while you learn in your spare time, for a Home Study Course of training is entirely by correspondence. The Course is personally conducted by a successful Author-Journalist of International reputation.

You will be in a class by yourself, for the personal letters of criticism and advice will be confidential and exclusive to you. It will be exactly suited to your aims and needs, and begins just where any previous training left off, and continues until you are too busy writing for the Press to need any further lessons.

Your first attempts will be sympathetically criticised by an expert who has won his experience unaided in the long, tedious way of finding things out for himself. Struggling alone, facing one disappointment after another, you may spend years of heartaching effort in learning just the practical technique of the profession that the Course teaches in a few easy-to-follow, but vastly interesting, lessons.

The fifty Scholarship Winners will obtain the full Course of Postal Tuition at half fees. (The remainder is only payable when the student has earned £20 by her pen.) You do not merely earn back very much more than the cost of Tuition, and, incidentally, receive a splendid full Course of Training free, but will acquire the practical knowledge that may be worth from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. an hour for a most interesting and distinguished profession.

No examination papers can be received after June 30th.

DO NOT DELAY.

Send a postcard at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. Address, "The Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C." This is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send off the postcard now before you forget it.

In addition to the Examination Paper, the College will send gratis a copy of a useful little book, and fullest particulars of the Course and Scholarships.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three-halfpence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

No matter how little you may know now, Correspondence Teaching will begin just where you need it to begin, and take you as far as you need to go. The work of the College is to train, encourage, and help students to succeed.

No other Institution has by correspondence helped so many men and women, in all parts of the world, to train their talents to earn money. No other Institution enjoys such wide and intimate acquaintance with publishers, editors, printers, and advertisers. This opens the door of employment to the students.

of Charles II. There is a lovely lady who is ardently worshipped by a noble youth, Captain Charteris, whose footsteps are dogged by the most unforeseen and unhappy circumstances. The Laird of Sands is a mysterious person, who has, for some reason best known to the King, been banished from the Court, and who follows the highly lucrative calling of smuggling wine from France, and fills in his spare moments making love to the heroine and estranging her from her lover, altogether an amiable, if somewhat mistaken, individual. Mr. L. M. Watt does not forget to bring in an intrigue concerned with Monmouth—what historical novel of that period would be complete without this, whether authenticated or not? The dialogue is somewhat faulty, and it strikes us that it is not quite true to the period, lapsing occasionally into absolute Cockney, when not in Scotch of the broadest character. The characters are not portrayed with any degree of originality, and the story itself is of a rather hackneyed type. Nevertheless, the reader will probably find he can while away a pleasant enough hour with the book during the summer holidays, if he does not desire to be burdened with deep reading. * * *

It is a difficult task to write a book about the human boy that shall at once be credible and entertaining. Many are the authors who have tried, but few indeed are those who have come within measurable distance of success. Mr. Ascott Hope, in HALF AND HALF TRAGEDY (A. and C. Black, 6s.), has given us a number of quite readable stories, mostly about boys, in and out of school; but his creations lack the divine fire that transforms the mere literary puppet into a living, breathing reality. We are never cheated into the belief that Mr. Hope's heroes are the real, right thing. They speak with an exactitude of language foreign to the schoolboy, and have a regard for phrasing that is almost priggish. We are all ready to yield to the fascination of a good school story—witness the evergreen popularity of "Tom Brown," though even in that classic one is tempted at times to grow impatient with the sickly saintliness of Arthur, and Tom never quite recaptures the first flush of popularity extended to him when, as an outcast with Martin, the madman, and his fidus Achates, East, he kept the authorities at bay. One feels there is a subtle falling off when he becomes progressively virtuous, and at the end of the book he has grown almost out of knowledge. It is this fault we find with the young heroes of Mr. Hope's volume. They are prone to preach, and are more than a little priggish. If the author would draw more from life, and rely less on the finished product of his imagination, he should give us a more tangible presentment of that curious, savage, entertaining creature—the British schoolboy. * * *

Among John Lane's new books we have a notable novel entitled THE GOVERNOR (6s.). The author, Karin Michaëlis Stangeland, has been fortunate enough to find a translator able to express in virile English the stinging precision of his phrase. There is a force, almost a savagery in the language, that hits out with the emphasis of a blow. The appeal is direct, the style barbaric, the whole effect is impressive—almost breathless. It is rare indeed to find a book so distinctive, so immediately effective. Take this paragraph, following on the initial statement that Van Ruyter, known as "Van Devil," lord of Seven Isles, went out into the morning: "He did not follow the level and trodden paths, but preferred the secret ways, where he might chance upon something that had been hidden, forgotten, or left unnoticed. He liked to creep along the bottoms of ditches, or in the shadow of thorn-hedges, and between the high boundary-dykes of the fields, so that he might come upon his workpeople from the rear.

"And then they tasted his dog-whip.

"It was said that the cord was always sticky with blood, so furiously did he apply it."

There lies in those few paragraphs an entire series of pictures. The author has more effectively limned the man than if he wrote page upon page of analysis of motive, dissection of thought. One can hear the crack of the whip, perceive the brutal figure stalking his prey. The story, written of primitive man and primitive woman, is notable throughout for this quality of hard hitting. The scenes sketched are forceful, at times almost ghastly in their descriptions of elemental passion, written with a pen dipped, one feels, in blood and tears, yet instinct with such power that from the first word to the last one needs must read.

* * *

There is very much that is pathetic and something at least of power in UNPOSTED LETTERS (Mills and Boon, 6s.). We learn, in the preface signed "Bertram," that the author, a journalist, died suddenly, leaving to his friend the task of going through his papers and publishing anything worth preserving. Whether or no this be a device of anonymity, after the fashion of "The Englishwoman's Love Letters," we do not know, but if so, the suggestion is well sustained, and some portion of the letters are well worth reading. The author is a consumptive, and for that reason, and in the full knowledge of the suffering his decision entails, decides to part for ever from the woman he loves, and whom he had thought to make his wife, the mother of his children. The woman marries, and suggests they shall be friends. The author sees such a course would be impossible. "Sequels," as somebody observed, "are a mistake in life as well as in literature," and he, or she, who meets an old love "after long years of grief and pain" is apt to feel that memories infinitely precious have been desecrated, old ideals mishandled. The book as a whole lacks humour, and for that reason one more than suspects the ingenious anonymity suggested.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

“EVERYMAN” FICTION

THE FICTIONAL WORKS IN “EVERYMAN’S LIBRARY” HAVE SURVIVED THE CRITICAL FIRE OF THE AGES. IN ADDITION TO BEING WORKS OF LITERATURE THEY POSSESS ALL THE QUALITIES OF THE IDEAL NOVEL.

SOME OF THE VOLUMES:

BLACKMORE’S LORNA DOONE
 BRONTË’S WUTHERING HEIGHTS
 DUMAS’ THREE MUSKETEERS
 GOLDSMITH’S VICAR OF WAKEFIELD
 SIR WALTER SCOTT’S WORKS (25 vols.)
 AINSWORTH’S TOWER OF LONDON
 C. M. YONGE’S THE HEIR OF REDCLIFFE
 OLIPHANT’S SALEM CHAPEL
 DEFOE’S MEMOIRS OF A CAVALIER
 BALZAC’S THE QUEST OF THE ABSOLUTE
 C. BRONTË’S JANE EYRE
 DEFOE’S JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR
 KINGSLEY’S HEReward THE WAKE
 WILKIE COLLINS’ THE WOMAN IN WHITE
 THACKERAY’S NEWCOMES
 FIELDING’S JOSEPH ANDREWS
 GEORGE ELIOT’S SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE

WOOD’S THE CHANNINGS
 FIELDING’S TOM JONES (2 vols.)
 DUMAS’ COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO (2 vols.)
 GEORGE ELIOT’S MILL ON THE FLOSS
 DICKENS’ WORKS. With Introduction by G. K. CHESTERTON (18 vols.)
 HAWTHORNE’S SCARLET LETTER
 COOPER’S LAST OF THE MOHICANS
 KINGSLEY’S WESTWARD HO!
 MULOCK’S JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN
 R. D. BLACKMORE’S SPRINGHAVEN
 CHARLOTTE BRONTË’S VILLETTE
 FANNY BURNEY’S EVELINA
 GEORGE ELIOT’S FELIX HOLT
 ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN’S THE CONSCRIPT AND WATERLOO
 MARRYAT’S PERCIVAL KEENE
 THACKERAY’S CHRISTMAS BOOKS

Cloth,
 1/- net.

SEND FOR FREE ANNOTATED CATALOGUE OF
 640 VOLUMES, COVERING 13 DEPARTMENTS
 OF LITERATURE.

Leather,
 2/- net.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

TO BE COMPLETED IN 12 MONTHLY VOLUMES.

DAILY TELEGRAPH:

“It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most; the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge.”

Vol.
 5
 Now
 Ready.

Vol.
 5
 Now
 Ready.

Cloth,
 1/- net. Leather,
 2/- net.

PROSPECTUS FREE ON APPLICATION.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

OETZMANN & CO LTD.

Nr. TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD, W.

Telegrams—"OETZMANN, LONDON." Telephone—MAYFAIR 101.
Stations—Met. Railway, EUSTON SQUARE; Tube, WARREN STREET.

DELIVERY BY MOTOR
50 MILES RADIUS.

£5 PREPAID ORDERS CARRIAGE
PAID ENGLAND OR WALES.

Solid Oak Bookcase, finished fumed or antique colour, with moulded panels to doors.

3 ft. 8 in. wide, £3 15 0
6 ft. 4 in. high,

COUNTRY COTTAGES
CHARMINGLY AND INEXPENSIVELY
FURNISHED.

Illustrated Booklet,
"OUR COTTAGE"

Post Free.

The "Halsbury" Solid Fumigated Oak Bedroom Suite, comprising—Wardrobe, 3 ft. 6 in. wide over all, with shaped bevelled-edge mirror and carved frieze. Dressing Chest of Drawers, with shelf and bevelled-edge shaped toilet mirror. Washstand, with cupboard enclosed with two doors, marble top and tiled back and towel rail attached each end. The Suite complete with rush-seated Chair £6 18 6

Settee Bedstead to match. Can be used as couch as illustrated, or bedstead at night, fitted with double woven wire mattress bottom. Complete, with mattress and cushions covered in cretonne in artistic colourings £2 18 6

THE ROTARY CYCLOSTYLE

Gestetner's Patent.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEPARTURE
IN DUPLICATING MACHINES.

2,000 Copies from One Original.

HANDWRITING—TYPEWRITING—DRAWING—MUSIC.

THE DUPLICATOR FOR FINEST WORK.
SPEED, CLEANLINESS, AND RELIABILITY.

Full particulars on application to—

The CYCLOSTYLE CO.,
50, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Telephone 5154 Gerrard.

Wholesale & Export: TOTTENHAM HALE, LONDON, N.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

INEXPENSIVE

A DAINTY
AND

LUXURY.

FOR MUSIC.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,
4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 35. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JUNE 13, 1913

One Penny.

SIR J. M. BARRIE, BART.,
NATUS 1860.

For Character Sketch, see page 264.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of Sir J. M. Barrie, Bart. | 257 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 258 |
| England and India. A Reply to Mr. Hyndman—By W. S. Lilly | 259 |
| Historic Cities of the World. I.—Paris. Part IV.—By the Editor | 260 |
| Marie Antoinette before the Revolution—By Charles Sarolea | 262 |
| Sir J. M. Barrie, Bart. By E. Hermann | 264 |
| Everyman's French Page. Maximilien Robespierre | 266 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. George Eliot's "Adam Bede"—By Margaret Hamilton | 267 |
| The Inner Light—By Darrell Figgis | 269 |
| The Surplusage of Women—By A. D. | 270 |
| Ravageau. Short Story—By André Theuriot | 272 |
| Proverbs (Selected)—By William Blake | 273 |
| The Schools and the Children—By P. W. Wilson | 274 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Private Usury and the Public Pawnshop | 276 |
| Mr. Hyndman's Delusion | 276 |
| Conscription and the Workers | 276 |
| The Needs of the Countryside | 278 |
| The New Emigration | 278 |
| "Traffic in Women" | 280 |
| Goethe and the Common People | 280 |
| The Influence of Nietzsche | 281 |
| Oscar Wilde—A Remonstrance | 283 |
| Books of the Week | 283 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AFTER a long period of slackness, holiday-making and general lassitude, Parliament is fronting the real tasks of the Session, only a fortnight before midsummer. Everything points to a certain inevitable disquietude and nervousness. There seems to be a general fear of disorganisation—a fear which was realised by the recent adjournment of the debate on the Finance Bill. With the Home Rule Bill in immediate question again, the extraordinary lethargy of the earlier part of the Session has given place to strenuous vigilance, of which the despatch of an urgent whip to the Irish Nationalist members is a symptom. Men of all parties will be keenly interested in the fortunes of the Government under a variety of depressing circumstances. The recent by-elections, the unpopularity of the Insurance Act with a large section of the people, the postponement of the land campaign, and the prolonging of what the Westminster Gazette calls "the Marconi atmosphere," are all significant factors in the present political situation, and it will need all the virility and verve of the Government to weather this cape of storms. On the subject of the termination or otherwise of the Marconi enquiry Liberal organs are divided. While the Westminster Gazette urges a speedy closure of this "campaign of personalities," the Nation pleads that Sir Albert Spicer's draft report be not "cut and amended out of all recognition" by Liberal members, lest the whole business should "assume the air of a party 'hush-up' which would make matters very awkward for everybody concerned. This danger ought to be avoided at all costs."

A writer in the Spectator says some shrewd and pertinent things regarding the present panic caused by the tide of colonial emigration. While admitting the serious depletion of Scotland, he points out that a very different condition applies to England, where we have an enormous increase in the urban populations. Whatever is true of Scotland, in England and Wales emigration has not yet overtaken the natural increase in the population. Taking London as a typical example, this writer points out that the population of Greater London has increased by close upon a million within ten years, and that it is still growing. Thus, in the week ending May 17th there were 2,347 births in Greater London, as against 1,596 deaths. This means that in spite of the alleged declining birth-rate, there is an excess of 750 births over deaths in Greater London alone, and the same is true of nearly all the large towns. It comes to this, therefore, that instead of fearing emigration, the question we have to face in England is how to deal with the tremendous growth of our urban population. The population of England and Wales has been increasing by leaps and bounds since the beginning of the nineteenth century, and the increase has never been greater than during the first decade of the twentieth century. The moral is, don't worry about emigration. There is land awaiting our people in Canada and Australia, and it is important that these dominions should be peopled by Britishers. By all means try and solve the problem of getting people to return to the untilled acres of England, but the fact remains that if every one of these acres were under cultivation by as many people as it could support, we should still fail to overtake the present growth of our urban population.

In view of the menace of an increasing White Slave Traffic, Chicago's experiment of a "Morals Court" will be followed with keen interest by humanitarians and social reformers all over the world. This court is to deal with "all cases that have to do with violations of the city ordinances regarding the social evil," and its special object is "to deal mercifully and helpfully with girls gone wrong." Its methods are to be "as scientific and humane as the average police-court methods are clumsy and brutal"; women are to be spared as far as possible the shame of public exposure, and women probation officers and physicians are attached to the court. American journals are loud in their commendation of this venture which, if it prove even a moderate success, will be the pioneer of similar movements all over the world. One paper, however, the New World, a Catholic newspaper, published in Chicago, is more than doubtful of the soundness of this experiment, and its strictures are worth quoting:

"It is all very well to say that the court is intended to 'give every one a chance'; to afford those who have fallen from the path of virtue another opportunity with a change in life, but this is scarcely to be obtained by blazoning to the world the names and the sins of the fallen or degraded, with pictures of the court flanked by sanctimonious individuals performing the work of moral regeneration. According to one of the printed accounts, a young girl who had been before the court for wayward conduct was 'sentenced' to be sent home, but the victim of the moral-court proceedings replied that the publicity given her case by the activities of the sociologist reformers, the proceedings of the court and the newspapers, made it impossible for her ever to enter her home again or rejoin the family. Is not this a case of the cure being worse than the disease? Are we not entering upon an era of too many public nostrums, too many quack 'reform' doctrinaires, too much smug notoriety-seeking and high-falutin in the administration of the law?"

These criticisms might be applied with advantage to that section of our community that believes in dealing with all social problems through the agency of inspectors retained to visit the homes of the poor and report upon them.

ENGLAND AND INDIA

A REPLY TO MR. HYNDMAN * * * BY W. S. LILLY

PART I.

I.

I HAVE just been reading Mr. Hyndman's paper, "The Coming Catastrophe in India," and, with the permission of the Editor of EVERYMAN, I should like to make a few remarks upon it. My object is to point out what is true and what is not true in Mr. Hyndman's statements. And my qualification for doing so is that I spent in India some of the best years of my life, in circumstances peculiarly favourable for studying all round—so to speak—the questions on which Mr. Hyndman touches; and that since I left the country, I have constantly kept myself in touch with the problems, legislative, administrative, and political, which have arisen there.

In Defence of the British Raj.

But before I proceed to the task to which I have set myself, I must take leave to deprecate the style in which Mr. Hyndman writes. He is too trenchant, nay, too vituperative, for fair discussion: too disdainful of facts, too wedded to theories; he is, in a word, too doctrinaire. Thus, he assures us that "the opinion concerning India, not only of Anglo-Indian officialdom, but even of such of the Press as still remains independent and untrusting"—this last word appears to be a contribution of Mr. Hyndman's to the English tongue—"is that all is for the best in the best of Empires possible." I have a considerable acquaintance among Indian officials, and I cannot call to mind one who holds that view, or anything like it, nor do I remember to have seen it expressed in any journal. Again, he tells us that India "for more than a hundred and fifty years has suffered from systematic and deliberate extortion from the poorest of its people." This language, if applied to the claims sometimes made by Mogul Emperors and by the more powerful of the Hindu dynasties, upon the industry of their subjects, might, perhaps, be defended. It is utterly indefensible regarding the taxation levied by the British Raj, which, according to the accepted theory, is the lord paramount or overlord of the soil. There is neither extortion nor anything even distantly resembling it. More than a hundred years ago the assessment was fixed permanently upon certain tracts of land. It is fixed periodically on the rest of British India, and, speaking generally, it represents half the letting value of the ground. It is absurd to speak of this as extortion. You might as well call it burglary. Once more, Mr. Hyndman avers that "India is governed on the worst State capitalist principles." I confess I do not know what "the worst State capitalist principles" are. But, as a matter of fact, the British Raj—with drawbacks of which I shall speak later on—has laboured persistently and successfully to promote the material prosperity of India. It is to England that India owes the greatest irrigation works the world has ever seen; and Sir William Lee Warner is well warranted when he writes in the Citizen of India, "There is no direction in which British enterprise and capital are not pushing their way in order to extend the manufactures of India, and thus to open up to its vast population new trades and industries." Lastly, Mr. Hyndman tells us that he regards our present rule in India as "one of the greatest crimes ever committed in all the long history of man's predations upon man." One really rub's one's eyes as one reads this, and asks whether Mr. Hyndman has ever studied the annals of India. Certain it is that, for well nigh a thousand years prior to its conquest by the British, India was a perpetual battlefield. The eventual triumph of British arms brought to the country such unbroken peace as it had not known since the days immediately before the invasion of Alexander. And, with whatever ill success, here and there, it has been the constant aim of the British Raj to diffuse throughout the country the blessings of peace. The tranquillity and order and material prosperity which we have introduced into a country where we found chronic war and wrong and robbery endemic are a most just title to empire. We are the rulers of India by the right divine that we rule it best. But of this I shall have to speak later on.

The Curse of Free Trade

So much must suffice in correction of some of the things which Mr. Hyndman has said in excessu suo. I suppose he could not help saying them. His way of writing is always excessive. And that is a pity, for such absurd exaggerations as those which I have just noticed detract from the weight justly due to the more valuable portion of his article—the portion where he complains that, for political purposes, that is to say, for the ends and exigencies of our party system, Indian interests have been sacrificed to British. He asserts that "we have done all in our power to crush India's initiative, to destroy Indian culture, to stunt Indian agriculture and manufactures, and to drive away the wealth of the peninsula to Great Britain." Now, this indictment, though vitiated by Mr. Hyndman's habitual excess, contains a lamentable amount of truth. The arts and industries of India have suffered from the British connection, because its rulers have been more concerned with vote-mongering at home than with the interests of our great dependency. Within the memory of men still living, weaving was a prosperous occupation in India, and millions lived by it. That industry has been destroyed by the deluging of the country with cheap—or, rather, low-priced—and worthless Manchester goods made by machinery, and by the refusal of protection to the Indian weavers. The iron industry of the country has similarly suffered for the same reason. Indian cutlery, padlocks, swords, nails, and hooks are superseded by the far inferior work imported from England, duty free. The muslin of Dacca, the pottery of Sind, the silk brocade of Ahmedabad—splendid achievements of industrial art—have almost disappeared from the same cause. The curse of Free Trade, which lies so heavy on England, extends to India also. Again, there can be no question that Mr. Hyndman is right in calling attention to the impoverishment of India by the withdrawal of one-third of the net revenue "to pay interest, home charges, remittances, military depôts, etc., in Great Britain." It cannot be denied that this is a steady drain on the resources of the country. But it must be remembered that a large portion of it is necessitated to meet the interest on money invested by Englishmen in Indian railways guaranteed by Government, some of which are run at a loss. There have, however, been quite indefensible charges on the revenues of India. Such —to give a flagrant instance—was the debiting to that country of a part of the cost of the Abyssinian war of 1867. The true principle, which ought to be unswervingly followed, has been well expressed by Sir Henry Brackenbury:—

“The foreign policy of India is directed entirely by Her Majesty's Government, and it is the part of British policy, generally, to secure Great Britain's rule over her Empire. If we desire to maintain British rule in India only for India's sake, then I think it would be fair to make India pay, to the uttermost farthing, everything that it could be shown was due to Britain's rule over India. But I cannot but feel that England's interest, or Britain's interest, in keeping India under British rule is enormous. India affords employment to thousands of Britons; India employs millions of English capital; and Indian commerce has been of immense value to Great Britain. Therefore, it seems to me that India, being held by Great Britain, not only for India's sake, but for Great Britain's sake, the latter should pay a share of the expenditure for this purpose.”

India for the Indians

And now let us consider the remedy which Mr. Hyndman advocates for the evils, real and imaginary, which he deplures. It is that we English should “retire peacefully from a position which we have neither the right nor power to maintain,” and should abandon India to the Indians. People who write in this way may truly be said to darken counsel by words without knowledge. They appear to suppose that “the Indians” are a homogeneous people, like the English or the French. As I have written elsewhere:—

“India for the Indians. What Indians? The word—which, by the way, is English, and has no Hindu equivalent—is in the highest degree vague. India is a vast tract of country—we may almost call it a continent. It is inhabited by well-nigh three hundred millions of people, speaking five hundred and thirty-nine different languages or dialects. Of these, nearly sixty millions are Mohammedans, on the whole a homogeneous community. The rest comprises various nationalities very widely differing in race, in religion, in customs, in traditions, in manners, in aspirations. They are united by no national feeling—how should such a feeling exist between Pathans and Tamulians, Sikhs and Burmese, Rajputs and Mahrattas? They care for nothing, as a rule, outside of their own family or caste. The great majority of them are Pagans—I use the word in no offensive sense, and for want of a better—of one kind or another. Some three millions—that appears to be the outside estimate—are Christians of sorts. And there are not quite a hundred thousand Parsis. To talk of the inhabitants of India as a nation is the greatest of absurdities. The various classes of the population have nothing in common, except, as in the case of Hindus and Mohammedans, hatred against one another. This is, of course, the natural, the inevitable, outcome of the history of India. The present of that country, as of all countries, is made and moulded of things past.”

Such are the people of India. Does the cry of “India for the Indians,” which Mr. Hyndman endorses, mean that the government of that country should be relinquished by the English and scrambled for by these jarring elements of the population? Of course it does not mean that. What it really does mean I will consider in a further article.

Competition on the Life and Work of the Woman Teacher

Owing to the very large response to our suggestion for this competition we have not yet been able to publish the result. An unusually large number of excellent papers have been received, and the process of selection has taken longer than anticipated. We hope, however, to publish the result before the end of the month.

HISTORIC CITIES OF THE WORLD

I.—PARIS . . . BY THE EDITOR

PART IV.*

I.

WE have examined in our three previous articles the nine central districts of Paris. The eleven remaining ones are the eccentric districts. As we are getting away from the centre of civilisation, poverty is gradually encroaching. It may be said that amongst those eleven districts, which occupy three-fourths of the area of Paris, only two are well-to-do, the Sixteenth Arrondissement and the west end of the Seventeenth. The Sixteenth includes the pleasant suburbs of Passy and Auteuil, between the Seine and the Bois du Boulogne, and contains no poverty spots. In the Seventeenth we have another instance of that interpenetration of wealth and poverty which we have observed elsewhere. Its western extremity is a quarter of luxurious mansions; the eastern quarter, or the Batignolles, contains such horrible slums as the Cité du Nord, in the Rue Boulay.

II.

Paris is not only the first harbour of France; she is also the most important industrial centre. Every one of the eccentric districts contains some important local industry: engineering and publishing works in the south-west; cabinet-making in the Faubourg St. Antoine; tanneries in the south-east. And, as one would expect in a three millioned-souled metropolis, every one of those industries is subject to cycles of prosperity and depression, to constant fluctuations of high and low wages. And those fluctuations necessarily mean casual labour and unemployment, and casual labour and unemployment necessarily mean destitution.

III.

Poverty, no doubt, does not assume in Paris the gigantic proportions which it does assume in London. It is not ubiquitous. It is not beyond redemption. You feel that it is partly accidental, and that charity and social effort might cope with it, and in no other city is charity so ingenious, so unremitting, so strenuous. There are hundreds of hospitals and homes and shelters and asylums and refuges. Still, the amount of poverty in Paris remains appalling. And the contrast between the Elysium in the Eighth Arrondissement and the Inferno of the Thirteenth and Twentieth districts is a disgrace to modern civilisation.

All the poor quarters of Paris present some common features: the café concert, the dancing hall, the brothel, the rookery, which, by some curious perversion of language, is called a Cité: the Cité Doré, Cité Jeanne d'Arc—a noble name for a most infamous slum! The horse-flesh butchers are a frequent appendage of poverty, and their presence is a safe indication of the state of destitution. The great horse-flesh market of Villejuif, in the Thirteenth, is also one of the most degrading parts of the Capital.

But the most infallible index to poverty is the quantity of dram-shops in any given neighbourhood. They have multiplied in recent years in alarming proportions, and it is even more difficult to check their growth in Paris than in London. For the mar-chand de vin is the supreme electioneering agent, and is an even more formidable political power than the British publican. The licensed trade in drink has been a curse in Great Britain; Free Trade in drink has been no less a curse in France. It has transformed one of the most temperate nations in Europe into one of the most intemperate.

* See our map of the arrondissements and population of Paris in No. 34.

IV.

But although some common features are to be found in all the poor districts, it would be a mistake to suppose that a drab monotony is a characteristic of Parisian poverty. On the contrary, to the penetrating observer of social conditions, there is much greater variety in the poor quarters than in the wealthy. For it is a universal law of human nature that our capacity of diversifying our sufferings is much greater than our capacity of diversifying our enjoyments.

The quality and character of the prevailing poverty in each district are determined by the nature of the employment, and by the conditions of the neighbourhood. The neighbourhood of military barracks, like the Ecole Militaire, or of a great hospital, like the Salpêtrière and Sainte Anne, the banks of canals, like the Canal de la Villette, the low banks of the Seine, which are inundated each winter, as they are at Grenelle and Javel, the proximity of the large goods stations, of the slaughter-houses of La Villette, all have their special population. Again, the human groupings are totally different, according as the industries are skilled or unskilled, uplifting or demoralising, sedentary or nomadic. The metallurgists, the engineers, and the printers in the south-west of Paris are an élite of labourers, very different from the butchers of La Villette and the horseflesh dealers of the Porte d'Ivry, from the navvies and dockers of the Halle des Vins, and from the rag-pickers and tinkers of the Thirteenth Arrondissement.

V.

There are many plague-spots in the eccentric districts known to every social worker. There are slums in the neighbourhood of the Hôpital St. Louis (Tenth); there are some in the Charonne quarter (Eleventh); there are some in the Plaisance (Fourteenth). There are many rookeries in the Ile aux Singes at Javel (Fifteenth), in the Cité du Nord (Seventeenth), and in Montmartre, about the Rue Ordener (Eighteenth), and in Belleville (Nineteenth).

But of all the poverty-stricken areas of Paris, by far the worst are the Thirteenth and the Twentieth. Few tourists who visit the Thirteenth would suspect that those fine avenues, those hills and valleys, are the abode of sordid destitution and revolting vice. In the neighbourhood of the Place d'Italie, so called from the Italian models who inhabit this district, vice still presents some redeemable features, but in the horseflesh market of Villejuif, in the neighbourhood of the Rue Jeanne d'Arc, one meets some of the worst ruffians of the metropolis. And as for the Twentieth Arrondissement, it is as bad as the Thirteenth, and it is less picturesque and less interesting. There is nothing more melancholy and depressing in the whole of Paris than the miles of squalid streets which traverse this district from north to south. If the western extremity of the Twentieth, the cemetery of Père Lachaise, may be called the City of the Dead, the eastern part may well be called the City of Crime. For crime has its special and select haunts in the metropolis. And it has spread in recent years with appalling rapidity, partly owing to the cowardice and sentimentalism of the Parisian juries, partly owing to the curse of drink, partly owing to the diffusion of that dangerous detective literature which glorifies the burglar and the murderer into a hero. And crime is more gregarious in Paris than elsewhere. It is also more endemic and epidemic. There are scores of streets which have a sinister reputation, which are well known to the police, where the criminal is comparatively immune as long as he does not emerge from his lair to strike terror into the world city.

VI.

If the Thirteenth and Twentieth Arrondissements are the most degraded of the poorer districts of Paris, the Eighteenth, or Montmartre, is by far the most interesting, the most varied. It is also the only one which may be said to have a history, for the "Mount of Mars" or the "Mount of Martyrs"—both etymologies may be accepted—is one of the most ancient parts of Paris, and already in the days of the Romans the hill of Montmartre was a strategic point of vantage. To-day the Mount of Martyrs has become one of the chosen centres of the Bohemian and of the pleasure seeker, a centre of music-halls, a gathering place of artists and men of letters, especially of those who have been failures. And, like so many other parts of Paris, Montmartre is a City of Contrasts. It is the City of the Unfortunate Female and of the "Moulin Rouge," but it is also the City of the "Sacré Cœur." Surely it is not one of the least perplexing ironies of recent French history that this licentious and libertine Republic of Bohemia should have been selected as the site of one of the most impressive Basilicas of Christendom. From the heights of Montmartre the "Sacré Cœur" seems to look down, in apparent impotence, yet sublimely defiant, on the City of Unbelief and Vice and Pleasure, as if the Roman Catholic Church were determined to render visible to all the world that duality which is one of the most striking characteristics of Paris, and as if she wanted to demonstrate that, in her view, Modern Babylon ought still to be considered as the religious Metropolis of the West.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

It is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

- | | |
|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Compositor. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace,

Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on

MARIE ANTOINETTE BEFORE THE REVOLUTION

* * *

BY CHARLES SAROLEA

MR. FRANCIS BICKLEY and Lady Younghusband have added two more volumes to the vast accumulated literature on Marie Antoinette.* The French Queen has inspired many a masterpiece, but no one would accord that distinction to these latest biographies. Of Mr. Bickley's little book, the less said the better. As for Lady Younghusband's book, it is uncritical, and makes no attempt to sift the evidence. It is clumsily composed, and makes no pretence of being a coherent narrative. Yet, with all its shortcomings, the volume is full of interesting matter, and the critic almost feels a pang of remorse for having to judge harshly a distinguished author who gives him the welcome opportunity of considering once more the strange and tragic fortunes of the most ill-fated of sovereigns.

I.

Marie Antoinette is not only a fascinating subject, she is also a perplexing historical problem. It seems almost impossible to reconcile the character which was given her in her lifetime with the portrait which has been drawn of her after her death. Whilst she ruled she was the best-hated woman of France: hated by the Court, hated by the upper classes, hated by the bourgeoisie, hated by the common people. She was made mainly responsible for most of the evils which befell a distracted country. Her martyrdom was sufficient to transform those almost universal feelings of hatred into almost equally unanimous feelings of sympathy, love, and admiration. She seems to have cast an incantation over every one of her historians. Carlyle becomes almost as rhetorical as Burke. Goncourt, most realistic and most cynical of French novelists, becomes a sentimental idealist as soon as he attempts to portray his heroine. M. de Nolhac, although he sees all her faults, condones them all. Mr. Hilaire Belloc is one of the few recent historians who has escaped the spell of the martyred Queen. He emphasises her failings, her frivolity, her pride, her selfishness, her indiscretion. But even he refuses to pronounce a verdict, even he pleads the extenuating circumstances of an inexorable destiny. And the "leitmotiv" of Belloc's striking monograph is simply this: Marie Antoinette's life was a succession of mysterious coincidences which fatally led her on to her doom.

II.

Born on All Souls' Day, 1755, on the day of the destruction of Lisbon, one of the great catastrophes of history, brought up strictly at the Court of Vienna by a stern mother, the Austrian princess was destined, almost from the cradle, for the most illustrious throne of Christendom. Her marriage was to seal for ever the alliance between France and Austria. It is true that the Habsburg dynasty had been for centuries the enemy of the Bourbon dynasty, but there had arisen since Louis XIV. another hereditary enemy far more odious and far more formidable than Austria, namely, England; England which had humiliated French armies in every part of the world; England which, by the treaty of Paris, had robbed France of her fairest dominions. It was against England that the new alliance was directed. Marie Antoinette arrived in France at fourteen years of age, and was received with universal acclamation. But her very first entrance into Paris was the occasion of a ghastly tragedy. On the Place Louis XV., which was one day to become the Place de la Révolution, and where twenty-three years after the Queen was to ascend the scaffold, one hundred and thirty-two people were trampled to death, and twelve hundred were wounded.

When those tragic festivities came to an end, the child Marie Antoinette found herself transported without transition or preparation in a hotbed of corruption and intrigue. The grandfather of her husband, the sinister old voluptuary, Louis XV., took advantage of the nuptial celebrations to introduce to the Court the latest and most scandalous addition to his harem. The prostitute Du Barry was presented and given a place of honour, and when the innocent Austrian child inquired which was the high Court office to which the strange lady had been appointed, the answer was that her office was to "amuse" his Majesty.

The young girl soon learned the odious truth, and both her pride and her innocence revolted. She refused to recognise Madame Du Barry, and henceforth the whole cabal of the new favourite was up in arms against her. Morally, we must sympathise with the young Princess, but politically her behaviour was an irretrievable blunder. The enmity of the young mistress of the old King was to be the first link in the chain of fatality.

III.

The second link in the chain of fatality was the political wisdom of an imperious mother forcing itself on the loyalty and filial piety of her daughter.

For four years Marie Antoinette remained the Princess Royal of France, and both before her accession to the throne and after, she received the constant advice of Maria Theresa. The Austrian Empress sent to Paris the ablest of her diplomats, Count Mercy Argenteau, both as her own confidential agent and as counsellor to her daughter. Mercy Argenteau's correspondence with the mother and the daughter remains to this day the most important historical source and the most valuable human document for the biographer of Marie Antoinette. In any other circumstances the counsels of so capable a mother and of so trustworthy and so acute an adviser would have been an invaluable benefit, but, under the peculiar conditions in which Marie Antoinette was placed at the Court of France, those counsels proved to be one of the causes of her ruin. For the one idea of Maria Theresa was to promote the Austrian policy, which was soon found to be entirely disastrous, and which, as years went by, became more and more odious. What proved even more fatal, to further her purpose Maria Theresa persistently induced her daughter to enter the political arena, for which, by temperament, she was absolutely unfitted.

IV.

In 1774, at nineteen years of age, Marie Antoinette was crowned, or, to be more accurate, she ascended the throne. According to the strange anti-feminist French theory, a French Queen could not be crowned or "consecrated." The King alone was anointed

* "Marie Antoinette." By Francis Bickley. 5s. net. (London: T. N. Foulis.)

* "Marie Antoinette: Her Early Youth." By Lady Younghusband. 10s. 6d. (Macmillan).

with the sacred oil. The King alone was ruler by the grace of God, and the Queen was only his consort.

The whole French nation was eagerly expecting an heir to continue the most august and most ancient dynasty of Europe. The young Queen herself was yearning for the child which was to satisfy her maternal instinct, and which was to consolidate her position in her adoptive country and bring to her the affections of the French people. It was soon discovered that Louis XVI. could not make her a mother.

Even the most superficial study of Marie Antoinette's character proves that this circumstance was largely responsible for her subsequent conduct. If from the first Marie Antoinette could have had children, she would probably have become an excellent mother, she would have revealed the domestic virtues characteristic of her race, and she would certainly have avoided the follies which disgraced her early years. As it was, not being absorbed by her maternal duties, and seeking an outlet for her superabundant vitality, she plunged into a vortex of amusements, disregarding every convention and etiquette, flirting with her brother-in-law, Count d'Artois, a notorious debauchee, appearing in the disguise of a domino at promiscuous dances, holding up her husband as a butt to public ridicule, and assisting to discredit the monarchy by her reckless behaviour. Fate would not allow her to become a mother. She became instead a Queen of Fashion, a Queen of the Ballroom, a Queen of Cards, and, in the words of her own brother, Emperor Joseph II., she transformed the palace of Versailles into a gambling den.

V.

It was soon discovered that the intervention of science might remove the impediment which prevented Louis XVI. from having children. He submitted to an operation, and on December 19th, 1778, Marie Antoinette had her first child. At once she decided to reform her ways. It was observed that the frivolous, vain, reckless pleasure-seeker had become an exemplary mother. But, alas! reform had come too late. The Queen had irretrievably alienated the sympathies of all classes of the population. Moreover, the reform did not last.

All the old failings of her character soon reappeared on the surface. She became more extravagant than ever. In spite of the desperate state of the national finances, she induced her husband to buy for her the palace of Saint Cloud. She extended the Trianon. She prided herself more than ever on being the queen of fashion, the arbiter of elegance, and in starting the most ridiculous vagaries in dress. She paid a thousand francs for a feather. The expenditure for her wardrobe increased from 120,000 francs in 1776 to 252,000 francs in 1785.

She played parts with incredible unconsciousness in a revolutionary comedy, like "The Mariage de Figaro," which aimed at undermining the Old Régime. Worst of all, she espoused more indiscreetly than ever the interests of Austrian policy, and she caused millions of French money to be sent as an indemnity to the Austrian capital.

About 1785 her unpopularity had reached a climax. A sensational and scandalous trial, probably the most important political trial of all European modern history, was to bring that unpopularity to a final test. The Diamond Necklace Case was to be the last link in the chain of fatality, before the final catastrophe of the French Revolution.

VI.

For more than a hundred years publicists and historians all over Europe have been busy devising a solution of the diamond necklace mystery, and trying to disentangle the conflicting mass of evidence. Recent investigations have illumined most of its dark places. Divested of minor side issues, the Diamond Necklace Case to-day appears very simple, as simple as a classical drama in which all the unities are observed, and where we have mainly to deal with the elemental passions of man.

The dramatis personæ are an adventuress and a jeweller, a cardinal and a queen. The adventuress, the Countess de la Motte, is the prime mover in the plot, and she engineers the whole intrigue with diabolical cleverness. The Jew Boehmer, the Cardinal de Rohan, and Marie Antoinette are but tools in her hands. The plot can be summed up in a few lines. On the one hand, the Hebrew jeweller wants to sell a diamond necklace of priceless value. On the other hand, the adventuress wants to appropriate the wonderful prize. It is obvious that, left to her own devices, the Countess de la Motte could never have got possession of the necklace. She could only secure it through the influence of Cardinal de Rohan, who alone could inspire sufficient confidence in the jeweller, and induce him to part with his treasure. She therefore persuaded the Cardinal that Marie Antoinette eagerly wanted the necklace, that she dared not buy it openly for fear of public opinion, that she would be grateful if the Cardinal were discreetly to negotiate the purchase, and that this would be the best means of recovering the good graces of the Queen.

The plot succeeds, the Cardinal falls an easy prey, and buys the necklace on behalf of the Queen. The necklace is transferred to Countess de la Motte, and disposed of in London by her accomplice. The theft is discovered, and the jeweller, pressing for payment, reveals that an adventuress, surrounded by a band of malefactors, has used the name, impersonated the character, and forged the handwriting of the Queen of France. Louis XVI., in an evil hour, and in an impulse of righteous indignation, decides to avenge the honour of the Queen and the majesty of the throne. The Cardinal is arrested and is brought to trial before the High Court of Parliament. The whole nation takes sides, but it takes sides against Marie Antoinette. The Parliament uses an unique opportunity of humiliating the monarchy. The Church is determined to defend the privileges of the ecclesiastical order. The higher nobility consider it their duty to defend one of their own class. The trial lasts three hundred days, and for three hundred days the Court, the Church, the nobility are dragged in the mud. The adventuress is condemned, but her credulous victim is acquitted. The acquittal of the Cardinal is the condemnation of the Queen.

It has been well said that the diamond necklace trial sounded the knell of the old monarchy, that it was the beginning of the French Revolution. And it is now easy to see, in the light of later events, that when the catastrophe did come, Marie Antoinette was bound to be the first victim. The very weakness of her husband and her strength of will were to be turned against her. As it was obvious to all that Louis XVI. was but an instrument in her hands, she alone was to be held accountable for all the calamities which befell the monarchy and the nation, she alone was to be made responsible for the opposition to the Revolution, and the armed intervention of Europe.

SIR J. M. BARRIE, BART. * * BY E. HERMANN

I.

A CASUAL onlooker who, like most onlookers, saw least of the game, watched Sir J. M. Barrie take his LL.D. degree, and came back to his friends with a fearfully and wonderfully made report. He described the great writer correctly enough as a very small, slight, frail-looking man with a very large head, sad eyes, and the general expression and demeanour of one who had resigned himself to a chronic state of convalescence. Having laid this fairly sound foundation, he went on to say that it was quite clear and patent to all who had eyes in their head that J. M. Barrie lived in a state of perpetual boredom, that the mere act of existing was a fag to him, that he honestly believed he would die if he ventured upon anything resembling conversation, and that he had an air of passing through the world as a fastidious young lady might pick her way over a muddy crossing. Above all else, J. M. Barrie was lackadaisical: no single word fitted him better than that.

Now, as a matter of fact, no word of any kind could be more wildly inappropriate than just that word lackadaisical. The first look at the still and weary face might suggest some degree of indifference to life: a second look will invariably convince him who can be convinced that a very strenuous and keen-edged spirit lives behind those quiet, brooding eyes. The impression is that of a man whose inner life is vigorous and profound, glorious with adventure, and brilliant with a thousand reverberating lights of the imagination. One has a sense of a strong, resolute soul, of passionate interests and of piercing vision. Those mournful eyes take a keen hold of what they see. They have seen much and forgotten nothing. One admits that he takes things very quietly, says little, and appears to care even less; but that is how men who live in his deep-going fashion take all but the biggest things of life.

II.

J. M. Barrie is, one imagines, good company. A man who can smoke without addressing you or even looking at you for hours together is fine company for many moods, and the author of "A Window in Thrums" is a grand man to be silent with. But that means that when he talks it's the kind of simple but significant talk that is quite unquotable and yet clings to the memory; and those who have known him as a talker bear that out. I maintain that he is, above all things, a man to see a cricket match with,—but I withdraw that assertion, for he who goes to a cricket match with J. M. will, unless he be dead of soul indeed, see very little of the game and very much of J. M. Barrie. I once was close to him in a particularly interesting match. He had come by train with the rest of the crowd, toiled up from the station with them, the most inconspicuous figure in that dusty multitude—lain down on the grass, and lost himself in the game. I watched him all unbeknown to himself. He did not smoke, he did not address a single remark to his companion, to the best of my knowledge. He betrayed no excitement, though the game was unusually exciting, and stolid men were yelling themselves hoarse. He simply lay and watched, with the soul of a true cricket-lover in his eyes; lay motionless, yet thrilled to the quick. I watched the play of that still face, and when the match was over I could give no rational account of it. I had been dimly aware of chaps in flannels running about—that was all. J. M. Barrie used to be an excellent player in his time, and, in spite of his absorbed silence at this particular match, one fancies cricket is one of the few things that would loosen his tongue, and that on such occasions his talk would be uncommonly good.

III.

J. M. Barrie was born at Kirriemuir in 1860. His mother was an Ogilvy, steeped in "Auld Licht" traditions, and it was from her lips he first heard the tales and chronicles that were the stuff his "kailyard" books were made of. From Kirriemuir he went for his later education to the Dumfries Academy, and in Dumfries he often saw Thomas Carlyle, whose sister, Mrs. Aitken, was living in the town. Indeed, one is not likely to go far wrong in saying that Carlyle was the one abiding memory of Dumfries for him. Like most boys destined to become "literary gents," he did not greatly distinguish himself in class. His bent soon showed itself, however, and he contributed accounts of school cricket matches to local papers, and even ventured upon a letter signed "Paterfamilias," in which he advocated longer holidays for schoolboys. At eighteen he went up to Edinburgh University, where he came under the spell of David Masson and Alexander Campbell Fraser. Of the former he wrote in "An Edinburgh Eleven": "There are men who are good to think of, and as a rule we know them only by their books, and something of our pride in life would go with their fall. To have one such professor at a time is the most a University can hope of human nature." "An Edinburgh Eleven" is one of the books that are good to read, because it is wrought out of a joyous appreciation of happy days. Uneventful days they were, as most happy times must needs be uneventful. "Happy are the people that have no history."

IV.

While at the 'Varsity Barrie had written nothing, if one excepts a certain amount of reviewing for the Courant, now defunct, and at the time edited by a townsman of his, Mr. W. R. Lawson. After graduating M.A. in 1882, he waited on, gathering material for a book upon the Elizabethan satirists, until he happened upon an advertisement for a leader-writer at a salary of three guineas a week. The paper in question was the Nottingham Journal, and eventually he accepted the appointment, and put in three humdrum, hard-working years at Nottingham. He was given a free hand as to choice of subject, and wrote not only leaders, but all manner of articles, grave and gay, finding all the excitement and recreation he needed in the variety of his work. In 1884 an article of his was accepted by Mr. Greenwood for the St. James's Gazette, and in the following year Barrie left Nottingham and came up to London. Between that time and 1887 he wrote a good deal, but remained anonymous and unknown until 1887, when Sir (then Dr.) W. Robertson Nicoll induced him to write a series of sketches for the British Weekly. These appeared over the name of "Gavin Ogilvy," and created a great deal of attention. Very soon the author's real name became public property, and Barrie had his foot firmly on the ladder of fame. "Better Dead," a satire on London life, was published in the same year, and 1888 saw "Auld Licht Idylls," which the first publisher to whom it was submitted rejected, on the ground that it would never be a success. It proved an immediate and a steadily increasing success; but it was with "A Window in Thrums," published in the following year, that Barrie finally "arrived." Staid and sober judges praised it in the most superlative terms. Jaded novel-readers devoured it, and many a man who sat down, at first describing it as "quaint" and "so Scotch, don't you know," finished it with a sense of having, in the midst of the sordid disillusionments of modern life, touched once again the ivory gates and golden. The author became one of the literary personalities of London, and was widely paragraphed, in proportion as his steadfast reticence gave the paragraphist's imagination free play. Restrained, self-contained, disconcertingly taciturn, he stimulated the curiosity of the literary lion-hunters, who pretended to be delighted with his gift for silence, and to find evidences of genius in his complete conventionality of manner and speech.

V.

We say, with good reason, that we have become tired of the "kailyard" school of Scottish fiction. But if Barrie were once again to take us back to Thrums, who would not delight to go with him? For the reader with a soul, "A Window in Thrums" will always remain one of those books which one re-reads every year or so, and about which one feels inclined to say less from year to year. It takes one into a simple, kindly, humorous, human world of Scottish country folk—a world full of little narrownesses, obstinacies, prejudices, feuds, and foibles, but a world in which fame, money, self-gratification, and the thousand other idols of the market-place count for nothing, or little, and in which conscience, truth, faithfulness, friendship, love, and God count for everything. The folk that come and go about Jess's window may be limited in their outlook and obtuse in some of their perceptions, but they know pain when they see it; they are at home in the deep place where sin and forgiveness meet; above all, they are sensitive to the Unseen. And in this book they are convincingly alive, and we feel their impact upon us. And there comes upon one the silence that is bred of first-hand contact with the deep sanctities of life.

VI.

Already in the "kailyard" books there emerges a hint of that inborn sense of dramatic values which made Barrie such a consummate playwright in after days. This dramatic sense is to me the only blot upon even the "Window in Thrums." One feels at certain points—not often, but here and there—that the author has got outside of his characters and is stage-managing them. There is yet another flaw—a latent trend towards deliberate exploitation of sentiment—which breaks the enchantment of immediacy. "My God!" says one of his characters in a fit of self-analysis. "I could write an article on my mother's coffin." It was with a strange stab of pain that the true lovers of J. M. Barrie hailed his "Margaret Ogilvy," a book whose many beauties cannot compensate for its betrayal of some of the most sacred, tacenda of life. Yet one's prejudice—is it merely a prejudice?—against the breaking of reticence cannot blind one to the force of certain unforgettable passages in that revealing book—passages which have no exact parallel in recent literature. Here is the most poignant and haunting of them:—

"My sister, who was then passing out of her teens, came to me with a very anxious face, and wringing her hands, and she told me to go ben to my mother and say to her that she still had another boy. I went ben excitedly, but the room was dark, and when I heard the door shut and no sound come from the bed, I was afraid and I stood still. I suppose I was breathing hard, or perhaps I was crying; for after a time I heard a listless voice that had never been listless before say, 'Is that you?' I think it hurt me, for I made no answer, and then the voice said more anxiously, 'Is that you?' again. I thought it was the dead boy she was speaking to, and I said in a little lonely voice, 'No, it's no him; it's just me.' Then I heard a cry and my mother turned in her bed, and though it was dark I knew she was holding out her arms."

VII.

Sir J. M. Barrie's first dramatic venture in conjunction with Mr. Marriott Watson—a heavy romantic drama introducing historical personages—was foredoomed to failure. Only a few weeks later, however, he succeeded moderately with the skit, "Ibsen's Ghost," and not long after "Walker, London," took the play-going public by storm. "The Professor's Love Story" maintained the success, and would have been still better had the element of farce been omitted—a spasmodic inclination towards farce is one of Barrie's few dramatic vices. The announcement of "The Little Minister" filled competent judges with apprehension. Nothing is easier than to turn a good novel into a bad play, and dramatisations of novels are proverbially unsuccessful. "The Little Minister" was a brilliant exception, however. With inerrant instinct the story was altered to suit dramatic requirements, and the result was a live play in which every character told and every phrase was an integral part of the whole. The minor characters were delightfully individualised—Barrie is a miniaturist par excellence—without overshadowing the leading figures, and the whole was a masterpiece of technical craftsmanship.

VIII.

But Sir J. M. Barrie will remain to most of us the creator of Peter Pan. Which of us has ever felt quite the same since Peter Pan came floating in at our window and took us to the Never-Never land, which we had dreamt of all our lives, but never hoped to reach? We thought we had outgrown pirates (idiotic delusion!), but when we were introduced to the pirates of "Peter Pan" we knew we hadn't grown into them yet. We may toil all day long at some horribly useless and uninteresting occupation in the city, but every now and then of an evening we go with Peter, and are taught fairy philosophy, and pluck handfuls of moonshine, and are at home among the leaping fish and nesting birds. We have somehow slipped through the stile of time and into the magic mind of childhood, and all because J. M. Barrie wouldn't, or couldn't, grow up. Strange to say, his shyness makes him awkward with children. Yet there is a likely tale of how he once broke through his reserve and found his way into the hearts of a couple of boys, and how, after a while, he asked them what they meant to be when they were men, and they told him, adding, "And what do you mean to be?" Who was it said that R. L. S. wrote as a man for boys, and Barrie writes as a boy for men? True enough it is. Stevenson may have been a cheerier soul than Barrie will ever be, yet to the latter belongs the enviable happiness of not being able to sing a dirge to "the lad that is gone." He must have had his soberings and disillusionments. What man who first saw life through a window in Thrums could come up to London, and to Fleet Street, without suffering sharp and bitter disillusionments? Yet somehow—one likes to think it was Thrums and Margaret Ogilvy that did it—he remained the eternal boy who gave us Peter Pan. But not a few of us remember Thrums, and wish him back there long before the gloaming that brings all things home.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

MAXIMILIEN ROBESPIERRE.

DANS l'ombre encore, et derrière les chefs de l'Assemblée nationale, un homme, presque inconnu, commençait à se mouvoir, agité d'une pensée inquiète qui semblait lui interdire le silence et le repos; il tentait en toute occasion la parole, et s'attaquait indifféremment à tous les orateurs, même à Mirabeau. Humilié par les sarcasmes, étouffé par les murmures, désavoué par tous les partis, disparaissant entre les grands athlètes qui fixaient l'attention publique, il était sans cesse vaincu, jamais lassé. On eût dit qu'un génie intime et prophétique lui révélait d'avance la vanité de tous ces talents, la toute-puissance de la volonté et de la patience, et qu'une voix entendue de lui seul lui disait dans l'âme, "Ces hommes qui te méprisent t'appartiennent; tous les détours de cette Révolution qui ne veut pas te voir viendront aboutir à toi, car tu t'es placé sur sa route comme l'inévitable excès auquel aboutit toute impulsion!" Cet homme, c'était Robespierre.

Il y a des abîmes qu'on n'ose pas sonder et des caractères qu'on ne veut pas approfondir, de peur d'y trouver trop de ténèbres et trop d'horreur; mais l'histoire, qui a l'œil impassible du temps, ne doit pas s'arrêter à ces terreurs, elle doit comprendre ce qu'elle se charge de raconter.

Maximilien Robespierre était né à Arras d'une famille pauvre, honnête et respectée; son père, mort en Allemagne, était d'origine anglaise. Cela explique ce qu'il y avait de puritain dans cette nature. L'évêque d'Arras avait fait les frais de son éducation. Le jeune Maximilien s'était distingué, au sortir du collège, par une vie studieuse et par des mœurs austères. Les lettres et le barreau partageaient son temps. La philosophie de Jean-Jacques Rousseau avait pénétré profondément son intelligence; cette philosophie, en tombant dans une volonté active, n'était pas restée une lettre morte; elle était devenue en lui un dogme, une foi, un fanatisme. Dans l'âme forte d'un sectaire toute conviction devient secte. Robespierre était le Luther de la politique; il couvait dans l'obscurité la pensée confuse de la rénovation du monde social et du monde religieux, comme un rêve qui obsédait inutilement sa jeunesse, quand la Révolution vint lui offrir ce que la destinée offre toujours à ceux qui épient sa marche, l'occasion. Il la saisit. Il fut nommé député du tiers aux états-généraux. Seul peut-être de tous ces hommes qui ouvraient à Versailles la première scène de ce drame immense, il entrevoyait le dénouement. Comme l'âme humaine, dont les philosophes ignorent le siège dans le corps humain, la pensée de tout un peuple repose quelquefois dans l'individu le plus ignoré d'une vaste foule. Il ne faut mépriser personne. Robespierre n'avait rien, ni dans la naissance, ni dans le génie, ni dans l'extérieur, qui le désignât à l'attention des hommes. Aucun éclat n'était sorti de lui, son pâle talent n'avait rayonné que dans le barreau ou dans les académies de sa province; quelques discours verbeux, remplis d'une philosophie sans muscles et presque pastorale, quelques poésies froides et affectées avaient inutilement affiché son nom dans l'insignifiance des recueils littéraires du temps; il était plus qu'inconnu, il était médiocre et dédaigné. Ses traits n'avaient rien de ce qui fait arrêter le regard quand il flotte sur une grande assemblée; rien n'était écrit en caractères physiques sur cette puissance tout intérieure: il était le dernier mot de la Révolution, mais personne ne pouvait le lire.

MAXIMILIEN ROBESPIERRE.

STILL in the shade, and behind the leaders of the National Assembly, a man almost unknown began to move, agitated by uneasy thoughts, which seemed to forbid him to be silent and quiet; he spoke on all occasions, and attacked all speakers indifferently, including Mirabeau himself. Humiliated by sarcasm, silenced by murmurs, disowned by all parties, lost amongst the eminent champions who fixed public attention, he was incessantly beaten, but never dispirited. It would seem as if an inward and prophetic genius revealed to him the vanity of all talent, and the omnipotence of a firm will and unwearied patience, and that a voice said to him, "These men who despise thee are thine; stages of this Revolution which now will not deign to look upon thee will eventually terminate in thee, for thou hast placed thyself in the way like the inevitable excess, in which all impulse ends." That man was Robespierre.

There are abysses that we dare not sound, and characters we desire not to fathom, for fear of finding in them too many shadows and too much horror; but history, which has the unflinching eye of time, must not be chilled by these terrors; she must understand whilst she undertakes to recount.

Maximilien Robespierre was born at Arras, of a poor but honest and respectable family; his father, who died in Germany, was of English origin. This may explain the shade of Puritanism in his character. The Bishop of Arras defrayed the cost of his education. On leaving college young Maximilien distinguished himself by a studious life and austere manners. Literature and the Bar divided his time. The philosophy of Jean Jacques Rousseau penetrated deeply into his mind; that philosophy, falling upon an active imagination, did not remain a dead letter; it became in him a dogma, a faith, a fanaticism. In the strong mind of a sectarian all conviction produces a sect. Robespierre was the Luther of politics, and in obscurity he brooded over the confused thoughts of a renovation of the social world and the religious world as a dream which unavailingly beset his youth, when the Revolution came to offer him what destiny always offers to those who watch her progress, opportunity. He seized it. He was named deputy of the third estate in the States-General. Alone, perhaps, among all these men who opened at Versailles the first scene of this vast drama, he foresaw the termination; like the soul, whose seat in the human frame philosophers have failed to discover, the thought of an entire people sometimes concentrates itself in the individual the least known in a vast crowd. We should despise no man. Robespierre had nothing—neither birth, nor genius, nor appearance—which drew men's attention to him. There was nothing conspicuous about him; his limited talent had only shone at the Bar or in provincial academies; a few verbose harangues, filled with a tame and almost rustic philosophy, some fragments of cold and affected poetry, had vainly displayed his name in the insignificance of the literary productions of the day: he was more than unknown, he was mediocre and contemned. There was no sign in visible characters of this power which was all within; he was the last word of the Revolution, but no one could read it.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

GEORGE ELIOT'S "ADAM BEDE"*

It has been said that the genius of George Eliot found most complete expression in "Middlemarch," and that, as a whole, the level of its achievement is better sustained than in any of her other works must be conceded. The variety of types, the swift characterisation, the unerring psychology of the men and women who throng its pages, is unequalled throughout her novels. There is, however, in "Adam Bede" a simplicity, an intimate and appealing charm, that brings the story home to us more closely than the more brilliant novel. No one has portrayed village life, village gossip, more convincingly than George Eliot. She belongs to that school of romance that, not content with the psychology of one type, the dissection of motive, the analysis of cause and effect, includes within its scope a number and variety of men and women each with their own drama, their own ambitions and disappointments.

Hetty Sorrel stands as the type for young femininity, as yet unversed in womanly wiles, vain with a child's vanity, greedy of pleasure, but greedy also to win the good opinions of her fellows, and for that reason possessed of an attraction that, taken in conjunction with her beauty, wins her the suffrages of the many readers who have followed her story, and whose hearts have ached for her pitiful fate.

Arthur is a conventional study, with little moral fibre, and more than his share of masculine vanity. He only once rises to a certain height of strength, where he fights Adam in the wood, after the latter has discovered his entanglement with Hetty. Here, again, George Eliot is supremely right. Arthur is an everyday sort of person, with a certain loveliness about him, an apparent sympathy, a surface good nature that makes him shrink from giving pain to others or inflicting it on himself. Dislike of unpleasant things is the secret of his undoing: he dreaded hurting Hetty and himself in the inevitable explanation that must have followed on the announcement that he regarded the "incident as closed," and in characteristic fashion slipped off in secret to Ireland—beyond the reach of poor Hetty and her woe. And as inevitably happens to the man who shirks facts through fear of pain—either to himself or others—the result was the infliction of tenfold greater agony on those he desired to spare.

Mrs. Poyser, with her caustic wit and genial contempt for the male sex, is one of the most perfect studies of the author. Her stinging criticism of the man who, like the cock, thought the sun got up to hear him crow, is unequalled for pungency of humour, and her general attitude to the men folk of the farm is a perpetual joy. She is an excellent foil to Adam's mother, a woman of the Gummidge type, who is never so liappy as when she is miserable.

But, clever as are the portraits of the village folk, they may serve to focus the interest in the frail figure of the heroine. Almost alone among women novelists, George Eliot paints a girl who, innocent and virginal, yields to the attraction of sex; Hetty, without question or hesitation, confides herself to the hands of Arthur, the local squire, and the suggestion of overwhelming love or passion is not urged in her behalf. Accustomed to an admiration seasoned only by Mrs. Poyser's caustic comments, it is small wonder that she thinks herself a fitting mate for the first man of a different social caste with whom she comes in contact. Adam Bede, the village carpenter, has worshipped her from a child, seasoning his devotion with a certain grave criticism of her kittenish delight in her own grace. He is a fine type of a race now rapidly passing into extinction. The peasant in the days of which George Eliot writes was not faced with the problems that confront the dweller in our villages to-day. But, making full allowance for his admirable qualities, one understands just how he failed to capture Hetty's heart. It was not entirely the fact that Arthur was a gentleman that outweighed Adam in her eyes. There was a lack of spontaneity in the village carpenter. He had none of the exuberance of youth, was prone to look upon Hetty's sudden and unexpected moods of joy and ecstasies of delight in simple things as a symptom of a dislike for graver matters that might develop into an attitude of light-mindedness!

Take this picture of the poor, pretty little girl, who, fearful of being discovered in the act of admiring her fresh young beauty, carefully locks the door before she permits herself the delight of dressing up, a delight common to all young things, and harmless, as is all healthy human vanity.

"She was going to let down her hair and make herself look like that picture of a lady in Miss Lydia Donnithorne's dressing-room. It was soon done, and the dark, hyacinthine curves fell on her neck. It was not heavy, massive, merely rippling hair, but soft and silken, running at every opportunity into delicate rings; . . . even the old mottled glass couldn't help sending back a lovely image, none the less lovely because Hetty's stays were not of white satin—such as, I feel sure, heroines must generally wear—but of a dark greenish cotton texture."

There was a special reason that night why Hetty found an added pleasure in her beauty. Arthur Donnithorne had met her for the first time since she emerged from childhood, and the admiration that his eyes had expressed at their meeting had grown into a stronger feeling, until, yielding to the irresistible witchery of her womanhood, he had lost his head and passionately kissed her.

"Hetty looked at herself to-night with quite a different sensation from what she had ever felt before; there was an invisible spectator, whose eye rested on her like morning on the flowers. His soft voice was saying over and over again those pretty things she had heard in the woods; his arms round her, and the delicate rose-scent of his hair was with her still; . . . the vainest woman is never thoroughly conscious of her own beauty till she is loved by the man who sets her own passion vibrating in return."

To this pretty creature sunning herself like a bird in the radiance of her charms comes Dinah, the good woman of the piece. I often wonder whether George Eliot realised how painfully unprepossessing this young woman appears. It has always seemed to me that she lavished on the woman Methodist preacher a vain wealth of care in endeavouring to imbue her with that passionate instinct for religious devotion that before now has moved men to perform miracles. But not even the genius of George Eliot could, I think, make Dinah a living and pulsating being. She appears as a priggish, cold-blooded abstraction, pouring on Hetty's warm vitality a cold stream of platitudes that must, one feels, have turned the young girl's heart to stone.

* Everyman's Library, 1s. net.

The contrast between the two women is one that I do not think the author realised. Dinah at the best commands respect; Hetty captures our love, and through all her weakness and her folly, her childish caprice and ingratitude, the love remains.

Never has the poignancy of a situation, tragic as any in the history of human nature, been more graphically portrayed. Hetty is faced with the knowledge that she is about to have a child. Arthur, with the easy repentance of his type, has decided it would be better and fairer to the girl if he saw no more of her. He departs to Ireland ignorant of the fact, and the girl, who has grown to regard him as the one thing in life, finds herself left desolate and afraid. Impossible to confide in her aunt. Mrs. Poyser, most inimitable of women, would have handled her in stringent fashion; to Adam, her lifelong worshipper, she dare not turn, and Dinah has never succeeded in gaining her confidence. With the stubborn resolution of all weak, hunted things, Hetty leaves her home. It has been urged that so frail a thing as she could never have borne the burden of her secret, that she must have confided in someone more capable of endurance than herself; but in this George Eliot seems to me to have shown marvellous insight into feminine psychology. Weak things are always secretive, and the capacity for silence shown by a young girl left without resource and literally with her back to the wall has more than once been exemplified in the annals of our courts. She was so sure of Adam's love that she might have been excused had she turned to him for consolation, and that she resisted the temptation must be counted to her favour in the welter of suffering that followed.

In an exquisite description of Adam and Hetty in the fruit gardens, George Eliot gives us a passage keyed to an emotional intensity that stirs one to the keenest remembrance. The author is a magician that opens the doors of memory and revivifies emotions long hidden, experiences almost extinct.

"He could glance at her continually as she bent over the fruit, while the level evening sunbeams stole through the thick apple-tree boughs, and rested on her round cheek and neck as if they, too, were in love with her. It was to Adam the time that a man can least forget in after life—the time when he believes that the first woman he has ever loved betrays by a slight something—a word, a tone, a glance, the quivering of an eye or an eyelid—that she is at least beginning to love him in return."

Adam never forgot that hour. One feels that in his after life, when Dinah, fulfilling the secret hopes of her soul, had married him, the vision of Hetty standing in the sunshine, while the green boughs waved above her head, framing the rose-flushed, exquisite face, must at times have blotted out the white-capped head of his wife, and that the swift smile of his love must have emphasised "the mud-grey eyes" of the Methodist preacher.

Hetty's wanderings, the desolation which engulfed her, the madness of despair that shut out the acuteness of her physical sufferings, is painted in colours that can never fade. Hunted from place to place, conscious of curious eyes that noted the difference in the poor slender figure, incapable of framing a credible story that would account for her condition, Hetty gives birth to a child. The extremity of her suffering, without help or human aid, blots out all moral consciousness, and, unable to combat with the blows of Fate, she smothers the little creature in a wood. The author treats the situation in simple, frank fashion. She does not portray a heroine of rare fidelity of soul or nobility of character, who, unsuspecting and trustful, is betrayed and abandoned. Hetty has no great qualities of mind, no marked generosity of impulse. She is a type one meets and recognises every day; a type that in favourable circumstances would develop into a satisfactory mother and complacent wife, but who in the crisis of her fate is not strong enough to suffer. It is the humanness of the story that grips the reader; a weak girl with all the forces of the world, her world, arrayed against her, not a helping hand held out, Hetty's pilgrimage might well be the tale of many another as young, as helpless as she, to whom in the day of their darkest anguish the heavens were as brass, and the whole world an ache and a reproach.

One wishes George Eliot, in the prison scene between Dinah and Hetty, after the latter is arrested, had sunk the instinct of the preacher to capture a lost soul, in the compassion of one woman for another in her blackest hour. Hetty breaks down, and in broken language confesses the truth, and describes how she hid the baby in a hole under a nut tree and covered it with grass and chips; but that the mother instinct that had been so cruelly tortured led her back. "I knew the way to the place, . . . the place against the nut tree; and I could hear it cry at every step. . . . I thought it was alive. . . . I don't know whether I was frightened or glad. . . . I don't know what I felt. I only know I was in the wood and heard the cry. I don't know what I felt till I saw the baby was gone; . . . my heart went like a stone: I couldn't wish or try for anything; it seemed like I should stay there for ever, and nothing 'ud ever change. But they came and took me away."

It has always seemed to me that with Hetty's confession the story ends. The poor little butterfly, hopelessly broken on life's wheel, brings the curtain down upon the tragedy with her shuddering appeal. All that follows—the melodrama of the trial, Arthur's frantic and inartistic arrival with a reprieve, Hetty's transportation and ultimate death—seems to me vague and unreal. The most poignant note is struck in the poor child's broken plea:

"Dinah, do you think God will take away that cry and the place in the wood? . . ."

So real, so vivid is the tragic figure that one re-echoes the prayer, with tears in the eyes, and a break at the heart.

MARGARET HAMILTON.

THE TEN MOST POPULAR ARTICLES IN "EVERYMAN"

WE propose opening a Referendum upon the ten most popular articles which have appeared in the first twenty-six numbers of EVERYMAN. Readers are invited to send in a list of the ten articles which have been of the greatest interest to them, placing them in what they regard as their order of merit, and we offer two prizes of £2 and £1 respectively for the two lists corresponding most closely to the ten articles receiving the largest number of votes from our readers. Lists, marked "EVERYMAN Referendum," should reach the Competition Editor, 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh, by July 1st.

Vol. I. of EVERYMAN, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d., carriage paid 4s., will be forwarded on application to the EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C. Cases for binding can also be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 8d.

THE INNER LIGHT * * * BY DARRELL FIGGIS

I.

The Renaissance of Mysticism

IT is not easy to realise how far we have moved, in the spiritual attitude towards Life, during a matter of two or three decades. It is the proud trick of every age to imagine that the future will date from its peculiar way of thinking; and probably there have been few periods when this attitude was more assured than in the latter half of the nineteenth century. Any attempt to take what may permissibly be called an immaterial view of this substantial globe and its affairs was to meet a scorn that was as withering as it proposed to be final. The gesture with which the spiritual inclinations of men were dismissed was a very authoritative affair. The Art of the period (Art being essentially a religious impulse—or, rather, the divination and ordering of certain things from which religions derive themselves) became stuffy in consequence; and Science, masking a living earth in set terms, took what appeared to be a permanent ascendancy. And yet what a difference has come about in a few years! Science has itself dropped its masks and set terms, admitting them to be unreal. Physicists have surrendered the central mask of matter, and shown us an amazing world of appearances at the meeting-place of driving forces. The very mathematicians have begun to frame a conceptual fourth dimension, with the chemist to aid him as he watches the strange behaviour of left-handed and right-handed crystals. And so everywhere a change has come (or, one may say, is slowly coming); and philosophers like Bergson, Eucken, and James (in a bewilderingly direct way) are concerning themselves with a world beyond appearances, for the discovery of which our best guide is within us.

It is her place in this general movement that makes Miss Evelyn Underhill's two books so important. "The Mystic Way," that has just been published (Dent, 12s. 6d. net), is in the way of a personal thesis, following upon her monumental book on "Mysticism" (Methuen, 15s. net), published two years ago. Both are scholarly rather than adventurous; but the last lives for the sake of its thesis, whereas the first is an indispensable handbook to its subject. The very fault of "The Mystic Way" is the very virtue of "Mysticism," for a book that sets out to take within its survey the whole field of mysticism, in each of its stages and in all of its forms, has clearly to be dependent on the results of extensive reading. Beginning at the very outset of all such inquiries, what she justly calls "The Point of Departure," "Mysticism" covers the whole of the relations of its subject with the intellectual and emotional activities of man, and then proceeds to outline the progress of the secret path along which the mystic must develop.

II.

Mysticism versus Magic

"Mysticism" is thus the only book of its kind in English, and there is no chapter in its nearly six hundred pages that is not full of suggestion and help. Especially good, and as salutary as good, is the chapter on "Mysticism and Magic." It will seem strange to say that a chapter is good that yet misses the essence of a very essential question; but the fact is that Miss Underhill, despite what will seem to many a misapprehension, is on the lines of a just severance between the by-products and true growth of spiritual progress. It is told of the Sûfist mystic, Jelalu' d' Din Rumi, that one of his pupils came to him despondently, saying that he had endured much spiritual discipline, but that his servant maid, though she had endured no such discipline, had come into the possession of such psychic gifts as he had never been able to exercise. Jelalu' d' Din Rumi's reply went at once to the centre of the whole question. He said that spiritual progress was not necessarily accompanied by psychic gifts; and that psychic gifts were often indeed a great hindrance to spiritual progress, inasmuch as they caused their possessor to be preoccupied with themselves. There is a deep, assured wisdom in that attitude. It neglects neither side. Miss Underhill, too, admits the virtue of much that she falsely includes under the name of Magic. That the world beyond worlds, towards which, and under the light of which, spiritual development tends, which is, in fact, the goal and lawgiver of mystical progress, should, under certain circumstances, called out by certain symbols and powers, be induced to demonstrate itself to the physical senses, is not so very odd a proposition if the reality of that world includes and embraces the false show of this. And that is the basis of Magic. Yet Miss Underhill's attitude is a wise one for many reasons. First, because, though the severe course of spiritual progress allows of little deception, magic is full of the possibilities of fraud. Secondly, because magical properties, even when most assured of faith, are almost as irrelevant to the true soul-thrift as the so-called facts of the materialist. They are both in the outer courts of the temple of the throbbing universe. And in her attitude towards this, the pivot of much in mysticism, one may catch the colour of her attitude towards the whole field. It is impossible to mention in the space of one article the scope of so justly encyclopædic a book. It is enough to say that it is the outstanding indispensable book to the student who is at the same time profoundly concerned with his place in the drift and destiny of things.

III.

The Mystic Way

Out of "Mysticism" "The Mystic Way" grows like a selected plant out of a bed that could sustain many plants of differing colour and shape. It is, in fact, an individual book: a declaration of personal faith. Its faults are its limitations. In certain parts of the book she leans, very much to our surprise, on just that magical explanation of difficult things that she seemed to hold in such just disapprobation in her earlier book. The whole of her chapter on "The Johannine Mystic" is marked by that. In other parts she neglects altogether the juster portions of that Magic, such as the strange manifestations of Earth that men living close to reality so often experience, and which are a very part of spiritual development. A thinker whom in her earlier book she classes among the "Magicians," Rudolf Steiner, could have afforded her some very striking helps to the teaching of Christ had she been willing to accept the non-systematic approach towards that teaching. And her attitude here is the less easy to be understood because the whole theme of "The Mystic Way" is that Christ did not come to establish a system but to expound a way of living, to open out the true secret spiritual path: with the obvious corollary that His followers are they who exemplify that beauty and discipline of experience, and most assuredly not they who give their adherence to any kind or manner of system, organisation, or creed.

IV.

Christ, the Mystic

It is not, to be true, a strikingly new thing to say, though it certainly is a strikingly necessary thing to say. The force of her remarkable book is in the exposition of the life of Christ in the light of that fact. She shows how Christ passed along each step of that mystic way, from the awakening, through purgation, illumination, the dark night of the soul, to the life of union and completeness. There are some parts of that exposition that make fascinating reading because they throw a broad ray of light over much that was hid. There are other parts, such as her account of the events of the crucifixion, that are puzzling because of her seeming evasion of the full force, one way or another, of central difficulties to material science.

In spite of these natural disagreements, her exposition is a striking one; and it is most striking when she comes to the spiritual development of Paul, where each of the steps are seen to be reproduced in the order in which they were experienced by Christ Himself. And so, as she proceeds with her account of the spiritual experiences in the chief examples of Christian beauty of life, the same order of progress is seen to be faithfully reproduced. It makes a fascinating study; and it will prove not less than fascinating to those who do not agree with the severe line that Miss Underhill decrees for that order of progress, or her strange preoccupation with intellectual processes—in spite of her expressed distrust of the findings of the intellect.

THE SURPLUSAGE OF WOMEN

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Chiozza Money, in his articles on "The New Emigration," informs us that the "feminine surplusage, already great, will increase every year, with social effects of the most lamentable character."

Surely this problem of the surplusage of women deserves more than a passing reference, for there are few problems which raise more formidable issues. By a wonderful and mysterious provision of Nature, the sexes are nearly equally balanced in numbers. That providential balance has been once or twice upset in the past through protracted wars like the Crusades, or like the Napoleonic and revolutionary wars. To-day it is being completely upset in the British Isles through wholesale emigration, with the result that there will soon be nearly a million more women than men.

The consequences are manifold, and nearly all of them are disastrous.

(1) Marriage was already very difficult owing to the insecurity of industrial conditions, owing to the increasing pressure of life in large towns, and owing to the increasing reluctance of the younger generation to undertake parental responsibility. Those difficulties will be enormously increased, and marriage will become even more of a trade than it was in the past. (See Miss Cicely Hamilton's book, "Marriage as a Trade," 1s.)

(2) As there are not enough men to go round, women will be increasingly induced, and, indeed, compelled, to marry inferior men, and the quality of the race will be accordingly reduced.

(3) Hundreds of thousands of women, being unable to establish a home, will be more and more driven into the industrial market in competition with men. This is seen in almost every profession, but especially in such professions as those of teachers, clerks, stenographers. This competition is not only disastrous to women, it is perhaps even more disastrous to men, for celibate women, having fewer wants, having a lower standard of life, and also being partly able to depend for their support on their parents, must inevitably reduce wages, and must almost invariably tend to play the demoralising part of "blacklegs" in the industrial market. The invasion of this army of women workers is, therefore, nothing short of a social calamity, and a few years of female rivalry must undo the work of generations of trade-union efforts.

(4) Women, being unable to fulfil their natural destiny, are becoming more and more highly strung, unbalanced, and neurotic. Many of the methods of the present militant suffragists are the result of a new form of hysteria, which itself is the result of the surplusage of women. To consider suffragism mainly as a political question is to take an entirely superficial view of the facts. Suffragism and militancy are essentially the outcome of industrial phenomena, as has been very eloquently stated by Mrs. Baillie Reynolds, in a recent letter to the Daily Mail. They are primarily the outcome of the new conditions created by the competition of women in the industrial market. There is no militancy in France, although the position of women in France is admittedly better than in this country.

(5) Owing to the disastrous scarcity of males, and the consequent difficulty of marriage, women are compelled to multiply their opportunities, and to create them where they do not exist. The phenomenon described by Mr. Bernard Shaw in "Man and Superman" is becoming more and more general. It is not the male who is chasing the female, it is the female who is chasing the male. This is delicate ground, but there can be no doubt that the present artificial relations of the sexes are dangerous to public morality.—I am, sir, etc.,

A. D.

"EVERYMAN" TOURS.

THE success of these tours, arranged with a special regard for the taste and convenience of the readers of EVERYMAN, is bringing each day so many applications, that before long certain of the tours will be fully booked up, to the inevitable disappointment of those who have not decided in time to take advantage of the opportunities afforded for a pleasant holiday in congenial companionship. The scope and variety of the itineraries should afford every reader an opportunity for selecting the special country or place they most desire to visit. Switzerland, France, Belgium, and Holland afford a wide margin of choice, and the places mapped out for each tour are those likely to appeal to people of cultured taste rather than to the bustling tourist eager to see as much as possible for his money. Show me a man or woman who likes my favourite books, said a writer, my favourite pictures, my favourite paper, and you will show me a congenial companion, who, given opportunity, may become a friend. The readers of EVERYMAN will welcome this opportunity of meeting those who share their tastes and enthusiasms. Each party will be accompanied, not by an automatic conductor, but by a guide at once cultured and sympathetic, who will take a personal interest in each individual in his charge. Full information will be given on application to Tours Department, EVERYMAN, Aldine House, Bedford Street, London.

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

DR. EDWIN W. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

A short time ago we brought before our readers' notice the remarkable results that had been obtained by the adoption of Dr. Alabone's inhalation treatment for the Cure of Consumption and Asthma. Since then, innumerable testimonials have come to hand rendering it an established fact that the curability of these diseases is not only possible, but that under the "Alabone Treatment" a very large majority of cases perfectly recover, and remain well. The statistics are certainly of a most encouraging nature, for, taking the results of the treatment in a hundred cases, many of which were in the last stage of the disease, and had been given up by well-known specialists as absolutely hopeless, we find that at least from thirty to forty cases recover—a truly remarkable average.

When we return to the results achieved by the open-air treatment we are faced with bitter disappointment. Certainly a large number of Consumptives are sent away from Sanatoria as cured, but on enquiry it is found that the disease recurs in a shorter or longer interval, whilst those who get worse are sent home to die. The statistics of these institutions are therefore perfectly misleading, as has been pointed out by no less an authority than Carl Pearson, of the London University. He naturally uses strong language in his criticisms—in fact, stated that one book written by two well-known specialists should be withdrawn from circulation, which was done. It is, therefore, little wonder that the public and the profession consider this no cure for Consumption.

Now, to make a statement is one thing, to prove such a statement true is quite another; let us, therefore, turn to the proofs of the inadequacy of Sanatoria to cure Consumption, and then to the proofs of the efficacy of the Alabone treatment.

A medical man, himself cured by Dr. Alabone, speaking of the methods adopted in Sanatoria, writes: "So many cases of the so-called open-air cure, in which patients have only returned home worse than they left, have come under my notice that I am annoyed anyone can be found to place confidence in such treatment."

Another physician, in writing to express his gratitude for recovery from phthisis under Dr. Alabone's specific treatment, says that he is at a loss to find words to express his feelings in returning thanks for the great benefit he has received from Dr. Alabone's treatment. He is now completely cured, but in his letter he is careful to point out that at the time he commenced the treatment he was in a most serious condition, his lungs being extensively diseased.

Sir,—I have some thirty patients in all stages of phthisis undergoing Dr. Alabone's treatment—some very bad, so that I should not be surprised if I had lost one or two, but at present I have lost none. The improvement in them is most marked and surprising. I do not think there is any doubt of the efficacy of his treatment in stopping the advancement of the disease. It has in my hands been very successful in many cases.—I am, yours faithfully,

W. F.—, M.D., L.R.C.P., L.M.Edin.

It has been stated by some people that Dr. Alabone, seeing he so strongly condemns the open-air cure measures for treating phthisis, does not approve of consumptives being exposed to the open air. In all fairness to Dr. Alabone we hasten to say that such statements are untrue, and we again draw attention to the fact that this eminent specialist was the first person

(many years before the advent of Sanatoria) to advocate the abolition of the old custom of confining persons afflicted with consumption in overheated and almost air-tight rooms, which practice, as any of our readers would easily understand, was absolutely dangerous to the sufferers. At the same time, Dr. Alabone pointed out the advisability of consumptives being out of doors whenever the weather was favourable, recommending lined hammocks. In inclement weather he suggested that patients should remain indoors with windows open, but all possibilities of draught being precluded. The above-mentioned facts explain away entirely any suggestions as to Dr. Alabone disapproving of fresh air for persons suffering from tuberculosis.

It is not at all surprising that Dr. Alabone should condemn the measures employed in our Sanatoria. In those institutions the patients are exposed to all conditions of weather—damp, fog, snow, and other unsuitable conditions. We think that every right-minded person will agree that such practices are unwarrantable, and constitute a real danger to the lives of the patients.

From the very considerable amount of evidence before us, we therefore fully and unhesitatingly endorse the wish expressed in a letter which has been received from a physician who enjoys a wide practice. What he writes in regard to the "Alabone Treatment" for consumption, and which is very much to the point, is as follows: "I trust the time is not far distant when Dr. Edwin W. Alabone's discovery will be unanimously adopted by our profession. Such a procedure would be a boon to many sufferers who now look forward to a lingering death."

It is satisfactory to be able to record the fact that a considerable number of physicians have adopted this treatment with their patients, and have obtained from it the most satisfactory results—results, we venture to affirm, which have been attained by no other system known. Boards of Guardians are also discussing the advisability of introducing it into their infirmaries, many having witnessed its extraordinary success with members of their own families.

Nurses at Sanatoria and Hospitals who were stricken down by Phthisis, and who, after undergoing open-air treatment, were pronounced incurable, have been cured and resumed their usual avocations.

We recommend our readers to obtain a copy of Dr. Alabone's work, entitled "The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh." This work has had an enormous sale. The following works are also of special interest to those personally concerned in the curative treatment of this disease—they can be obtained from the author, Lynton House, Highbury Quadrant, London, N.—"Testimonials of Patients, with Comments on the Open-Air Treatment," price 1s.; "Infamous Conduct," price 6d.; "How the Cure of Consumption is Suppressed," price 1s.; and "Facts Regarding the Open-Air Treatment," price 1s., by Edwin W. Alabone, M.D., Phil. D.Sc., ex-M.R.C.S., Eng., F.R.M.S., etc.

We would mention, and it will undoubtedly be valuable information to some of our readers, that the "Alabone" system of treatment for Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, can be carried out at patients' own homes, Dr. Alabone having recently invented a smaller machine which is quite portable.

RAVAGEAU

BY ANDRÉ THEURIET

IT was in the days when I was a keen sportsman that I made friends with Michel Tringuesse, the shepherd of the Vivey waste. This grey, rolling moorland stretches its stony barrenness from the last villages of the mountain of Langres to the first rise of the forest-clad slopes of Burgundy. Here and there an old bush of blackthorn or a wild pear-tree breaks the everlasting bareness, and serves as a guide-post to the traveller who ventures to make a short cut across the waste. No road crosses it: each man must pick his path for himself; and it needs long habit, or a special instinct, not to get lost. At set of sun this desert tract does not lack a wild beauty of its own; round its horizon dim, far-off forests weave their violet fringes; stunted junipers cast long dark bars of shadow across its empurpled undulations; and just as the sun disappears, all the colours melt into a velvet grey of a mysterious softness that belongs to the land of dreams. But in winter the face of the waste land grows cruel, the north wind raves unceasingly over the frost-bitten herbage, the bushes are stiff with rime, and from the bare and naked woods the evening silence is broken by the long-drawn howl of the wolf.

Tringuesse, the shepherd, was king of the Vivey waste. At all times of the year I met him there in his bell-shaped felt hat, wrapping his brown woollen cloak around his lean frame as he drove his flock to some problematical pasturage. Fifty years of hardship had left him small claims to beauty, with his frowning brows, his small, foxy eyes, sharp, thin nose, and straggling red beard; but his long watches on the waste had not only made him an observer of nature, but had given his mind a philosophical and analytical turn. He was familiar with the many medicinal herbs that the forest produces, and he could use them to cure animals, and sometimes even men, with the result that the peasants round held him for a magician. He was ready to make a joke of this accusation, and did so on his own initiative while I was smoking a pipe with him.

"A magician, indeed!" he exclaimed, jeeringly; "well, I'm a bit more of one than they are, for they are more stupid than my sheep there. When they are in need they just come cringing and whining to me; as soon as I have put them right they treat me as a wicked sorcerer, and for twopence they would burn me alive as in the old days. Doesn't it strike you, monsieur, that animals often have more feeling and less vice than men? To my mind, if there is a heaven, some brutes have a better right to be in paradise than lots of Christians. Look you here, for ten years I had a dog by the name of Ravageau, who was my mate and companion, and had more sense and more feeling than the best man going. He was a Great Dane crossed with a French Mastiff, as big as a young donkey, as active as a squirrel, and as strong as a bull. His stiff, iron-grey hair was like a fleece, his big head tapered to a fine muzzle with terrible jaws, and his reddish-yellow eyes shone like coals of fire. He could break a wolf's back with one shake, as if it were a rabbit's. And for all that, he was quiet, nothing of the savage about him; he just looked at the sheep, and they did what he wanted.

"That dog and I were chums. You just think of it; for ten years we never were out of each other's sight. We slept side by side, we ate the same bread, and finished up always with a bit of a talk together. We understood each other right well: he knew the meaning of my words and signs, while, what with long practice and attention, I had learned his dog-language; for these animals, monsieur, talk just like us. They have their way of expressing their ideas and their wishes, their sorrows and their joys, by barks, sung, you might almost call it, sharply or softly, short or long drawn out, according to the feeling in their hearts or the idea running in their heads.

"Well, the years went slipping along like the beads on a rosary, and Ravageau began to get old. In our trade, where we sleep on the hard ground, and have to stand the rough changes of the seasons, and to be constantly on the watch, one grows old faster. So, as Ravageau was getting on, I thought to get me a young dog who might serve an apprenticeship under him, and become a help to him, and finally replace him when the old chap came to the end of his tether. I had at the time a shepherd boy who kept the flock with me. One day he brought me a four months' old Spaniel pup, sharp and intelligent, who promised to turn out a useful dog. We christened him Roussillon, because of his reddish-brown coat, and I introduced him to Ravageau. My word! the meeting was none too friendly. At first, the Great Dane looked askance at this stranger coming to poke his nose into his business. He walked round him, showing his teeth, with a low growl, and snuffed at him suspiciously. It seemed, however, that the result of the examination was in favour of the little spaniel, for after a minute or two Ravageau arched his back, with his legs gathered under him, looked playfully at Roussillon, and, with a gay bounce and a short bark, invited him to have a game of play. The puppy, being at the right age to love play, and to make friends quickly, accepted with joy.

"By the end of the day they were on the best of terms, and Ravageau cuddled Roussillon up to him, and licked his young companion most lovingly. By the next day he had frankly adopted him, and the apprenticeship began. When the flock scattered out too much, and part of it seemed to want to work off into the woods, Ravageau gave his pupil a knowing look, with his head turned in the direction of the sheep, and let out a warning bark at them. The untrained spaniel did not understand, so the old dog ran by himself after the stragglers, turned them, and brought them back in two shakes; and then, when the flock was moving along properly again, he came back triumphantly to his little friend, and gave two or three bow-wow-wows, as if telling him: 'There, that's how it's done!'

"Roussillon's education took time, for he was both young, a loiterer, and very inattentive. Ravageau did not weary of it. He would patiently begin all over again, and took no end of trouble to teach his apprentice the tricks of the trade. He never lost his temper, but, on the contrary, seemed all the fonder of his comrade. 'Tis the way of the world: those who give most trouble are the best loved, and women lavish caresses on the children who have been the hardest to rear. Ravageau's affection for Roussillon was truly delightful to watch. He never touched his mess till the spaniel had finished. At night, in the fold, he stretched himself on the straw, and, with a little whine, invited his protégé to come and shelter between his paws; and he did not go to sleep till the little one, cuddled up warm against his body, was snoring peacefully.

"Three months rolled away thus, and we were in mid-October. The leaves turned red, the nights grew cold; but we were still keeping the sheep up on the waste, waiting for the first frosts before coming down to the fields and wintering at the village. One night, as the shepherd boy and I were sleeping side by side in our shepherd's cot on wheels, with Ravageau and Roussillon under it, I was roughly wakened by the furious baying of the Great Dane. 'Decanille!' cried I to the boy, who was rubbing his eyes, 'that means something out of the common.' I caught up my crook, and we sprang out. The sky was clear with myriads of stars, and the last of an old moon was sinking towards the woods. The sheep were bunched together, trembling and bleating in a distressful manner, while Ravageau and Roussillon, walking stiffly on their toes, were growling, each louder than the other.

"'They smell the wolf,' I whispered to the boy; 'you stay here in the fold and keep your eye open while I go and see what's up outside.'

"I took both dogs and went cautiously outside the fence. Suddenly, by a gleam of light from the sinking moon, I caught a glimpse of the marauders who were the cause of all this fuss, and I plastered myself against the fence corner. Wolves they were, a pair of them. Silent, with long, stealthy steps, snuffing the wind, they made for the fold, their eyes shining like glow-worms in the darkness.

"I cast a glance at Ravageau; he was nobly sheltering the spaniel between his great legs, and only waited for the signal from me to attack. Already I could hear the breath of the two wolves coming close. 'Seek 'em, Ravageau!' With one bound the dog sprang upon one of the robbers, while I made play on the other with my crook. He caught the wolf by the middle of the back and threw him, and those great jaws of his did grand work, for the wolf howled like a soul in torment. Ah, the brave Ravageau! He took the accursed beast by the throat and choked him dead. The wolf hadn't time to let out another squeak; up went his toes, and it was all over with him. The other wolf had bolted like a coward. 'Good riddance,' thought I, and was turning to go in again when I saw Ravageau, evidently in distress, snuffing to right and left with plaintive whines, and I understood at once that he was looking for Roussillon, who, in the scrimmage, had been quite forgotten.

"'Roussillon, hey, Roussillon!' But I whistled for him in vain. The spaniel was gone, nor had the boy seen anything of him.

"'Oh, well,' said I, 'he'll turn up to-morrow. Let's go back to bed,' and we went to sleep again. But next day, when we rose in the early day to let out the sheep, lo! someone else was missing. Ravageau didn't answer when I called him. During the night he had jumped the fence and gone off to look for his little friend.

"All day long we looked for him in vain, and we were growing terribly anxious, when towards sunset we heard a woeful howl from the side of the Charbonnière woods.

"'That's he,' cried I. 'Stay you here; I'm off to see . . . ' and I ran straight to the thicket whence at intervals issued distressful howls, like the cries of a woman in travail. Guided by the noise, I made my way through the brambles to an old charcoal-burning place, and there, monsieur, what do you think I saw? Ravageau sitting on his haunches, his bristles up, his eyes showing the whites, his head turned to the sky, and howling like a mad thing. On the trampled earth, almost under his feet, were broken bones and blood, scraps of red-brown hair, the remains of a mangled carcass, and that was all that was left of Roussillon. Poor little dog! Whilst Ravageau was busy with the one wolf he had been carried off by the other robber, who had torn him to pieces and made mincemeat of him. Ravageau's misery was heart-breaking. It was no use my calling him away. He refused to leave the spot, and I found the only way to bring him along was to gather up the bones in my cloak. Then he followed me like a lamb, with drooping head, his tail between his legs, moaning and snuffing sadly at the bundle which contained the remains of the unhappy Roussillon.

"A week later we moved down to Vivey for the winter. But the spaniel's death had been a bad blow to Ravageau. He grew uneasy, cross, and quarrelsome, and he could not stand the sight of the village curs. One day he bit one of them which happened to be owned by the mayor's wife. The mayor was furious, declared that our great dog had gone mad, and ordered him to be destroyed.

"The forester put a couple of bullets into his head, and that was the end of the brave Ravageau, whose murderers did but hasten his reunion with his little dear friend Roussillon in the paradise of dogs."—
Translated by R. B. Townshend.

PROVERBS

(Selected)

'A ROBIN REDBREAST in a cage
Puts all heaven in a rage.

A horse misused upon the road
Calls to heaven for human blood;
Every wolf's and lion's howl
Raises from hell a human soul;
Each outcry of the hunted hare
A fibre from the brain doth tear;
A skylark wounded on the wing
Doth make a cherub cease to sing.

He who shall hurt the little wren
Shall never be beloved by men;
He who the ox to wrath has moved
Shall never be by woman loved;
He who torments the chafer's sprite
Weaves a bower in endless night.

The caterpillar on the leaf
Repeats to thee thy mother's grief;
The wild deer wandering here and there
Keep the human soul from care;
Every tear from every eye
Becomes a babe in eternity.

He who mocks the infant's faith
Shall be mocked in age and death;
He who shall teach the child to doubt
The rotting grave shall ne'er get out;
He who respects the infant's faith
Triumphs over hell and death;
The babe is more than swaddling bands
Throughout all these human lands;
Tools were made and born were hands,
Every farmer understands.

We are led to believe a lie
When we see with not through the eye.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

Swift

Sure

Without an Overcoat the condition of your Suit invites criticism—you need Achille Serre's help.

If your suit is soiled or creased, you must either have it cleaned and pressed or buy a new one. You cannot hide such defects as spots and stains now the warm weather has come. But we undertake to remove them for you and make the suit look smart again.

For 3/9 we Clean and Tailor-press a suit thoroughly and make it look new.

Write for new book, "Modern Beau Brummels." The cover is reproduced from a fine water-colour by WILL HOUGHTON, and the letterpress is illustrated with clever pen-and-ink sketches by "THORPE." The book contains much useful information in an interesting form, and is well worth keeping. A postcard brings it.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

52

Pen Points by
The W.H.S. Pen-man

1.

100 percent. efficiency

The W.H.S. Pen gives you the utmost utility. It writes the instant it is brought into use, with a smooth, even flow. It does not blot, spatter or jib. With it writing is a pleasure.

It fills automatically, without a squirt, without unscrewing or taking apart. Simply dip the nib in ink—draw out the piston (fitted in the top of the barrel) the pen fills. It saves time, eliminates trouble, avoids mess. It is simple, quick, certain.

The W.H.S. Pen is made better than it need be. It is designed to endure hard wear, to render unflinching service, to satisfy the most exacting user. It is guaranteed for two years.

Be certain that the pen you buy is

THE W.H.S. PEN

72 Styles to choose from
3/9 BUY ONE TO-DAY 3/9
Of Your Stationer

W. H. Smith & Son, Manufacturing Stationers, Kean Street, Kingsway, W.C.

THE SCHOOLS AND THE CHILDREN

By P. W. WILSON.

LORD HALDANE, with his henchman, Mr. Pease, is the Minister who is chiefly responsible for inspiring the new Education Policy, but the Treasury, which means Mr. Lloyd George, comes in, because in politics education equals money. There was a Teacher who said that it was a bad bargain to gain the whole world and lose one's soul; schools and colleges are, or should be, gardens for the ripening of the soul; how much are we prepared to pay?

In 1901-2 the public expenditure on education was:

| | From Taxes. | From Rates. | Total. |
|----------------------|-------------|--------------|-------------|
| England and Wales... | £9,869,000 | £6,485,000 | £16,354,000 |
| Scotland | 1,359,000 | 1,053,000 | 2,412,000 |
| Ireland | 1,374,000 | (Negligible) | 1,374,000 |
| | £12,602,000 | £7,538,000 | £20,140,000 |

The estimated expenditure to-day is:

| | From Taxes. | From Rates. | Total. |
|----------------------|-------------|--------------|-------------|
| England and Wales... | £14,700,000 | £15,000,000 | £29,700,000 |
| Scotland | 2,500,000 | 1,600,000 | 4,100,000 |
| Ireland | 2,000,000 | (Negligible) | 2,000,000 |
| | £19,200,000 | £16,600,000 | £35,800,000 |

Under-educated Ireland

Our first comment must be upon the under-education of Ireland. While the school rates for England have more than doubled and the Scottish rate has increased by over 50 per cent., Ireland does not yet rate herself at all for education. Bureaucracy at Dublin Castle, wedded to frank denominationalism in the schools themselves, is responsible for this result, and education must be the first test of statesmanship for a Dublin Parliament. It may mean a conflict with the ratepayer. It may also mean a struggle with the hierarchy.

Turning back to England, the next thing that we notice is that the finance of education raises the whole tangled problem of Exchequer contributions to local authorities. It is certainly Mr. Lloyd George's intention to clear up this muddle, and the first difficulty is the Navy. In 1909, the Admiralty received about forty-four millions, but Mr. McKenna, who was then First Lord, estimated that in two years this figure would be reduced to forty millions. Instead of this reduction, we have seen, under Mr. Churchill, a rise of naval expenditure to forty-five and a half millions, and this has meant that while, owing to good trade, there is just enough money for the social programme as defined in 1909, rating reform, which must be eased by grants, has had to wait. This is the meaning of Lord Haldane's plea for schools as well as ships—a remarkable plea from an Imperialist.

Lord Haldane's Educational Diocese

Again, if Lord Haldane is right in wishing to group the schools in a kind of secular diocese, with a university as cathedral, we are at once confronted by the problem of rating areas. Greater Birmingham, Greater London, a united Manchester and Salford, the consolidated Potteries—all these actual or proposed revisions of boundaries have a meaning for the schools as well as for the trams, the idea being that the training college as we have known it should be merged in or superseded by the provincial university. These noteworthy proposals may imply a greater measure of departmental control over universities. Already we see Parliament urging the Board of Education to intervene in the squabbles of Bristol University—this by right of the public grant which that university receives. And there is the more formidable case of Oxford, which has challenged public opinion by refusing divinity degrees to Nonconformists. How far departmental supervision of universities is good or bad time alone will show.

We come now to the schools. The rescue of the agricultural labourer from feudal servitude must clearly be accompanied by the capture of the village school from clerical control. It is not so much the fabric that matters. School buildings have been, on the whole, greatly improved. The real mischief is the appointment and dismissal of the village teacher by the village clergyman, acting through the managers. This has become simply a piece of petty patronage, wholly divorced from the realities of religion, faith, or morals. Appointment of teachers by the local education authority is the first essential of reform.

There is a close relation between the school and unemployment. We are all agreed that the age of attendance should be raised to a firm fourteen. Most of us consider that for some years afterwards there should be evening schools for young persons earning wages. By this means it is hoped that they may be directed into useful and continuous trades, so diminishing the fluctuations of employment.

The Inclined Plane

It is at this point that we arrive at what Lord Crewe has called the inclined plane. If it be a fact that the governing classes, as hitherto understood, have been weighed in the balances and found wanting, if the men of Eton and Harrow and Winchester can no longer expect to dominate the Imperial structure, then it follows that the public services, the Army, the Navy, the Churches, the friendly societies, and the great industrial corporations, the teaching profession itself, must be recruited from a new aristocracy, selected from the average boy and girl, and, when selected, trained to its proper function. Mr. Cockerton, duly interpreting the law, confined elementary schools to elementary work. The unity of education must now be recognised. The boy or girl who remains in the ranks of the manual workers must at least have a schooling that is complete in itself. The lad o' pairts must have the chance of proceeding further—to the secondary school, which must become definitely an integral wing of the national system. And so, on to the universities.

The Financial Problem

The Budget now stands at 195 millions. It is quite a mistake to imagine that this immense sum is raised entirely by taxation. Thirty millions comes from the postal services. And, reckoning terminable loans, ten millions go to reducing debt. Still, it is hardly a case for imposing new burdens. An Education Bill is to be introduced this Session, but it is to be held over. There is the difficulty of the Irish vote, which is denominational. There is the more permanent difficulty of the Lancashire vote. But much the most serious perplexity is money. Mr. Lloyd George has to-day the advantage of a trade boom which is fabulous in magnitude and duration. What will happen when the lean years come? Can he so arrange his financial reorganisation as to leave a margin and an increasing margin for endowing the mind of the nation?

Events compel me to add a postscript. My article on the minimum wage for labourers may have seemed extravagant. Since it appeared, a Bill for this end has been drafted by the Conservative Social Reformers; Labour also has a measure on the anvil; and Mr. Lloyd George has invited all parties to cooperate on this basis.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PROBLEM OF THE CRIPPLED CHILD.

SIR,—I read with deep interest the touching verses of Miss Matheson, in the last issue of EVERYMAN, appealing on behalf of the Crippled Children who have no means extended to them to become cured of their terrible affliction.

If the future generation is to be bettered, if the British Empire is to point with pride to her sturdy manhood and her shapely womanhood, we must turn our eyes from the horizon and look at objects close around us. Look upon the thousands of Crippled Children—the tuberculous and pain-stricken youngsters in whose joints the exterminating bacilli are nourished and kept alive, in whose little brains all the sunshine of childhood is replaced by the bitter darkness that would assail a tortured old man whose cup of life had been drained to its dregs.

In this direction lies one of the most important fields for the Eugenist and the humanitarian—a field parching for the rain of charity—such a charity that every donor of even one small drop is ennobled by the nobility of the cause he assists.

You do not have to go out of your way to find this field. You can help incalculably without moving from the chair in which you are seated—help the one Institution in the kingdom wherein such cases are exclusively dealt with—the Cripples' Hospital and College at Alton, Hampshire.

Since the opening of this Institution no less than six hundred and fifty children suffering from tuberculous disease of the bones and joints have been discharged cured, and able to take their places in the child life of the community. This work could be greatly extended if there were more accommodation for the Nursing Staff, and it is for this reason that it has been decided to build a Nurses' Home, the necessity for which has become imperative.

So large is the list of applicants that little sufferers are at present waiting six months for admission, and their chances of recovery are being thereby seriously jeopardised.

The forty cots now vacant could be at once filled, and many more young lives saved, if additional nurses could be engaged, and accommodation provided for them.

Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, who graciously takes a keen interest in the welfare of the Institution, has generously headed the list of subscribers to the Nurses' Home with a contribution of £100. In these circumstances I would earnestly plead for your readers' help towards establishing the Nurses' Home.

The urgent importance of this home will be readily seen from the following facts detailing the work carried on:

1. Over 650 cripple children suffering from tuberculous disease of the bones have been cured at the Alton Hospital since its foundation, the average of cures being 94.2 per cent., a figure that is not approached by any institution in the world dealing with this painful and deforming disease.
2. Sixty crippled lads in the college are being taught a trade to make themselves self-supporting.
3. The children and lads receive religious instruction according to the faith of their parents.
4. Extreme poverty is no bar to admission.
5. It is the most economically managed special hospital in the United Kingdom.
6. The work has the full sympathy and approval of the medical profession, and is supervised by a medical board of eighteen gentlemen of great experience in connection with the treatment of crippled children.
7. The great London and provincial hospitals are unable to cope with this disease, as the curative treatment is a lengthy process, and they are therefore generally treated as out-patients, with consequently unsatisfactory results.

The Hospital and College are truly national Institutions. In addition to the large number received from London, statistics show that 305 children and lads have up to the present time been received into the Hospital and College from other parts of the United Kingdom.

Will you help us to help these crippled children? Will your readers personally interest themselves to the extent of ensuring the health and happiness of one crippled child?

Bis dat qui cito dat: therefore please send quickly.
W. P. TRELOAR.

—PLEASE FILL IN AND FORWARD—to Sir WILLIAM TRELOAR, Bart., 61, Moorgate Street, London, E.C.

I enclose £ s. d. as a contribution towards the urgent and important work of the ALTON CRIPPLES' HOSPITAL. Please acknowledge.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

E.M. 13/6/13.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

PRIVATE USURY AND THE PUBLIC PAWNSHOP.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was much interested in your description of the Paris "Mont-de-Piété," or public pawnshop. It is obviously one of the most beneficial social institutions of the French Republic. Founded in Paris before the French Revolution, the Mont-de-Piété has been adopted by every big city, and, as you say, "it has saved tens of thousands of all classes, but especially of the poorer classes, from the clutches of the moneylender."

The institution has been adopted by most Continental countries. Why, then, should it not be adopted in Great Britain? Could no reader of EVERYMAN tell us whether it has ever been tried? And if not, why should some enterprising municipality not venture on so interesting a social experiment? Or would anybody be prepared to say that the evils of private usury are less in our great cities than they are in a thrifty country like France?—I am, sir, etc.,
A FRENCHMAN.

MR. HYNDMAN'S DELUSION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I agree with the view expressed by Mr. Hyndman, in your issue of the 6th instant, that the unrest in India has far from died down. Reasonable exception may, however, be taken to his contention that what is regarded by the Indian authorities as disloyal speech and writing would be called patriotic anywhere else in the world. I would ask him the question I put five years ago to a lecturer in London who deprecated the stringent press laws in India—what alternative is a responsible Government to follow? Should there be no laws or regulations to control the public press, or are they to exist merely to be ignored? If such a policy of "let alone" were pursued for six months, the lawless sections of the press would foment the present unrest and further embarrass the task of government in India.

To say, as Mr. Hyndman has said, that British rule in India is unjust, is simply not true. It is a fact of history that British rule has given India a system of justice she never enjoyed before, and it "holds the scales even" between the conflicting elements of the Indian population. Mr. Hyndman has forgotten that, above everything else, India is a complex polity, and does not know its own mind. Until, therefore, it realises a national consciousness, British rule in its present form is the only rule possible in India, and is best calculated to further Indian interests. I submit that no public good is served by indulging in such an hysterical diatribe as this: "I regard our present rule in India as one of the greatest crimes ever committed." It is easy to destroy, difficult to construct; and the political fabric which Mr. Hyndman raises in the concluding part of his article—viz., that the English should "retire peacefully" from India—would not commend itself to her true well-wishers. With all their faults, we want the English to be at the helm of affairs in India. For it is their very presence in our midst that guarantees the best conditions of progress for those heterogeneous sections of the community who make up the people of India. Leader after leader has come forward before the Public Services Commission to express the opinion that the essentially British character of the administration must be preserved.

Mr. Hyndman is anxious to do the late Lord Salisbury justice. Then why does he repeatedly quote those four solitary words—"India must be bled"—from a document which, as Sir John Rees observes in "Modern India," was a wise and humane minute? Reading Mr. Hyndman's letter, one might imagine that India was going backward, instead of moving forward, under the British rule. That is the burden of his lay. But the facts rule him out of court. India is an agricultural country, and a monumental work has been done in recent years to ameliorate the condition of the peasantry. The methods of collecting land revenue have been made more elastic. The administration of famine relief has been placed on a scientific basis. A great system of irrigation has been inaugurated, bearing witness to the practical genius of Europe. The establishment of co-operative credit societies has met with an unexpected measure of success. A world of achievement waits upon the future efforts of the Indian reformer. But one cannot desire the wheels of progress to move with accelerated speed, and at the same time destroy the very machinery by which alone that speed is rendered possible. It is to be feared that, in relation to India, Mr. Hyndman is a modern Diogenes; but it is not in his "tub" that the salvation of India is to be found.—I am, sir, etc.,
P. C. TARAPORE.

London, N.W., June 9th, 1913.

CONSCRIPTION AND THE WORKERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If fear of death is a factor in the outcry against conscription (as you suggest), it is because the military death has specially repulsive features, and because, so long as we avoid conscription, it is not inevitable, as other deaths are. But why should the exercise of one's choice be called "fear"? Personally, I do not suppose that people fear this death nearly so much as the prospect of being crippled for life or "bossed" for life. It is wiser to fear beforehand than lament afterwards.

As a matter of fact, the middle classes have nothing to gain by conscription, while the common people have everything to lose. If the people understand their best interests, the cowardice is entirely on the part of those who submit to conscription. If they do not, they stand to be fleeced by those who do, and conscription is an attempt of this sort. Surely the best policy for a nation is to be honest and just and brave, but the conscriptionist movement is neither.—I am, sir, etc.,
GEO. ED. WYMER.

Ilford, Essex, June 6th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Following upon the letter in which I showed that the compulsorily enlisted soldiers of Australia and New Zealand are legally liable to be called out in the event of industrial disturbances, Colonel Keene writes in your issue of June 6th to say that the proposal of the National Service League in this country is that compulsory training "should be carried out for and in the Territorial Force," and he adds that "the regulations regarding that Force lay down that it shall not be used as a military body in aid of the civil power in the preservation of peace."

I shall be grateful if you will let me mention the very simple and, one would have thought, obvious

(Continued on page 273.)

HOLIDAYS ABROAD

THE SUCCESS OF "EVERYMAN" TOURS

"Everyman, I will go with thee and be thy guide, in thy most need to go by thy side."

A MAN is the happier for life from having made once an agreeable tour," says Sidney Smith, and it is for the purpose of making such travel possible that EVERYMAN has instituted Continental tours for readers.

When we invited our readers to spend their holidays with us on the Continent we anticipated that many would accept that invitation, but we were scarcely prepared for such a spontaneous and immediate response as has actually been made.

This gratifying response is due to the very attractive nature of EVERYMAN tours, and because we are enabled to make a Continental holiday no more expensive than the usual holiday at home.

The First EVERYMAN tour to Lucerne, Meiringen, and Grindelwald leaves London on July 4th. A week's stay by the lovely Lake of Lucerne, with excursions to the Rigi and Stanserhorn and to Andermatt, is followed by a journey over the beautiful Brunig Pass to Meiringen. After visits to the Gorge of the Aar and the wonderful Reichenbach Falls, the journey is continued to Grindelwald. Another week is spent here, with a further set of delightful excursions. The entire cost of the holiday, from London back to London, including all excursions, gratuities, etc., is under £13.

BRUGES. LA GROSSE HORLOGE AND THE TOWN BELFRY.

FLANDERS AND THE ARDENNES

EVERYMAN tours to Flanders and the Belgian Ardennes makes a most enjoyable holiday, combining Continental city life and the charms of country life in the beautiful Ardennes. The first week-end is spent in Bruges, Europe's most ancient city, and probably the best example of a mediæval city in the world. Visits will be made to the Cathedral; the Church of Notre Dame, with the Michael Angelo statue, the famous Membling pictures; the Musée Communale, with its unique art treasures; to the world-famous Belfry of Bruges, with its unparalleled chimes, and to other places of great interest. On the Monday a steamer trip to Sluis, via the Damme Canal. Sluis is a characteristic little Dutch town, very quaint, and oddly picturesque.

Ghent is visited on the Tuesday, and an enjoyable day spent in this famous old city. St. Bavo's, the Cathedral, is one of the most richly adorned churches in Belgium. It contains twelve monumental tombs of bishops by the best sculptors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, eight enormous candelabra, rich stalls in mahogany, magnificent marble altars, and numerous masterpieces of Flemish paintings, including that gem by Hubert and Jan Van Eyck, "Adoration of the Lamb," the noblest work of the old Flemish school. It is impossible here to mention all that is to be seen at Ghent, but EVERYMAN tourists will see all the best that can be seen in the time at their disposal.

Wednesday is devoted to Brussels, the capital of Belgium. The Grande Place—to see which is alone worth a visit to Belgium—is a magnificent square surrounded by some of the finest buildings in Europe. The Palais de Justice is a huge building at the extremity of the Rue de la Régence, and is the most magnificent and colossal building in Europe. It took seventeen years to build, cost two million pounds, and covers 6½ acres.

Antwerp is visited on the Thursday. The principal places of interest are the Place Verte, in which is a statue of Rubens, and the Cathedral, which is one of the finest Gothic buildings in Europe; the Eglise St. Paul, with some superb paintings by Rubens and Van Dyck; the Eglise St. Jacques, a museum of art treasures; the Zoological Garden, etc., etc.

On the Saturday EVERYMAN party start for Namur, the Gateway of the Ardennes. Namur is at the confluence of the Meuse and Sambre. After lunch a beautiful steamer trip (3½ hours) up the Meuse to Dinant, where Sunday is spent. Dinant is charmingly built along one of the banks of the Meuse at the foot of an enormous rock, on the top of which is a fort reached by 408 steps cut out of the rock. A most delightful, quiet day is spent in this beautiful spot.

Monday is devoted to a steamer trip up the Meuse to Hastiere.

On Tuesday Rochefort and the wonderful Grotto of Han-sur-Lesse is visited, and the next day is given up to drives through the glorious Valleys of the Meuse and Lesse, whilst on Thursday excursions to Falaën and the Castle of Montaigle are the order of the day. Friday finds the party at gay Ostend, and Saturday in London; home again, after one of the most delightful holidays possible to imagine.

And the cost of the whole fortnight, including everything, is, to the readers of EVERYMAN, less than nine pounds.

OTHER COUNTRIES

These are only two of the holiday tours arranged by EVERYMAN. Others, equally attractive, include:— A fortnight at Bruges, or a week at Bruges and a week at Knock-sur-Mer. A fortnight's conducted tour to Rouen and the Valley of the Seine and Paris. A week's conducted tour to Paris. A fortnight's tour to Montreux-Territet. A fortnight's tour to Chamonix and the Mont Blanc Range. A week's conducted tour to Holland and the Zuyder-Zee, etc., etc.

EVERYMAN parties leave London on convenient dates during the latter part of June, during July, August, and September.

Our arrangements are not, of course, of an unlimited character, so in order to avoid disappointment early bookings are desirable and strongly recommended.

THE "EVERYMAN" TRAVEL BOOK

We have prepared a choice brochure, which contains full particulars of the various tours we have arranged for the present year. It contains, also, a brief description of most tours, and interesting facts about the many excursions in connection with the tours, as well as many illustrations. As the supply of this booklet is limited, early application is necessary. Address your application to EVERYMAN TOURS Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, London, W.C.

BRUGES. THE QUAI DE ROSAIRE.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and Dramatic MSS., 8d. per 1,000 words. Poetry, 1d. per folio (72 words). Carbon copy 1d. extra.—C. A. GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

CATALOGUE of Second-hand Books and Remainders. Post free from Herbert T. Potter, New and Second-hand Bookseller, 12, High Street, Marylebone, London, W. Telephone: 5025, Mayfair.

AUTHORS wanted, known and unknown, to communicate. Every description of literary work required. No fees whatever.—Write for particulars, in first instance, to "Publishers," 462, Sell's Advertising Offices, Fleet Street, London. Special attention to new writers.

ANNUITIES.—If you contemplate purchasing an annuity, your interests will be best served by corresponding with Ed. Humphries, Renshaw, Chesterfield, giving full particulars. No obligation. Courteous and prompt reply.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

STAMMERING.—Descriptive booklet sent free to any sufferer mentioning EVERYMAN, by W. A. YEARSLEY & T. E. BIRCH, "Rosador," St. Annes-on-Sea, Gold Medal Speech Specialists.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

MARRIOTT WATSON'S

NEW NOVEL

ROSALIND IN ARDEN

will be published in a few days. ORDER NOW.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

RECENT SUCCESSFUL NOVELS.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL. By GRACE RHYS, Author of "The Wooing of Sheila." 6s.

Manchester Guardian.—"The real hero Tamburlaine is not a man, but a horse—quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted."

DAISY DARLEY; or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street. By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

THE LOST MAMELUKE. By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

Standard.—"The Lost Mameluke' is certainly a book to be read."

Pall Mall.—"Mr. Beddoe has a powerful, vivid imagination, and his descriptions of the gorgeous Mamelukes at play on horse and foot recall some of the most thrilling pages of Sir Walter Scott."

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

fact that the National Service League has no power to make promises on behalf of the present or any future Government. A compulsorily enlisted force that could not be used to put down strikes would be a new thing in history. Even the Swiss army, which the National Service League sometimes holds up as a shining example, is no exception. When Mr. John Ward, M.P., was in Switzerland, the trade union representatives gave him a list of thirteen strikes in which the "citizen army" had used their guns on their fellow-workers, many of whom were wounded and eight were killed. In some cases the soldiers, until called on by the authorities, were themselves strikers.

Further, if the advocates of compulsion were allowed to realise their ideals, the regular or expeditionary army would be liable to be called away in toto on Continental service, and the Territorial Force would, therefore, have to be made available for use in the event of internal disturbances. This would be all the more necessary because such disturbances would be more frequent and troublesome under conscription than they are in our present condition of comparative freedom. Anarchism, Nihilism, and Syndicalism are the products of repression and compulsion. Moderate views, friendly feelings, and peaceful industry are the natural outcome of the liberty which we inherited from our fathers and still have to maintain and improve.

I am tempted to ask your indulgence for some comment on your editorial opinion that the modern fear of death is "a factor in the outcry against conscription," but I will content myself with pointing out, firstly, that the demand for conscription, coming, as it mainly does, from those who would not be compelled to fight, is largely inspired by fear of death or of pecuniary loss; and, secondly, that when conscription is established, and all the cowards are in the army, there will always be men and lads who, rather than comply, will face death itself or punishments accounted worse than death.—I am, sir, etc.,

London, June 7th, 1913.

S. V. BRACHER.

THE NEEDS OF THE COUNTRYSIDE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Might I suggest that the organisation your correspondent, "Verbum Sapiente," is looking for already exists in the form of the Brotherhood movement? The Brotherhood movement is a religious and social one. Its aims include the study of social science and the promotion of social service. It is a non-sectarian and non-party organisation. Although up to the present the social service side has been somewhat latent, the movement appears to be waking up to a sense of its responsibilities and realising the immense influence it may exert on the side of real social service. I venture to think that in this great movement your correspondent will find reflected his highest and noblest ideals in the direction of true Christianity and social service.

Allow me to take this opportunity of thanking you for your most excellent paper, and to wish it every success.—I am, sir, etc.,

ERNEST BAIRSTOW.

Halifax, June 3rd, 1913.

THE NEW EMIGRATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Is Mr. Chiozza Money aware that he understates his case in regard to the alarming fall in the natural increase of population, i.e., excess of births over deaths? For while the fall in the birth-rate is real, that in the death-rate is illusory. The death-rate is invariable, and amounts to exactly 100 per cent. A fall in the (illusory and so called) death-rate only shows an increase in life-duration, and this, again, does not mean a beneficial influence on the birth-rate, since longevity does not mean an increase of productiveness, which is confined to a certain life period. To get, therefore, at the exact fall in the natural increase of population, no account should be taken of the falling death-rate, which is a fictitious factor. The case is shocking enough as Mr. Chiozza Money paints it; in reality it is a good deal worse.

But what is the use? Nobody knows better than Mr. Chiozza Money that there is no salvation for West and Mid European civilisation except in a complete and revolutionary change in our conceptions and laws of property. If the West and Mid European countries have not the courage to institute this change, and that soon, the enormously growing Slav power will conquer them. Napoleon foresaw this. This Slav element, in its turn, when enfeebled by over-civilisation, will fall to the Mongol element. That is the natural East to West trend of the whole of recorded history.

Germany and Austria are wide awake to the Slav danger; they are even now taking active measures and contemplating others, stronger ones. I can assure you, speaking from personal knowledge, that the great thinkers among the German-speaking peoples are looking fearfully into the future, and that the strong men of the Slavs count upon Mid and West European falling birth-rate and emigration as their powerful auxiliaries.—I am, sir, etc.,

Shanklin, June 6th, 1913. P. W. VON HERBERT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—There must be a great number of your readers who agree heartily with Mr. Chiozza Money as to the gravity of this question. Surely, however, many of them will feel that he takes a very narrow and circumscribed view of the problem with which the nation is faced when he points to the industrial advantage we possess in cheap coal, and leaves it to be inferred that the remedy may be found mainly because of this advantage and the minimum standard of existence, coupled with better housing, which he suggests will follow.

He appears to lose sight of the fact that freedom attracts the best men more than even comfort and a minimum standard of existence, which may often be the maximum as well, and also that to depend almost entirely on our industrial capacity, which inevitably means town dwellers, instead of also upon a strong and virile agricultural class, is to court a continuance of all that is most harmful to the national welfare.

Has it ever occurred to him that our industrial classes are not free, because they have no alternative to working for wages? For the only possible alternative they can have except emigration is that they should be able to grow their own food, and thus work for themselves and their families, and it is this alternative which is barred to them in most cases. But we are told, on the authority of Professor Long, that there are millions of acres of land in this country waiting to be cultivated, so that, if the conditions prevailing in the homeland were right, it would be a long time before our people would be forced "to enter upon such a tremendous speculation as emigration to the unknown wilderness" because they desired freedom and had no alternative to working for wages, which maybe were unobtainable.

Our commanding position in the industrial world is all to the good, but it must surely be recognised by Read these books of intense human interest. Hopes, Ambitions, Passions and Follies are vividly portrayed by artists of Keen and Sympathetic observation.

The WOOINGS of JEZEBEL PETTYFER

By Haldane Macfall. 6s.

"The Great Classic of the West Indies."

The Press say: "Grips the reader." "Will live in the reader's memory." "This marvellous tale." "Wonderfully entertaining." "Immensely funny."

BLOOD and SAND

A Novel by VINCENT BLASCO IBANEZ. Translated from the Spanish by Mrs. W. A. GILLESPIE. 6s.

"Is endlessly interesting in its pictures of the details of the discipline and the accidents of the plaza de toros." —Scotsman.

The FIRE of HEAVEN

By ROSALIND DENIS-BROWNE, Author of "A Bird in the Hand." 3s. 6d.

"Vivacious and natural."—Westminster Gazette. "Here we have something like real literature."

—Eastbourne Gazette.

Put these on your Library List To-day.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LIMITED.

The NEW EMIGRATION.

TO understand how this may be stopped by

Perpetual Leases,

giving Tenants Fixity of Tenure and of RENT, read the works issued by the

REDEMPTION OF

LABOUR LEAGUE.

List of Publications and Illustrated Leaflet of the SHARNAL STREET, Kent, Small Holdings Colony, where the Land is held by Tenants on Leases for

10,000 Years,

free on application to the Hon. Secs.:

CHAS. F. LAMELE and MARK B. F. MAJOR,

Redemption of Labour League,

7, Queen Street Place, London, E.C.

Free copies of the works may be had by Public Libraries on application.

Buy a Canada Life Annuity and bid "Good-bye" to care

THOUSANDS of men and women in this country have reason to bless the day that they bought a Canada Life Annuity. They are enjoying life to the full, because they are entirely free from all financial worry and anxiety. They are getting the best out of life, because they are in receipt of a higher return on their capital than could possibly be obtained in any other way with anything like the same substantial security. They know precisely how much their income is, and therefore they can arrange the spending of it to the very best advantage.

Buy a Canada Life Annuity yourself ; make the most of your own life and let the Autumn of your days be full of happiness.

Write at once for full particulars to the Canada Life—the oldest Colonial Life Assurance Company and the Office that gives more generous annuity terms than any Office of equal standing in this country.

Write to-night (stating age) to :

Canada Life Assurance Company

(Accumulated funds £10,000,000. Established 1847.)

CANADA LIFE BUILDING,

15, King St., Cheapside, London, E.C.

LEARN FRENCH by Rosenblum's Anglo-French Journal, 1d., monthly, 1/4d. post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French."

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

SAVE £5 2s. 6d.

by taking up the famous "St. Settef Cours" of Will-Culture," which contains information worth FIVE GUINEAS to you. By means of this simple yet logical system your Will-Power can be developed to double its present strength in from 3 to 4 months. Your powers of Concentration, Memory, Self-Ralliance, Observation and Personal Magnetism will also be enormously increased. "The St. Settef Cours" is warmly recommended by "Public Opinion," "Pitman's Journal," "Graft Thoughts," "The Christian Age," "Young Man," "Rev. T. A. Seed, etc. The fee for the whole Course is only 2/6 (abroad 8d. extra). NO FURTHER EXPENDITURE. The Course is sent in plain, sealed package. Enrol to-day. Next week will see you delighted with your progress. THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free, 15/- complete.

Money refunded if not satisfactory.

A.R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

people of all parties that the supreme question of the moment is how to establish and maintain a proper equilibrium between industry and agriculture in this country.—We are, sir, etc.,

CHAS. F. LAMBLE.

MARK B. F. MAJOR.

Redemption of Labour League,
7, Queen Street Place, E.C., June 9th, 1913.

"TRAFFIC IN WOMEN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "C." asks, "What is this White Slave Traffic of which we hear so much? Is it some new and growing evil for which women hold a quick and certain remedy . . . or is it an old crime which all righteous men have hated since, and even before, the time of David, and which is a source of dread to fathers of families, who, by the way, have the vote?"

This gentleman's questions answer themselves; but I may perhaps be allowed to put the dots on the "i's." This "old crime" has indeed been practised all down the ages at the expense of women, and the record of David himself, even in extreme old age, is singularly unclean; yet he passes still for a "righteous man." The traffic to-day exists mainly for the benefit of "married men of past forty"—I quote from an authority—who are, presumably, "fathers of families" as well as husbands of deceived wives. That they have votes, and have not used them in any way for the real protection of women and girls from this horror, but rather the contrary, is surely an argument for, rather than against, giving women themselves the power to try what can be done. When I add that girls have still to be supplied to the cantonments in India, and that the trade has in the last fifty years become organised and syndicated, showing a profit of six millions sterling per annum in the United States alone, and that there is no law to touch the consumer, the frequenter, the person who supplies the demand and the profits, I think the case can stand and an action will lie against the men of our and of every other race—the most damning indictment ever framed in all the sad history of women.—I am, sir, etc.,

C. NINA BOYLE,

Head of Political and Militant Department,
Women's Freedom League.

Adelphi, Strand, May 31st, 1913.

P.S.—May I add that it seems strange that the "war-cry" (not ours, but the one "anti" men like to assume is ours) "votes for ladies" should annoy these gentlemen, seeing that their own democratic evolution began with "votes for gentlemen"? C. N. B.

GOETHE AND THE COMMON PEOPLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the course of his really admirable remarks upon Goethe, your contributor makes a statement which, unamplified as it is, is calculated to do an injury to the character which he so ably sketches. I refer to the sentence wherein it is said that "he (Goethe) has no love for the common people. He has the aloofness of the aristocrat. He . . . takes little interest . . . in the struggles of human freedom." Now, in "The Sorrows of Werter" (a work wherein, I imagine, the deepest and most personal feelings of Goethe are to be found) occurs the following passage, which I beg leave to quote without comment: "The common people here, particularly the little children, already know and love me; yet when I first began to talk to them, they doubted my sincerity, and behaved rather rudely. I was not, however, too proud to court their favour, and soon verified an observation I had often made: that characters of high rank are too apt to keep their inferiors at a distance, as if their approaches could possibly diminish their dignity. But what arrogance, what ignorance, does that NOBLE gentleman evince, who can condescend at times to be affable with a commoner, and at other times neglect and despise him! This life will not admit of equality; but surely that man who thinks he derives consequence and respect from keeping others at a distance is as base-minded as the coward who shuns the enemy for fear of an attack. One day that I visited the fountain, I perceived a young woman on the lowest step, with her pail beside her, anxiously waiting for the assistance of one of her companions to place it on her head. Immediately I accosted her: 'Give me leave, my dear, to help it on.' She blushed, and modestly replied, 'Oh, no, sir.' But I waived all ceremony, and helped her to lift the pail. She thanked me with a smile, and I was amply rewarded with the pleasure I received."—I am, sir, etc.,

W. A. DICKINS.

Harringay Park, London, N., June 7th, 1913.

THE INFLUENCE OF NIETZSCHE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with great interest Dr. Sarolea's article on "Nietzsche" in a recent number of EVERYMAN. In some respects I quite agree with the writer. He has done what all should do—said the best he could!

My first acquaintance with Nietzschean literature took place several years ago. I purchased and read his book, "Beyond Good and Evil," but I was terribly disappointed with it. Perhaps I expected too much. Certainly I did not find what I had expected. As a philosophical work, it is the huskiest that ever came into my hands. True, here and there I found a few grains of rare wisdom, but they were very few.

I do not, as many others have done, "begin with extolling him as a prophet or abusing him as a lunatic." He was neither the one nor the other. In a sentence, he was the embodiment of egotism, the most egotistical of egotists. This is his outstanding fault, and one reason, perhaps the chief, of his not finding a ready public. Throughout his works this feature is ever uppermost: Nietzsche alone is right; all the rest of the world is wrong!

When Dr. Sarolea speaks of him as the "most powerful force in Continental literature," he surely cannot be serious. Nietzsche never was and never will be that. To-day the two most powerful forces on the Continent are Eucken and Bergson, and since the days of Hegel and Kant there has been no force to equal these.

One thing against Nietzsche is his venomous, ultra-prejudiced attitude towards Christianity. Like his contemporary, Haeckel, he will not even allow the Christian doctrine a fair hearing. Englishmen ever delight in being generous towards their foes. Where Christianity is concerned Nietzsche is most ungenerous. "One should not go into churches," he says, "if one wishes to breathe pure air." The italicised "pure" is evidence sufficient respecting the attitude of his mind on this subject.

His contradictions, too, which are very numerous, depreciate the value of his work as a philosophy. This, however, is a common failing of prejudice and egotism.

The gospel of Nietzsche is retrogressive, and would tend towards lapsing back into barbarism if literally

Don't take Drugs to relieve that indigestion or to purify your blood—take instead a daily dose of

BRAGGS CHARCOAL

Drugs merely relieve—in many cases they never even touch the seat of the trouble, whilst to be efficacious the dose must be continuously increased.

Impurities, which the digestive organs cannot expel, remaining in the system and setting up fermentation, are the direct cause of Indigestion, Flatulence, Acidity.

These impurities are eagerly seized upon by Bragg's Charcoal, which absorbs them and carries them out of the system—effete gases and waste matter which, if allowed to remain in the digestive tract, result in poor complexions, bad blood, lassitude, and malnutrition.

Bragg's Charcoal is the natural remedy—its action is merely absorbent. It is not a drug—is never assimilated—has no direct action on any organ of the body, and is therefore quite harmless.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Powder, 2/- and 4/- per bottle; Biscuits, 1/-, 2/-, and 4/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box; Lozenges, 1/1½ per box.

SEND THIS COUPON

for Samples of five different forms in which Bragg's Charcoal may be pleasantly administered.

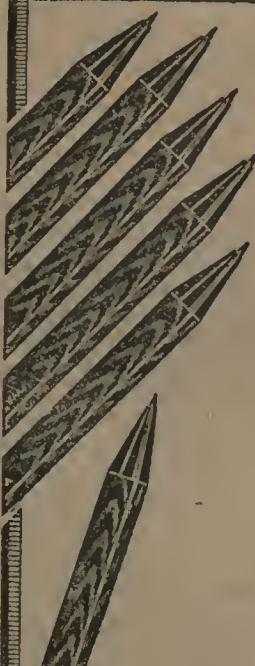

To
J. L. BRAGG, Ltd.
14, Wigmore St.,
London, W.

Please send me Samples of Bragg's Charcoal. I enclose 3d. postage.

Name

Address

EVERYMAN, June 13

Points

of difference about Wedge-Lock Pencils which render them superior to all others.

Walker's Wedge-Lock Pencils

Have no screw threads to wear out.

The lead does not work forward or backward in use.

The lead remains rock steady—always.

So simple they cannot get out of order.

Made to fit the pocket.

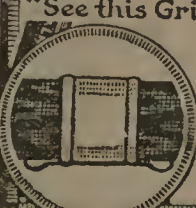

Sold in three sizes by all Stationers

1/- 1/3 1/6

Write for illustrated leaflet No. 5 and name of nearest dealer to

John Walker & Co., Ltd.
Farrington House,
Warwick Lane, E.C.

"See this Grip"

FOSTER GARTER

FOR GENTLEMEN.

A KNIGHT OF GARTERS.

Fits the leg perfectly; all metal parts being protected, it cannot injure the skin.

COMFORTABLE,
because it lies quite flat.

RELIABLE,
because it is made of the best material.

To be obtained from all principal dealers, or we will send sample pair post free on receipt of 1/-

THE FOSTER MANFG. CO., LTD.,
90, Fosler Road, Parkeston, Essex.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

STAMMERING AND ALL DEFECTS IN SPEECH effectually CURED by correspondence or personally. The "Practical Guide" is lent to inquirers, post free.—N. H. Mason, 30, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

THE WILL and the WAY.

Where there's a will there's always a way. Everyone knows this, and realises that it is the will that bothers most people. If they could only develop their will-power, self-control, and self-reliance, they know they would find their way to success. There is an easy, practical, scientific, sure means of developing your Will-Power, in the Concentro Course—"Scientific Concentration." A great number of students in every part of the civilised world are developing their will by means of this famous system of training. They are also developing, steadily and surely, their powers of Attention, Observation, Memory, Speaking, Thinking, and obtaining marvellous control over both mind and body. Every Concentro student receives personal direction, according to their requirements, through the Concentro Report system. Editors of well-known Journals recommend "Scientific Concentration." Learn what it will do for you, by sending to-day for their Free Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1265.

A HOUSE FOR 6d. A DAY.—Sixpence a day paid for five years will enable you to secure a house worth £300 in any part of the United Kingdom. Full particulars on application to J. J. Green, 245, Bishops-gate, London, E.C. Mention EVERYMAN.

GLAISHER'S BOOK CATALOGUES.—PUBLISHERS' RE-MAINDERS in Great Variety and at Greatly Reduced Prices. Supplementary List for June, 1913. Now Ready. Gratis and Post Free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

CAN YOU SKETCH? Learn to draw for the Press. We give a thorough COURSE OF INSTRUCTION by POST, in MAGAZINE, BOOK and NEWSPAPER ILLUSTRATION. PUPILS' DRAWINGS SOLD TO THE LEADING PERIODICALS. Write for Prospectus (post free) to Dept. 17, THE LONDON SKETCH SCHOOL, 11, Chalsey Road, Brockley, London.

SLOAN-DUPLOYAN SHORTHAND is acquired in a few weeks and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use. See EVERYMAN, Feb. to May, for series of remarkable testimonies. Illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc., free.—SLOAN SHORTHAND CO., Radisgate.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

TOURS.

LUGANO Tour, £5 5s. Paris, Lake Lucerne and St. Gothard Railway. Accompanied by Mr. Edward Luuo, F.R.G.S. ONLY ADDRESS—adhered to. 'As Dr. Sarolea says, it is "the gospel of the inequality of race"—a gospel of militarism and quasi-pseudo-imperialism. He was the champion of the strong and the rich, the enemy of the weak and the poor.

GEORGE LUNN'S TOURS, LTD., 23, Old Jewry, E.C.

As regards his literary style, one cannot find fault with that. It is as near perfection as that of most philosophical writers. When Dr. Sarolea designates him "one of the supreme masters of language," he only does him bare justice. What little popularity Nietzsche does enjoy is entirely owing to the beauty and purity of his literary style, and not to his philosophical system, if, indeed, one can give it that flattering designation.

One or two good points he most certainly has. He is a most intense hater of cant. For this one cannot help but admire him, however much one may be in disagreement with his beliefs. He is courageous, even to the verge of folly. He exposes with an intense hatred that pedantic, ignorant, incongruous, and vapid tomfoolery, that used to be called "the Christian Religion," but which is as far from Christianity as hell from heaven; and for this one cannot help but admire him.

Nietzsche, however, will never be a great force in English thought. He is too inconsistent, too cryptic, too individualistic for the thinking Anglo-Saxon mind. He may have readers, although one rarely meets them (I never yet met one); but they will read and forget. His influence will last no longer in this country than the dew lasts when once it is subjected to the fierce rays of the sun.—I am, sir, etc.,

CHAS. H. BETTS.

Authors' Club, London, S.W.,
May 20th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Dr. Charles Sarolea, in the course of a highly interesting and instructive article, states that the gospel of Nietzsche was anticipated by Mr. Houston Stuart Chamberlain, whom he refers to as the German namesake of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. My sole acquaintance with Mr. Chamberlain's work is through the English translation of his "Foundations of the Nineteenth Century," with Lord Redesdale's introductory essay. I am, therefore, neither competent nor anxious to determine the proportion of English and German factors in Mr. Chamberlain's personality. But it does seem desirable that the comprehensiveness of the Teutonism he exalts should be noted. Under some such term as German he would include Dante as freely as Barbarossa, William the Conqueror as Kaiser William, Anglo-Saxon as Knickerbocker.

And still more desirable would it appear, when dealing with any apparent similarity between the conclusions of Chamberlain and the views of the self-styled anti-Christ, Nietzsche, to recollect the former's passionate avowal of attachment to the Christ. It would be foolish, of course, to ask that in an article on Nietzsche, Dr. Sarolea should attempt to do full justice to Mr. Chamberlain. Yet an author who declares, "Whoever will follow Christ requires, above all, courage, courage in its purest form, that inner courage which is steeled and hardened anew every day, which proves itself not merely in the intoxicating clash of battle, but in bearing and enduring, and in the silent, soundless struggle of every hour in the individual heart," must be convicted of flagrant inconsistency before he can be fathered with the gospel of Nietzsche.

Further, whereas "in Nietzsche's view an aristocrat cracy is the ultimate purpose of life," if I have read Mr. Chamberlain aright, in his view an aristocratic race has been, and will continue to be, an instrument in the perfecting of life, a means to an end. Such a view, I take it, is not antagonistic to that democracy so truly said to be the political expression of Christianity, of our belief in the essential dignity of man.

May I conclude with one word of gratitude for Dr. Sarolea's very valuable final section, in which the service rendered to Christianity by Nietzsche is made clear?—I am, sir, etc.,

W. A. FINCH.

Birstall, Leeds, May 19th, 1913.

OSCAR WILDE—A REMONSTRANCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In connection with the point raised by Mr. Armitage it may be worth recording Oscar Wilde's own opinion of his prose, as expressed to me when I visited him in prison. "My prose," he said, "which, with the exception of Walter Pater's, is the finest in the English language."

Strange to say, this was just after he had told me that in prison he had discovered a beautiful thing called humility.—I am, sir, etc.,

Birmingham.

JAMES ADDERLEY.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE CALL OF THE PAST (Sands and Co., 6s.) deals with Wales. But though the country forms a picturesque background, the author does not take us beneath the surface of things. The pages of the story bristle with Cymric names, but of the soul of the people we learn nothing, though their prejudices and curious inability to fight in the open are emphasised over and over again. It was George Meredith who said that the Welshman never forgets that to this very hour a son of Cymri hears the legions of Llewellyn marching down the hills, and feels within him stir the old antagonism against the Sassenach. It is Meredith also who points out that this persistence of memory renders the Welshman inoperative in action; he is content with past triumphs, or, rather, with the legends of victory that have come down the ages, and the pride engendered by these warlike tales and exploits make him indifferent to the conditions of to-day. In effect, the Welsh are a secret people; they will never come out into the open; their military tactics are akin to their political propaganda, for ever they fall back and back again, luring the enemy on, only to disappear before the onslaught, disdaining an open fight, and finding refuge in the policy of perpetual deferment. These characteristics are notably present in Florens Roch's romance. The veil is never lifted, and the true opinions of Gwenllian, her ambitions and her hopes, we do not learn. There is the same curious lack of conviction in the description of Gwenllian's attitude towards the pagan beliefs that still linger in the hills of Wales. The heroine, we are told, has occasional glimpses of a former existence, wherein the Druidical religion played a prominent part; but whether she desires to see the best of that mystic cult incorporated in the religion of Nonconformity as practised in Wales to-day, or whether she desires utterly to stamp the survival out, we are not told. Once, and once only, does the author give us a vivid picture of the Welsh as they truly are, and that is in the account of the meeting at the local chapel. Here the author shows us the real

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

Why endure the heat associated with cooking on a hot day, when you can have a cooker that will "look after itself." and cook a beautiful dinner, &c., while you are engaged in some more congenial occupation, pleasant recreation, or as cook is doing, "take it easy" in garden or elsewhere.

Bear in mind—A Child, a Novice, or even "Mere Man" can cook a better dinner with a Boilerette than the most expert cook could do without one. Meat and Poultry so tender, delicious and digestible. Puddings as light as bread, and Vegetables with all their rich flavours and life-giving essences fully preserved.

It is simply splendid for Yachting, Travellers, Caravans, Campers-out, Picnics, Bungalows, House Boats, Holiday Makers at Seaside and Country Lodgings, and Busy Men and Women everywhere.

THE SUMMER COOKER

VISIT OUR LONDON DEPOT: 105, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

Gets intensely hot, above 212 degrees, yet never burns the food. As it is Self-Acting, it requires no attention, and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER" (Hospital).

The Ideal Cooker for Porridge, Milk, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauces, Jam and Marmalade Making, Beef Tea, &c. A Speciality for Invalid and Vegetarian Cookery.

COOKS MEAT & VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES

By which means all the Valuable Salts, Toxics, Natural Aperients, and Life-giving Properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

VEGETABLES COOKED IN THEIR NATURAL MOISTURE

Are simply delicious and can be relied upon to put fresh life and energy into body, blood & brain.

BEAUTIFUL BOILERETTED BEEF.

Better than Roast. The Boilerette browns meat. Fat eats like marrow. Lean so tender that it can be spread like pulled meat, yet so thick that it can be thinly sliced. Very delicious as a cold joint. All for picnics, &c.

"CONVERTS THE OLD INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat tender and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

Full Particulars, with Booklet of Remarkable Testimonials, Post Free.

E. A. WELBANK, Duplex Works, BANBURY. LONDON DEPOT—105, Newgate Street, E.C. Tel. 5796 City.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121, 3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPLYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

WESTBOURNE PARK BUILDING SOCIETY.

| | |
|---|--|
| ABSOLUTE SECURITY FOR SAVINGS. | INTEREST.—3 to 5 per cent. according to class of Investment—Paid Half-yearly—free from Income Tax Deduction. |
| Prospectus, etc., of—C. JOHNSTON BURT, F.C.I.S., Sec. | |
| Office: 136, WESTBOURNE TERRACE, LONDON, W. | |

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

All advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

right thing. The congregation, swayed by the speaker's eloquence in favour of a national ideal, rock themselves to and fro, uttering those strange cries in a minor key, which, once heard, can never be forgotten. But for this fugitive glimpse Mr. Roch does not reveal to us the Welshman as he is. A true story of the Cymri has yet to be written, though, remembering that the Welsh are indubitably the Secret People, one doubts if that day will ever come.

The story of a lodging-house with various types of inmates—the shabby genteel, the hopelessly impecunious, the Bohemian, and the respectable—should make a vivid narrative. We have seen what can be done with such material by Israel Zangwill in his inimitable study of a modern Marchioness, but the qualities that go to the portrayal of "Merely Mary Ann," and the shifting population that drifted in and out the house where Launcelot lived, are lacking in the author of THE TRANSFORMATION OF TIMOTHY (Mills and Boon, 6s.). Mr. Thomas Cobb writes with a certain geniality, but his reflections are somewhat trite, his criticisms commonplace. Timothy, the journalist, does not convince us, either in the period when, slipshod of dress, careless of manner, he drifts in and out the story in an aimless fashion, or when, transformed into a well-groomed, immaculately dressed young man about town, he captures the heart of Althea, the heroine. Mrs. Brown, who lodges in the house of Althea's mother, is perhaps the best attempt at portraiture. Mrs. Wimpernis, banished to a nursing home, there to undergo an operation, leaves the conduct of the establishment to her daughter; Althea, much distressed, accepts the offer of Mrs. Brown's assistance. The good lady explains that life has left her with little but trivial items of interest. She is starving for interest and occupation. "As soon as I have done breakfast I look forward to dinner, and when dinner is over I think of tea. After tea is the worst of all, except when I lie awake listening to the clock striking at night." She pleads to be allowed to superintend the cooking of the major's chop, and declares her soul will find satisfaction in the adjustments of the window curtains. Althea gracefully gives way, and the story ends to the satisfaction of the lodgers and the marriage of Timothy with the girl he loves.

Mr. Hubert Bland is always stimulative and occasionally controversial. He is, however, inevitably delightful when he writes about women. In the days gone by a profane journalist of our acquaintance declared he always knew whether or no "Hubert" of the Sunday Chronicle were in love, as the criticisms in his articles relating to the other sex always reflected his mood. OLIVIA'S LATCHKEY (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.) is "Hubert" at his best. He has an unerring faculty for the important things that women leave unsaid, and knows the exact value of a gesture! The volume contains the correspondence of Mr. Stephen Yorke, a man about town, with Miss Olivia Brent, aged twenty-three, without encumbrances and possessed of a small independent income. Olivia is an orphan, and has passed a considerable portion of her life under the protection of her aunt in the choking atmosphere of a household restricted in ideas and terribly frightened of anything out of the common. She is fired with the ambition to break away and come to London, and asks her friend whether it is possible for her to live unliaperoned in a small flat, or if she is compelled to go into a boarding-house. It is hardly necessary to state that she takes a flat and gathers about her such of her friends as she knows in London. These friends Stephen Yorke criticises. "It is as well to begin as we mean to go on," he writes, "as a certain sort of people say when they know they are going to be disagreeable; and if we are to be friends we must each have the right to tell each other what we each of us think of each other's friends. That right is fundamental and elementary. . . . Friends may not tell each other what (I mean all, of course) they think of each other. No friendship would stand that strain. I doubt if one could be friends even with oneself if in some of one's introspective moods or mumps one spoke out aloud or wrote down the opinion one has of oneself." Mr. Bland goes on to say that the utterance of a thought is the real birth of it. A thought unspoken is an unborn baby thought. He tells us truly that two people may live together comfortably enough, each thinking some lamentable thing of the other, but that no great harm ensues so long as neither speaks out. With unerring discrimination he suggests that if one of them be a woman she nearly always does speak out, and there is an end. The point of view of the man in contrast with that of a young woman is admirably and subtly given. The portraits and impressions contained in the volume are provocative and delightful. OLIVIA'S LATCHKEY is a book the modern woman should not neglect. It is at once a justification and an apology for her existence.

BARRY AND A SINNER (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) is written in leisurely style, pricked with occasional touches of humour. Mr. John Barnett tells the story in the first person, and has chosen for the narrator a conventional and somewhat unconvincing type. Gilly Leviter is the ordinary weak-willed, semi-philosophical, moral vagrant. He atones for his general ineffectiveness by risking his life for the woman he loves, and the fashion he affects for demonstration of the fact that he possesses backbone is to plunge into a burning house, and rescue his beloved from the devouring flames. It is part of Gilly's ineffectiveness that the object of his devotion dies in his arms, and he is left hopelessly disfigured, and permanently impaired from an active existence with only the remembrance of her smile to comfort him. Barry, his fidus Achates, belongs to a type as conventional as the backboneless Gilly. He is a big Irishman, brimming over with health and spirits, and with the national capacity for falling in love. On the whole he is preferable to his friend, though the latter inevitably suffers from the fact that he is made the central figure of a drama which in itself is not strong enough to excuse the weak part played by the chief actor in the performance. The author, we think, has made a mistake in using the first person; it is inevitably a test of literary ability that few can pass. There can be only two reasons for using this form: the story must either be of such vivid and compelling interest that the narrator is of secondary importance, or that narrator must be so subtly sketched that the reader accepts without question his version of affairs, and endorses his criticisms of the characters that appear with him in the incidents portrayed. The finest example of the second method is Thackeray's "Henry Esmond," one of the masterpieces of English literature.

We do not suggest that the author could hope to come within measurable distance of this work, but it is desirable that a novelist should set before him the most notable achievements in the particular mode he uses, and, before Mr. Barnett again uses the first

(Continued on page 285.)

[SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT.]

50 SUMMER SCHOLARSHIPS

WITHOUT ENTRANCE FEE IN

Free-Lance Journalism and Short Story Writing, FOR READERS OF "EVERYMAN."

| |
|-------------------------------|
| CLOSING DATE, JUNE 30. |
|-------------------------------|

So great has been the interest evoked in our offer of 50 Scholarships in Free-Lance Journalism, announced in last week's issue, that we are reproducing Elizabeth Stewart's article again this week for the benefit of those readers whose notice it escaped, but who are likely to be interested in the possibilities of earning good money by their pen.

"WHAT to do with our sons and daughters?" has long been a familiar question. Is it not time to change the query to "What will they do with themselves?": for surely nothing worthy the name of work can be forced from unwilling hands, much less wrung from an unwilling brain.

The writer speaks, therefore, to those who have not yet chosen their work; to those also who, having had their work chosen for them, are finding in their daily tasks a species of penal servitude.

To the former I would say, "The world is certainly all before you, but the world is pretty full. Look well about you, and choose for your workplace a field where you will have room to sow and to reap." To the latter my word is more emphatic. "Discontent may be the seed of salvation. To 'be content with such things as you have' is a command that can only be rightly read in the light of reason. Contentment is doubtless a grand virtue, but its grandeur depends on the quality of your possessions."

Remember that it is your duty to see to it that the things you have are the best you can get through the careful expenditure of your talents.

Get this BEST and then be content.

There are false economists abroad who rail at our bitter bread, offer to glut us with the fat of the land—and thrust into our hands, at a given price, a stone. Bitter bread there is in plenty, and stones there are in almost equal abundance, gilded, sugar-coated stones, fair enough to the eye, but stones all the same.

"Be famous," "Be rich," cry the tempters, and, judging by results, there are many thousands of discontented men and women ready at all times to snatch the false opportunity.

The writer does not invite you to be famous or to be rich; but she offers sweet bread for bitter, and suggests that you be reasonable.

The sweet bread takes the form of good, honest, remunerative work, which awaits you as soon as you are equipped for it, work for which the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, is able and ready to equip you.

The work is Journalism and S.S. Writing, and you would do well to give earnest attention to these four statements with regard to this Profession:—

To do interesting and profitable work necessitates the following qualifications:—

1. Common sense.
2. A knack (cultivated) of seeing the interesting side of things.
3. A knowledge of everyday language is more important than "fine writing" and the pedantic "prize essay" style.
4. Practical Training in Press Work.

The openings in Journalism are more numerous, more interesting, and, above all, more lucrative than most people realise. As a spare-time hobby or a regular occupation, you can earn from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. per hour if you know what to write and where to sell articles, short stories, and the interesting little paragraphs which constitute one-quarter of the contents of dailies and weeklies.

A young friend of the present writer, of twenty-two years of age, who began work for the Press three years ago, now earns the comfortable income of £2,000 a year. She had no introductions or influence; her success is solely the result of her knowing how to do just the work that's wanted. She works no harder than the average woman teacher, but she makes every stroke of her pen tell, and every Editor she works for knows exactly what to expect from her; he knows she is dependable.

FIFTY SCHOLARSHIPS.

The P.C.C. Course of Journalism and Short Story Writing is now offered to the fifty EVERYMAN readers who show sufficient aptitude for the work to make it worth while to train them at the nominal terms offered. You can earn while you learn in your spare time, for a Home Study Course of training is entirely by correspondence. The Course is personally conducted by a successful Author-Journalist of International reputation.

You will be in a class by yourself, for the personal letters of criticism and advice will be confidential and exclusive to you. It will be exactly suited to your aims and needs, and begins just where any previous training left off, and continues until you are too busy writing for the Press to need any further lessons.

Your first attempts will be sympathetically criticised by an expert who has won his experience unaided in the long, tedious way of finding things out for himself. Struggling alone, facing one disappointment after another, you may spend years of heartaching effort in learning just the practical technique of the profession that the Course teaches in a few easy-to-follow, but vastly interesting, lessons.

The fifty Scholarship Winners will obtain the full Course of Postal Tuition at half fees. (The remainder is only payable when the student has earned £20 by his or her pen.) You do not merely earn back very much more than the cost of Tuition, and, incidentally, receive a splendid full Course of Training free, but will acquire the practical knowledge that may be worth from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. an hour for a most interesting and distinguished profession.

No examination papers can be received after June 30th.

DO NOT DELAY.

Send a postcard at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. Address, "The Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C." This is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send off the postcard now, before you forget it.

In addition to the Examination Paper, the College will send gratis a copy of a useful little book, and particulars of the Course and Scholarships.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three-halfpence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

No matter how little you may know now, Correspondence Teaching will begin just where you need it to begin, and take you as far as you need to go. The work of the College is to train, encourage, and help students to succeed.

No other Institution has by correspondence helped so many men and women, in all parts of the world, to train their talents to earn money. No other Institution enjoys such wide and intimate acquaintance with publishers, editors, printers, and advertisers. This opens the door of employment to the students.

ELIZABETH STEWART.

person in a novel we advise him to study the works written in this style by the masters of our language.

SONS AND LOVERS (Duckworth, 6s.) is written with meticulous care and an eye for detail worthy of high praise. Mr. D. H. Lawrence has taken for his theme the contrasted outlook on life of two generations—showing first the intimate, domestic life of the mother, and the birth and growing up of her sons, and the subsequent conflict which ensues between her and the girl who would lay claim to the heart of her favourite, Paul. There is a pathos about the following interview between mother and son, when they are discussing Miriam, which is very human. She has been upbraiding Paul for neglecting her for the girl, and asks what he can see in her, and what they find to talk about, and he replies:

"Why—painting—and books. You don't care about Herbert Spencer."

"No," was the sad reply. "And you won't at my age."

"Well, but I do now—and Miriam does——"

"And how do you know that I shouldn't? Do you ever try me?"

"But you don't, mother; you know you don't care whether a picture's decorative or not; you don't care what manner it is in."

"How do you know I don't care? Do you ever try me? Do you ever talk to me about these things to try?"

"But it's not that that matters to you, mother; you know it's not."

"What is it then—what is it then, that matters to me?" she flashed. He knitted his brows with pain.

"You're old, mother, and we're young."

The characters are well and sympathetically drawn, and the plot of the story is consistently worked out. The scene is laid in a colliery town in the Midlands, and the life of the colliers is vividly sketched. Mr. Lawrence writes convincingly, and impresses his readers with the conviction that he knows thoroughly the people he writes about. Altogether the book is one which should appeal to a large number of readers, for it is full of human interest, and rings true throughout.

UNPATH'D WATERS (John Lane, 6s.). This is a book of strikingly original short stories by Mr. Frank Harris. The first, "The Miracle of the Stigmata," is concerned with the later life of a "man called Joshua, a carpenter and smith," who came from Cæsarea. Though we are not told in so many words, the man Joshua is obviously Jesus Christ. Mr. Harris shows a daring spirit in dealing with the matter in the way he has. In "The King of the Jews" we are given an account of how one Simon carried the Cross to Calvary, and the story loses nothing of its pathos from the fact that it is told by the lips of Simon himself. "An English Saint" is perhaps one of the best of the stories. It shows with a certain amount of cruelty how a naturally weak and unintellectual man is moulded by the hands of a woman, and how he passes through all the temptations of this wicked world until, in the words of the Archbishop who presides at his inauguration as a Bishop, "perhaps he's as near a saint as we're likely to see." And that Bishop was a "stout, healthy, thrusting prelate and a man of the world, with a good-natured contempt for Gerald." The other stories are all well worth reading, one in particular, "The Ring," which discloses the methods by which auctions are conducted, and is certainly startling, if not sensational. Mr. Harris has left his best story to the end, and he is perhaps wise in doing so, knowing that his readers will lay down the book with a strong feeling of pleasurable sorrow, slightly tinged with wonder. "The Magic Glasses" is the title of this story, and it is written with a delicacy of touch and a genuine feeling of romance.

EMAUX ET CAMEES, by Théophile Gautier, (6s.); CONFESSIONS, by J. J. Rousseau (2 vols., 6s. each); SOUS L'OEIL DES BARBARES by Barrès, are now added to the "Maitres de Livre," published by Georges Crès et Cie, 3 bis, Place de la Sorbonne, Paris.

These new editions of Théophile Gautier's and Barrès' masterpieces, and of Rousseau's unexpurgated "Confessions," are the latest additions to a now famous series of French classics. That series, "Les Maitres de Livre," edited by M. van Bever, and published by Georges Crès, 3 bis, Place de la Sorbonne, Paris, is one of the most interesting ventures in recent French publishing. Being perfect examples of the French printer's craft, the volumes aim at providing an Edition de Luxe of representative classics at moderate prices. The venture has been an extraordinary success. All the previous volumes went out of print in a few months and some of the older volumes have now considerably increased in value—the second-hand copies having risen from 6s. to £2.

A CORRECTION.—We are asked to state that Miss Julie M. Lippman's book, MARTHA-BY-THE-DAY, which was reviewed in our issue of May 23rd, is published by Mr. Grant Richards, and not by Messrs. Putnams, as inadvertently stated; also that the price is 2s. 6d., and not 2s.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2152 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

“EVERYMAN” FICTION

THE FICTIONAL WORKS IN “EVERYMAN’S LIBRARY” HAVE SURVIVED THE CRITICAL FIRE OF THE AGES. IN ADDITION TO BEING WORKS OF LITERATURE THEY POSSESS ALL THE QUALITIES OF THE IDEAL NOVEL.

SOME OF THE VOLUMES:

- | | |
|---|--------------------------------------|
| Ainsworth’s Tower of London. | Kingsley’s Novels (4 vols.) |
| Austen’s (Jane) Novels (5 vols.) | Kingsley’s (Henry) Ravenshoe. |
| Balzac’s Works (12 vols.) | Lever’s Harry Lorrequer. |
| Blackmore’s Lorna Doone. | Lytton’s Last Days of Pompeii. |
| Borrow’s Lavengro | Manning’s Sir Thomas More. |
| Brontës’ Novels (4 vols.) | Marryat’s (Charles) Novels (9 vols.) |
| Collins’ The Woman in White. | Melville’s Moby Dick. |
| Converse’s “Long Will.” | Melville’s (Whyte) The Gladiators. |
| Cooper’s Last of the Mohicans. | Mulock’s John Halifax. |
| Defoe’s Journal of the Plague Year. | Oliphant’s Salem Chapel. |
| Dickens’ Works (20 vols.) | Reade’s Peg Woffington. |
| Dumas’ Works (12 vols.) | Sand’s The Devil’s Pool. |
| Eliot’s Novels (6 vols.) | Scott’s Works (25 vols.) |
| Erckmann-Chatrian’s The Conscript and Waterloo. | Sterne’s Tristram Shandy. |
| Fielding’s Tom Jones (2 vols.) | Thackeray’s Novels (10 vols.) |
| Goldsmith’s Vicar of Wakefield. | Tolstoi’s Novels (7 vols.) |
| Hawthorne’s Scarlet Letter. | Turgenev’s Virgin Soil. |
| James’ Richelieu. | Wood’s The Channings. |
| | Yonge’s Heir of Redcliffe. |

Cloth,
1/- net.

SEND FOR FREE ANNOTATED CATALOGUE OF
640 VOLUMES, COVERING 13 DEPARTMENTS
OF LITERATURE.

Leather,
2/- net.

KENSINGTON COLLEGE

MR. JAMES MUNFORD, M.R.S.A., F.R.C.I., Director.

The Diploma of Honour
for the Gold Medal

awarded to Kensington College by the Council of
THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE 1911
FOR
COMMERCIAL AND SECRETARIAL TRAINING

was signed by

LORD PLYMOUTH, Chairman of the Council, and
MR. W. AUGUSTUS STEWARD, President of the Jury,

ON BEHALF OF THE COUNCIL, CONSISTING OF:

H.R.H. PRINCESS LOUISE, DUCHESS OF ARGYLL.
HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, P.C., K.T., G.C.M.G.
HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF NORFOLK, K.G., P.C.
HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER, G.C.V.O.
HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE, P.C.
HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF FIFE, K.T., P.C.
THE RT. HON. EARL ROBERTS, P.C., K.P., ETC.
THE RT. HON. THE EARL OF PLYMOUTH, P.C., D.L., J.P.

and a brilliant list of the chief members of the British aristocracy.

Students are now being enrolled for next Term, and places are also being booked for next year. Applications for admission, which should not be delayed, are considered in order of receipt.

Candidates desirous of training under the only Gold Medal system extant for a Guaranteed Appointment should write at once for Illustrated Prospectus similar to that graciously accepted by H.M. Queen Alexandra, and for an Illustrated Souvenir of the Twenty-first Anniversary, to

Miss EVA MUNFORD, Secretary, Kensington College, 34, Gloucester Gardens, Gloucester Terrace,
Hyde Park, W.

Tel. No.: Pad. 4348.

DARN NO MORE

STOCKINGS AND SOCKS THAT DON'T WANT MENDING.

Read the following Guarantee, which is given with every pair of Hose we sell:—

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will REPLACE THEM ABSOLUTELY FREE!

Holeproof Hose.

To save uncongenial labour, to make life happier and sweeter for every human being, to increase the leisure time of the overworked—these things are the objects which inventors have striven to attain. Bell, the inventor of the telephone, placed all the world on chatting terms over the wires. He showed us how to laugh at space. Edison applied electricity and enables us to brighten the darkest night. Airmen have mastered the art of flying so what is there left

WHY, OUR GARMENTS STILL WEAR OUT.

But your Hosiery need not if you will keep pace with the times, for there is now Hosiery that is Holeproof.

WHY THIS HOSIERY IS HOLEPROOF.

The explanation of the durability of "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made here, so that every person can see for himself, or herself, the genuineness of it. Your own brain will show you the truth of it. This "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made in a new way from a specially privately manufactured yarn. This yarn is lighter in weight and at the same time tougher and stronger than any other brand. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear, just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still have no damage done to its fabric. There is hardly any spring or elastic stretch in ordinary hose, even of the most expensive kind, and this accounts for the rapid appearance of holes and thin places. Luxuriously comfortable, shapely and well-made, "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is a revelation to all.

Look at our "GUARANTEE" Ticket which is sent with every pair we sell

TRY THEM FOR TWO MONTHS.

Then, if within that time a hole should appear, send them back to us at once with ticket, and we will present you with new hose without extra cost.

No such guarantee could be given with hose made in the ordinary way. But with "V. & H." Holeproof Hose you can be free from the fear of a hole suddenly showing—not only just at that point at the heel where the eyes of everyone can see, but at no part of "V. & H." Holeproof Hose will there be a hole. That we guarantee for two whole months.

The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy house-wives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable.

Everyone in the country will be wearing "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery after we can get them just to TRY it once. Orders are now pouring in from the friends of those who already are wearing the new "V. & H." Holeproof Hose. The prices—

TWO PAIRS Ladies' Stockings, 3/10, postage 2d.

TWO PAIRS Gents' Socks, 2/10,

postage 2d.

COLOURS stocked: Brown, Tan, Saxe, Black, Navy, Champagne, Pearl Grey and Light Mole.

SILK HOLEPROOF.

Sold under same guarantee as above. Two pairs of Gents' Socks, 7/8, postage 2d. Two pairs of Ladies' Stockings, 10/8, postage 2d. Colours: Ladies—Champagne, White, Navy, Empire Blue, Pearl Grey, Tan, Black; Men's—Tan, Navy, Pearl Grey. Stale Boot Size.

Remember it is easier to TRY "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery than to darn a batch of socks and stockings every week.

Please state boot size, write name and address plainly, and go for your postal order now. Don't let good inventions pass you.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER, (Dept. 154)

THE Mail Order House, QUEEN'S ROAD,
BRIGHTON.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 36. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JUNE 20, 1913

One Penny.

IVAN TURGENIEV, NATUS 1818,
OBIIT 1868

For Character Sketch, see page 296.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Portrait of Ivan Turgenev | 289 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 290 |
| The Curse of Usury. Shall we Abolish the Pawnbroker?— By our Special Commissioner | 291 |
| How the Poor Live. A Wharf Labourer's Story—By Thomas Holmes | 292 |
| India for the Indians? A Reply to Mr. Hyndman—By W. S. Lilly | 294 |
| Ivan Turgenev—By Charles Sarolea | 296 |
| Literary Notes | 298 |
| The National Theatre Movement—By William Archer ... | 299 |
| Everyman's German Page | 300 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. Fanny Burney's "Evelina"— By Anna Branson | 301 |
| Forest Music—By J. W. Marriott | 303 |
| Uncle Léchaudel—By André Theuriet | 304 |
| Correspondence— | |
| Industrial Scientific Management | 306 |
| The New Emigration | 307 |
| Woman in the Financial World | 308 |
| Irish Protestants and Home Rule | 310 |
| The Position of the English Author | 312 |
| Mademoiselle Ixc | 312 |
| The Trail of the Topical—By J. K. P. | 313 |
| Books of the Week | 314 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE events of the past week, interesting as they have proved to be, have been quite overshadowed by the three conflicting reports which, after many months of labour, have issued from the Marconi Committee, and seldom, if ever, have the authors of State papers found their conclusions canvassed and discussed with the same avidity and interest as has been awarded to Sir Albert Spicer and his colleagues. Probably no official document on record has excited the same heated controversy as that in which the Committee have summarised their several views of Ministerial dealings in American Marconis. Those conclusions were to be the subject of the most important debate that Parliament has known for many a long day. Doubtless the fact that the Committee have been throughout sharply divided, and that the majority are dissenting from the findings of the chairman, Sir Albert Spicer, has added to the widespread attention occasioned by the report—an attention all the more remarkable as it followed close upon the heels of an obvious decline in public regard for the investigation proceeding at Westminster. It is clear, however, that behind the weariness induced by the prolongation of that inquiry there existed a large amount of restiveness as to the conduct of the Ministers concerned. This has found expression in several quarters—notably at Leicester, where, despite the union between Liberalism and Labour, a third candidate is now threatened.

So far as the actual matters discussed at St. Stephen's are concerned, the most important event has been the collapse of the Liberal "cave" against the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, Mr. Gladstone having definitely withdrawn, on behalf of the Liberal Churchmen in the House, further opposition to that measure. At the same time, it is noticeable that there is to be no relaxation of the official hostility to the Bill, and Mr. Bonar Law's speech against it is, by common consent, one of his most successful Parliamentary efforts.

The agitation regarding the alleged laxity which governs the University of Bristol in granting scholastic degrees still continues, and it is certain that in times of less political trouble and complexity than the present the complaints which are being urged against the Governors of that institution would be the subject of drastic Parliamentary inquiry. It is urged that many of the honours bestowed by the University have been conferred without any regard to the scholarship of the recipients, who in some cases have proved to be merely successful men of business, without any pretensions whatever to literary or scientific attainment. Obviously, this is a matter of grave importance, not only as regards the University of Bristol itself, but as affecting the nation as a whole. While it is most desirable that there should be other seats of learning than the ancient Universities, whose management could place them more in touch with modern conditions, it is on every ground deplorable that the new Universities should be discredited, rightly or wrongly, by the sort of charges that are being brought against those who, as at Bristol, are responsible for the conduct of a new and, it is to be hoped, a great institution. An authoritative inquiry, and an unbiased report are on these grounds most desirable.

It is not a little significant, as it is also, perhaps, a trifle ironical, that the same week which witnessed the opening of Sir Edward Carson's campaign against Home Rule saw also the seizure of five separate consignments of arms, intended—so it is whispered—to equip Ulster for resisting impending legislative enactments. While Sir Edward is appealing to the conscience and intellect of the electorate, his fellow-countrymen of the north-east corner are evidently intent on "keeping their powder dry." Quite seriously, however, the seizure of these arms is an event whose importance has yet to be grasped. What would our fathers have thought of arms, not wooden rifles, being found in large parcels, consigned, nobody knows precisely by whom or to whom? No effort whatever has yet been made to trace the responsibility either for the despatch or the receipt of these munitions of war, and that surely is the most perplexing feature in what, properly viewed, is a most disquieting business.

By far the most marked trial that has taken place in England for many a long year came to a dramatic conclusion on Tuesday, when Mr. Justice Phillimore sentenced the Suffragette leaders to lengthy terms of imprisonment in the third division, adding in language remarkable for its emphasis, the unusual declaration that, "if the Home Secretary consults me, I shall take upon myself the responsibility of saying that, at any rate, the ringleaders of you should not be released upon any consideration." This virtually means that the W.S.P.U. will, hunger-strike or no hunger-strike, be without the active aid of its leaders for some time to come. Thus the trial marks a very important stage in the history of the militant agitation. Will the authorities accept the responsibility suggested by the judge, and face the probable consequences of a continued hunger strike by the leaders of the movement, or will they yield to other considerations and once again call the "Cat and Mouse Bill" to their aid, and thus extricate themselves from a difficult position? On the other hand, if the authorities remain firm and refuse to release the prisoners under any circumstances, will there be sufficient resilience and resource on the part of the rank and file to continue the perilous and exacting policy that these leaders have initiated, or will the prosecution be justified by the virtual collapse of the agitation? Time will tell.

THE CURSE OF USURY

SHALL WE ABOLISH THE PAWNBROKER? BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

THE vivid and interesting account of municipal pawnbroking in Paris, which recently appeared in EVERYMAN, has led to the suggestion that the adoption of such a system here at home would prove an expedient of great value in fighting that curse of usury which still presses heavily upon tens of thousands of our countrymen. I have been at pains to ascertain, partly by first-hand inquiry and partly by a careful examination of the facts, how far the proposal is practicable.

First, let me say that there can be no question whatever as to the almost tragic importance that the subject possesses for the poor. The pawnshop is the workman's bank. We must dismiss utterly from our minds the idea that only the thriftless and the idle have recourse to it. The system of borrowing money on pledged goods is considerably older than banking, almost as ancient as banks, and is to-day carried on throughout Great Britain on a scale that is simply stupendous. Figures, we know, can be made to prove anything, but those involved in the aggregate pawn-ing transactions of the United Kingdom are literally staggering. It has been estimated that the pledges amount to

Ten per Cent. of the Population a Year, that is, to 400,000,000 annually. The average value of the pledges is about 4s., and this means that the loans paid out every year across the counter of pawnbroking establishments reach something like the gigantic total of £20,000,000. This estimate is not exaggerated. As long ago as 1870 a Select Committee of the House of Commons learnt that in Liverpool alone 9,088,000 pledges were taken annually, and that 6,960,000 were made out in Glasgow, the money lent in that city amounting to over one million sterling. In the face of these figures it is idle to pretend that the pawnbroker is a man who depends for his trade upon one section of the community. The fact is, of course, that, more than any other tradesman, he has relations with representatives of every social stratum, and one of the most remarkable features of his business is that, while in one department a poor woman may be pledging her blankets to get food, in another a woman of the Smart Set may be leaving her diamonds for money to meet her losses at bridge. The same pawnbroker acts for both just as he acts for the doctor who has to part, under temporary stress, with his instruments, for the soldier who must pawn his medal, for the artist who leaves his canvas, for the navy whose Sunday best is "put away," so that he can travel to a distant spot where work waits him. Clearly, therefore, the laws determining the conditions under which pawnbroking is carried on are of Profound Interest in all Classes.

What are those conditions? Determined by the Act of 1870—which passed only in the teeth of the very strongest protests from so good a Conservative as the late Lord Salisbury—they placed the pawnbroker in such a position that he is to-day able to exact interest applied to which the words "harsh and unconscionable" are mild expressions. The Act rendered obligatory the charge of ½d. for the ticket handed to the pawner, which on articles under 2s. doubled in some cases the interest charged; and if we take that sum as the unit, as did the framers of the measure, we are soon face to face with charges and profits that almost take one's breath away. According to the Act,

"the pawnbroker is entitled to charge for this ticket one halfpenny; for profit on each two shillings or part of two shillings lent . . . for not more than one calendar month, one halfpenny; and so on at the same rate per calendar month. . ."

But, be it noted, a large majority of pledges are redeemed within a week, and on these the profit and charges

Work out at 216½ per Cent. per Annum, while, if we take loans under 2s., which are not uncommon in poor districts, we get the following rates of interest:—

| Loan. | Period. | Per Cent. per Annum |
|-----------------|----------------------|---------------------|
| 2s. 0d. | Three days | 505½ |
| 1s. 6d. | Three days | 676 |
| 1s. 0d. | One week | 400 |
| 1s. 0d. | Three days | 1,014 |

In an age that has resounded with denunciations of "unearned increment" it is almost amazing that figures like these have failed to attract attention. But the shibboleth has been accepted that the pawnshop is only for the depraved and the vicious, and practically little attention has been given to the matter.

Turn for a moment from the operation of the system here, and consider some of the alternatives that are in force upon the Continent. Let it be said at once that, so far as the rate of interest charged is concerned, they contrast most favourably with our own. In Madrid, so it is stated, 6 per cent. is charged at the municipal pawnshops, in Brussels 7, and in Berlin 12. It is, however, Paris that affords us perhaps the most interesting example, in the famous Mont de Piété, that survival of the old religious bank which existed to fight usury. Started afresh after the Revolution in 1801,

It has Proved within Limits an Astonishing Success.

The story of the Mont de Piété reads like a romance. First, the profits go to the State and to charity—to the Public Aid Department and to the hospitals of Paris, which one year benefited to the tune of £14,000. Then its arrangements are, in many respects, admirable. Its storage facilities are excellent. For instance, it disinfects all the feather-bed mattresses and blankets, etc., that are brought to it. Above all, the rate of interest charged is trifling, compared with the profits earned by our pawnbrokers, and it encourages by all means in its power the redemption of the goods on which it advances money. Again, as it advances money only on very conservative estimates, and to the value, as a rule, of two-thirds of the article pawned, there is generally a large surplus to go to the pawner when the pledge is sold.

This point is one of cardinal importance. The gravest defect of our arrangements here in England is that the pawnbroker sits beside the friendly auctioneer and contrives to buy back the articles he puts up for sale on low terms, so that the unfortunate pawner is deprived of the surplus over and above the pawnbroker's profit to which the law says he is entitled.

So far, contrasting the two systems,

The Advantage is Immeasurably with the French, and the question, of course, arises whether we should not advocate the replacement of the present defective system by municipal pawnbroking, on the lines of the Mont de Piété. Reluctantly, but none the less emphatically, I say No! For the facts leave no doubt in my mind that, so far as poor, or, at all events, the poorest, are concerned, the Mont de Piété, placed in London, and in full working order, would leave their needs absolutely untouched.

To commence with, the Mont de Piété makes no advance under 2s. 6d., and the large majority of pledges, as we have seen, are for even smaller amounts. Go to a London pawnbroker's any Saturday afternoon or evening, and you may see the mother of a struggling household taking out the tablecloth that the family may eat their Sunday dinner in decency, or the child's best boots, or her husband's jacket and vest. Probably they will be pawned again on the following Tuesday, and the money—the 2s. or 1s. 6d. she receives—will be spent in coal or tea, even, it may be, in bread. Under the Parisian system, unless she had more valuable articles, she could not get even those necessities at times. It may be said, "There is no reason why we should follow the French system in this particular. If the L.C.C. ran municipal pawnshops, they could lend out any amount, however trifling." But my investigations into the matter lead me to the belief that they could not do anything of the sort. For the fact is that in accepting pledges of small value the pawnbroker runs so considerable a risk that he can only make the business pay by charging rates of interest that no public authority would dare to inflict, and in that fact we get the explanation of the apparently rapacious profits that, as I have shown, the law permits the pawnbroker to make. I had very conclusive testimony on this head from one of the most experienced pawnbrokers in the whole of London, who gives out

No less than 38,000 pledges per annum.

According to this gentleman, half at least of the pawnbroker's profits go in "out of times." A man brings in a coat, and is lent 8s. on it. It is not redeemed, and being under 10s. cannot be sold at auction, so is taken into stock and finally sold for 5s. On that transaction the pawnbroker receives no interest whatever, and loses nearly half the principal advanced. The fact is that advancing money on goods of poor quality is speculative to a degree, and can only be made to pay if high interest is charged. Take that away, and the pawnbroker will cease to deal in half-crowns, or even in half-sovereigns, and the small, the infinitely small margin of credit that the poor enjoy will disappear.

Again, the Mont de Piété insists on pawners being kept waiting for two or three days after they have redeemed their goods, and anyone pledging goods over and above ten francs must produce evidence of identification. One gets a vision of the irate and harassed English housewife confronted with these regulations. It is Saturday afternoon, and John and she have planned an outing for Sunday. She has called for her man's best suit, and has brought the money—only to learn that it cannot be restored to her until Tuesday. What would the good lady say?

No; the wholesale substitution of the French system for our own would drive the poor to have recourse to unlicensed pawnbrokers, who already flourish in sufficiently large numbers, and it would do nothing, therefore, to lift the curse of usury off their lives.

That does not mean, however, that we should rest content with our present deplorable arrangements, and I propose to indicate next week the practical steps that we must take to secure reform.

HOW THE POOR LIVE

A WHARF LABOURER'S STORY

By THOMAS HOLMES

I.

It was Christmas morning, 1912! The rain was descending, and Bethnal Green was receiving a much-needed cleansing. As no children and few adults were abroad, the homes of the poor must have been inconveniently crowded, for the public-houses were closed.

I was quickly at my destination, and found myself in the presence of the woman whose pitiful story had drawn me from my home.

She was about fifty-nine years of age, and had just returned from the hospital; they had refused to operate upon her for cancer, her case being considered hopeless.

After comforting her as far as possible, I asked her to give me some particulars of her life.

"I am a trouser machinist," she said. "I was married when I was twenty years of age; my husband was a fish porter in Billingsgate. Sometimes he earned good money, sometimes very little; when he was not earning he was spending, for the public-house was too handy while he was waiting for jobs. I had again to take to my trade before I had been married six months, so I got a machine, which enabled me to earn 12s. or 14s. a week. The more I earned, the more he spent, and ultimately I had to keep the home and the four children by my own earnings.

"I had a hard life for twenty years, but when he died and I was left alone I had more peace and fewer worries.

"I kept my four children without any help from the parish, and I have been the tenant of this house ever since my husband died; the rent is 13s., and there are six rooms in it.

"I let the three top rooms to my married daughter for 6s. 6d. a week; she has seven children; they are all upstairs now. Can't you hear them?"

"An old man and his wife have my little back room, and they pay me 2s. 3d. a week. That leaves me 4s. 3d. to pay. I have this one front room downstairs for my bed and living-room, and a small kitchen, in which I keep my machine and do my work, for the Inspector will not allow me to machine trousers in a bedroom.

"I managed pretty well till nine months ago, when my cancer began. I have had to pawn many things since my earnings fell off, and I do not suppose I shall ever work my machine again; but I must not sell it," she added very decisively.

"But," I said, "surely your daughter helps you! What is your son-in-law?"

"Help me! Help me! They would if they could right enough, but they can't. Many's the time I have helped them; but now I can't help them any more."

"What is his work?" I again asked.

"He is a carman at a river wharf," she said. "A good husband and father, a steady man, who brings home his wages every week. He is upstairs now, mending the children's boots, for they can't go out in this rain."

"Call him down. Tell him I should like to talk to him."

She rose, and went to the foot of the stairs and called out: "Andrew! will you come down for a minute?"

II.

Andrew had no coat on, and his shirt sleeves were rolled up; he had evidently been at work. After wishing him a "Merry Christmas," and asking him to join me in a smoke, I told him that I would like some particulars of his life and work.

"Well," he said, "there is not much to tell that's worth telling; one week is the same as another; it's all work and bed! I have got two days' holiday now, so I'm mending all the boots; but we shall have a bit of a change this week-end, for I shall lose two days' pay, and we shall have to go short of something. But we have to do that every holiday. What else do you want to know?"

"Tell me, what wages do you earn, what time do you leave in the morning, and what time do you get home in the evening?"

"Very often," he said, "I have to be at the wharf by four o'clock. Sometimes I am told to be there at five o'clock, six o'clock, and sometimes I am not sent out with my team till eight o'clock or nine o'clock. It is the uncertainty that makes the worry, for should I be a few minutes late some other man takes out my team, and I am grassed for the day. But that does not happen often, for I am good at getting up in the morning, and if I should not wake early my wife would rouse me. I don't think she sleeps much after three o'clock. The time I get home depends upon the time I start out with my team. Sometimes I get home about five o'clock, sometimes at seven o'clock, and sometimes not till midnight. My wages come to 30s. a week for twelve hours' work a day. If I work more than twelve hours in one day I get overtime money; but I don't get much, for the manager contrives to prevent it, for then I have time and a quarter. I could do with a good bit of overtime, for we have nothing to spare when we have paid our way."

"Now, go up to your boot-mending and the children, and ask your wife if she will kindly come down."

As Andrew went up the narrow stairs, he evidently saw his wife standing at their room door, for I heard him say, "Liza, he wants to see you now." So Liza came down. I was going to wish her a "Merry Christmas," but one look was sufficient to deter me, for her face told of worry, suffering, and, I am afraid, fasting. I could understand why she was so wakeful at three o'clock in the morning. A more pathetic-looking woman I had never seen. So I pressed a Christmas-box, which made her smile wearily.

So the three of us sat, the mother dying of cancer on the one side, and the ill-nourished mother of seven children on the other, and we talked of her life, her husband, her children, and the expenditure of the money, and the future!

"Yes!" she said, "Andrew is a good husband; he never drinks or beats me, and he always brings his full money home. Whatever we should do if he did not I cannot tell! We have seven children, and the eldest is a girl of seventeen, who earns seven shillings a week; but she has to walk all the way to the City Road and back, for she cannot afford to ride. I allow her twopence every day for food, and she takes some bread and margarine with her; but she wears out a lot of boots. She is not very strong. She often gets very wet, and the doctor says she is anæmic. But she is a good girl, and has just been confirmed.

"This is my eldest boy, fourteen years of age. You see what a big strong lad he is. He eats all that we can put before him; but he has no mind at all. They will not have him at school because he cannot learn.

He could not learn his letters. He cannot help in the house, or mind the children, for he steals their food from them. He cannot do the least errand for me. But he is never ill, and almost lives out of doors. He is not mischievous. What we shall do with him I can't imagine!"

"Tell me now," I said, "how you manage to keep house, and how you spend your money."

"I will tell you as nearly as I can, but I cannot remember everything. Every Saturday my husband brings home 30s. I give him 5s. back again, that is 8d. per day for his dinner and tea, and 1s. to buy a bit of tobacco and to pay his club money.

"I pay 6s. 6d. rent; 1s. for coal, sometimes more; gas costs another 1s.; we are all insured, for which I pay 1s.; we have two quartern loaves every day, so bread comes to 6s. 5d. in the week; we have half a pound of margarine every day, and that amounts up to 1s. 9d.; I have two tins of condensed milk in the week, so the milk costs us 7d. per week; our Sunday joint and vegetables come to 2s. 8d.; I have one pound of tea at 1s. 4d.; three pounds of sugar at 2½d.; and two pounds of rice at 2d. Sometimes I buy a pennyworth of jam for my daughter's supper, for it helps the bread and margarine down. I always try to get a bit of fish for my husband's supper, for he must have something when he comes home. I usually get fresh herrings, for they are cheap."

III.

I looked at the half-starved woman and wondered. I thought of the children coming in from school, of the wolfish lad who "eats all that could be put before him," and then I said, "What do you and the children have for dinner?"

"Sometimes boiled rice with sugar on it; sometimes I buy three-quarters of a pound of beef sausages."

"What do you pay for the sausages?"

"Threepence," she said. "They are fourpence a pound."

"Does your big boy come into dinner when you have sausages?"

"Oh, yes, he always comes in to meals."

"Then there is not much left?"

"Oh, no! Why, he could eat the lot!"

"How many of you dine upon that three-quarters of a pound of sausages?"

"Five children and myself; but I do not give any to the youngest child."

"I am afraid there is not much left for you after the children have been served."

"Not much, sir; but then, you see, I have done growing."

"Yes, but you have not done working. You do the washing and ironing for the family, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes; soap costs me 5d. a week."

"Wait a bit," I said, "you are spending more than your income; you have nothing left for clothing, boots, towels, and house requisites. However do you get them?"

"There is my daughter's seven shillings, but most of that has to be spent on her, for she must go tidy to work. Then I earn a shilling sometimes on my machine when the children are gone to bed. I am often weary and tired of it all. I have a hard life; but what's the use of complaining? There's plenty worse off, for Andrew does have regular work, and he is a good husband."

So I left them! Andrew mending his children's boots, his weary-faced wife at her endless tasks, the widowed mother nursing her cancer, and the soulless boy ready to eat everything put before him!

INDIA FOR THE INDIANS?

A REPLY TO MR. HYNDMAN * * * BY W. S. LILLY

PART II.

A Misleading Shibboleth

THE cry of "India for the Indians" has been raised by an extremely small fraction of the inhabitants of that portion of the country which is directly under our rule. The dwellers in British India number over two hundred millions, and may be described, with more accuracy than is usual in such generalisations, as "a dense population of husbandmen." Only a twentieth part of them live in towns, most of which are overgrown villages. Of cities there are very few. The vast majority are in a state of abject poverty, as their ancestors have been from time immemorial. Their houses are small huts with only one windowless room. The walls consist of coarse straw mats fastened to a framework of bamboo or reeds, or of alternate rows of straw and reeds plastered with mud. Their method of cultivation is of the simplest. For example, their ploughing has been described, not unjustly, as "scratching the ground with a crooked stick." All their energies are confined to the problem of sustaining life. All their interests are bounded by the village community in which they dwell. It appears from official returns that only eight and a half millions of them can, in any degree, read and write their own vernaculars. "India for the Indians" obviously does not and cannot mean India for these masses who have no political aspirations whatever, who have never so much as heard of representative government, and who are no more fitted for it than children in a nursery.

The Unspeakable Babu

What, then, does the cry of "India for the Indians" really mean? It means India for the people who raise the cry: the originators and fomentors of political agitation in that country, who really have no more right to speak for the people of India than the three tailors of Tooley Street had to speak for the people of England. In the whole of India there are 625,000 literates in English, and of these some 100,000 constitute the Babu class. And what they represent is their own caste: the most aristocratic in the world. So far from representing a popular movement in India, as they have tried—and tried successfully—to persuade English demagogues, they are the most unpopular class in Hindustan. But they are dreaded as much as they are disliked, their English education (so called) investing them with much prestige. Their underlying aspiration is to be rid of the impartial supervision of British officials, who prevent their tyrannising over the lower castes and classes. For, as the Times pointed out in a leading article not long ago, "it is to these officials that the toilers and tillers owe, too frequently in the teeth of violent opposition from the Hindu politicians, every measure which has been hitherto passed to promote the interests of agriculture and to abate the rapacity of the usurer and the landgrabber." Everyone who has any direct and personal knowledge of India knows that this is a true account of the Babus. But it may not be amiss to supplement it by the description given of them by M. Maindron, who is one of the most considerable authorities on Hindustan:—

"A Babu! What friend of India can hear the name without trembling with anger? . . . The Babus are a canaille which the feebleness of a humanitarian administration forms in the schools of the great centres of India. Pretended anarchists (anarchistes de façade) and shameful traditionalists, repudiating the civilisation of their own country for the nonce, in the hope of rendering it permanent after the cataclysms which they invoke, these Babus are the partisans of 'India for the Indians.' They have made use of British teaching to learn the means of ruining their educators. And pending the expulsion of the English, they live on the administration of England. They copy the English clubs, they ape English customs. They become writers, journalists, and clerks (ronds-de-cuir), for nothing manly in the Englishman attracts them. They dread English sports, from which their effeminacy and cowardice keep them aloof. Like Panurge, whom they resemble in more than one point, they have a natural fear of hard knocks. Their weapon is the pen: a weapon poisoned by delation, duplicity, calumny, and intrigue."

Shall We Evacuate India?

Such are the Indians who want India for themselves. But if Mr. Hyndman thinks they will get it, he is very much mistaken. In the first place, the British people, obeying, as Alexis de Toqueville has well said, "an instinct which is not only heroic but true, and a real motive of conservation," will assuredly keep India at any cost. And, secondly, in the incredible, the impossible event of a British evacuation of that country, assuredly the government of it would not fall into the hands of the Babus. If anything is certain, it is that the haughty Moslems, the chivalrous and truth-loving Rajputs, the warlike Sikhs, even the Eurasians and the native Christians, would disdain the ignominious yoke of the babbling Babu. There is a striking passage in Baron von Hübnér's most interesting book, "A travers l'Empire Britannique," which is worth quoting in this connection. He relates that a well-known Brahmin in Benares, a man in high position, and not an enthusiastic admirer of the British Raj, said to him in the course of conversation, "Do you know what would happen if the English should leave India? Suppose we went down into our parks and opened the cages of our wild beasts: in a few minutes they would have devoured us and one another, except the tiger, who would survive; that tiger will be Mohammedan." I do not doubt the truth of this forecast. The sixty millions of Mohammedans are dynamically the most considerable of the jarring elements of the population of British India. They are a homogeneous people, closely united by their religion. They have the traditions of a warlike race for long centuries established in the seat of power, and they are quite capable of again holding their own in it. Does Mr. Hyndman or do the spurious humanitarians who encourage Indian sedition, with its vapid tall talk and cowardly murders, suppose that the substitution of a Mohammedan for a British Raj would be for the advantage of the people of Hindustan?

Pseudo-Representative Government

Again, it must not be forgotten that the native princes, who rule directly over two-thirds of India, view Babudom with the greatest disfavour, and would suppress in their own dominions with the utmost rigour any attempt to foment the unrest and disaffection which it creates. One of the most considerable of them—the Nizam—wrote, not long ago, to the Viceroy, "Sedition should be localised and rooted out mercilessly." Of course, that is easier said than done, because for the sedition which thwarts and cripples the work of the British Raj in India we are ourselves largely responsible. It is the outcome of a foolish policy which we have pursued in India for the better part of a century. Sir Evelyn Wood, a high authority, in his very striking book, "The Revolt in Hindustan," tells us that, in his opinion, one of the causes of the great Mutiny was "the well-meant but mistaken attempt to govern in accordance with systems prevailing in the United Kingdom, millions of Asiatics, as numerous as the people of Europe, and of as many different religions." Hoc fonte derivata clades. This is the real source of the troubles which have come upon us in the Indian Empire. They are of our own making. Since the days when Lord—then Mr.—Macaulay was a member of the Government of India, a main endeavour of its rulers has been to Anglicise it. The not very virile intelligence of the Governor-General under whom he served—Lord William Bentinck—was won over by his facile rhetoric, as the declaration in the famous Proclamation of March 7th, 1835, showed: "The great object of the British Government ought to be the promotion of European literature and science among the natives of India." In pursuance of this "great object" the British Government has inflicted numberless woes upon the country. It has attempted to introduce political institutions of a representative character, for which the people are quite unfit, as I have before observed, and which are utterly distasteful to them. Some thousand municipalities have been created throughout India, and I know not how many local and district boards. The representative character of these bodies is the emptiest of pretences. The people whom they are supposed to represent know and care nothing about them. The astute Hindus who get themselves elected, and who are largely vakils, that is, lawyers, represent nothing but their own personal interests, and their desire to gratify those interests by such means as their official position offers. One of the wisest men who ever had a seat in the Viceroy's Council foretold this result. "It would be a matter of surprise to me," Sir Henry Maine said, "that municipal institutions should flourish at all in India; it would be still more wonderful that they should, in any case, be based upon a system of popular representation." "Such institutions," he added, "have had in Europe an almost unbroken career of two thousand years, and in India it is proposed to create them!" The pretence at representative government which we find in Hindustan is not only a folly, it is also a fraud.

The Farce of Education

The same must be said of what we are pleased to call the "higher education" which we have given to the people of India, and of which such proud boasting is made, from time to time. In the first place, it is not education at all. The object of education is the formation of character. "I call therefore a complete and generous education," says Milton, "that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both public and private, of peace and war." But the "higher education" which we have given to the young Indian does nothing of the kind. It is an attempt—in Mill's graphic words—"to force English ideas down his throat"—ideas which are foreign from his mentality, and which it is extremely difficult for him to assimilate. It empties him of his traditional and ancestral beliefs, and gives him nothing wherewith to replace them. The young Hindu who has passed through a Government College leaves it, as a rule, utterly sceptical and discontented, wholly void of settled principles, religious or ethical. The net result of his year of study—in most cases it would be truer to say cramming—has really been to denationalise him. I call such "education," as I have called the bastard local self-government in India, a fraud and a folly. It is a most egregious folly. Sir George Birdwood, who knows India as few men know it, has expressed his opinion that "the so-called 'unrest' in Bengal has a reality in the legitimate discontent of the Anglicised rising generation all over India." He adds, "Our system of education has made their gods, and their splendid literature, and their immemorial industrial arts, all lost treasures to them; and we have unfitted them for any employment in their own country, while we have no adequate employment to offer them in this country; and we deserve any revenge they may be moved to have on us for the spiritual and material ruin we have brought on them." Babudom, then, is an evil of our own creation. It is the outcome of our insensate attempt to Anglicise India. What the Babu is we have made him. And, I am sorry to say, I see no sign of any cessation of the process which has produced him.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

IT is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

- | | |
|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Compositor. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace,

Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

IVAN TURGENIEV * * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

RUSSIAN literature is the finest of all heroic literatures. No other has raised to a higher level the dignity of a novelist. The Russian novelist is at the same time a man of thought and a man of action. He has a cure of souls; he is an apostle. The Russian novel of the nineteenth century, like the French novel of the eighteenth, has been the chief and almost the only instrument of political and social freedom. The novel in Russia takes the place of the newspaper, the pulpit, and the platform, for under an autocratic Government the Press is gagged, the Church has sold her birth-right for a mess of pottage, and the Duma is of recent growth.

Nothing is more sad or more tragic, more monotonous, and at the same time more touching and more glorious, than the life-story of Russian novelists. Nearly all these lives resemble one another. What a lamentable list of martyrs! Radischef, one of the first who dared to expose the horrors of serfdom, exiled to Siberia by Catherine the Great and forced into committing suicide! Pouchkine and Lermontoff killed in a duel! Griboiedoff assassinated! Bielinski, the greatest of critics, Solovioff, the greatest of philosophers, and Tchekhof, the most celebrated of novelists, carried off prematurely by a pitiless climate! Herzen, Saltikoff, Tchernitchovski, and Kropotkine condemned to exile! Dostoevski, sentenced to the mines—damnatus ad metalla—and spending the best of his years in the "House of the Dead." Plescheeff, Pisareff, Maxime Gorki, put in prison! All suspected, hunted, and condemned under a hostile Government to a life of sickness and misery.

On this list of martyrs, in this struggle for freedom of thought and of conscience, Turgeniev occupies, in spite of some adverse criticism, a place of honour. He also knew what prison life meant. He was exiled to his distant property. He was placed under police vigilance, and if he suffered less than others from the harshness of those in power it is because he put the frontier between himself and the police. Far from his country, he continued to fight the good fight.

II.

Born in 1818, that is ten years before Tolstoy, in the Province of Orel, in old Russia, and on the borders of that black soil which is the granary of Europe, Turgeniev belonged to the illustrious liberal and liberating generation of the 'forties. Attaining his intellectual majority when the despotic power of Nicholas I. was at its height, he bore the marks of that terrible régime, and the misery of serfdom branded itself indelibly upon his soul. Descended from the country aristocracy, and bred of long lines of noblemen, he was the last witness of feudal customs, and became the acknowledged chronicler of a society now for ever abolished. A sad childhood was his, whose memory served to darken his whole life. His father was a rake. His mother, a strange, despotic woman, who lorded it over an estate of 5,000 souls, quarrelled with him, and never forgave him for losing caste by becoming an author, when he might have achieved a brilliant military career in the Tchin. He received a double education—à la France, at the hands of indifferent preceptors and dancing masters, and à la Tartare, that is, at the point of the lash. At eighteen he was glad to escape from the maternal home, with its atmosphere of violence and servility, and to make his way first to Moscow for a season of pleasure, then to St. Petersburg to taste the comparative liberty of student life. These were the darkest days of political despotism, and the temptation to breathe the air of freer lands was very strong. At twenty Turgeniev left Russia, and spent three years at the University of Berlin. After Muscovite despotism the despotism of Prussia seemed a deliverance.

This first absence of three years determined his future life. On his return to Russia he could no longer breathe his native air. At twenty-nine years of age, in 1847, he returned to a wandering life, and left his country for good, returning to it only for a few weeks each year in order to settle his business affairs. And if at first the love of his native land seized upon the exile and brought him back for a time to Spasshohle, the tyrannical reign of Nicholas did its best to kill these regrets. In 1852, the day after the publication of the "Sportsman's Sketches," he received in prison, as does every âme bien née in Russia, his baptism of liberty. His crime was the discreet praise he had given to Gogol and his "Dead Souls," just as Lermontoff had been punished for praising Pouchkine. It was a warning. From henceforth Turgeniev was cured of his nostalgia. He became more and more "westernised." For years he wandered across Europe in the pursuit of his artistic ideal, and in the train of Madame Viardot, the famous prima donna and sister of Malibran, to whom he was united by a friendship which death alone was to end. He resided alternately in Germany and France, and built himself a villa at Baden-Baden. He, the Scythian and the Tartar, became a type of the uprooted absentee landlord. Far from Russia, he understood her no more, and was no more understood by her, and he lived to be misprized and disowned by the coming generation of his compatriots.

After 1870 he left Germany, and settled permanently in Paris, and France was grateful to the stranger who preferred the hospitality of the Conquered to that of the Conqueror. An intimate friend of Flaubert, who had organised in his honour the famous dinners at Magny, of which Edmond de Goncourt became the chronicler (see the Diary of the Goncourts), translated by Mérimée, extolled by About and George Sand, by Taine and Renan, recognised as a master by Zola and Daudet, Turgeniev became almost a French classic, and the first on the lists of the new realistic and naturalistic school. In spite of such adulation and affection, exile was not good for him. His popularity in France, besides being a little artificial, could never reconcile him to his unpopularity at home, and he carried in his heart till death the wound struck by his alienated and ungrateful country. His mental sufferings, his irregular life had prematurely undermined his vigorous constitution. Turgeniev died in 1868, after years of excruciating suffering caused by cancer of the spinal cord. By a strange irony of fate, he who lived as a disregarded exile returned after death to his native country, and Russia, who had disowned him, gave to his dead body the honours she had refused to his genius.

III.

It is important for an understanding of Turgeniev to trace the main currents of his tortured existence, to remember at what date and under what influences each of his books came into being, and, above all, to recall the successive environments in which his lot was cast: Old Russia, the Black Soil, Serfdom, German Universities, the Russian Colony of Baden, the cosmopolitan society of Paris. For Tur-geniev was a chronicler. He could only describe with microscopic minuteness what he had seen, and make the scenes he had actually passed through live again. If he had had the magnifying imagination of a Balzac or of a Dickens, he would have transformed actuality; if he had had the historical imagination of Walter Scott, he would have taken refuge in "the past"; if he had had the reforming and Christian temperament of Tolstoy, his books would have been speeches and discussions. But Turgeniev had none of these. On the one hand he had scarcely any creative faculty; on the other hand, he was entirely detached from all positive Christianity. He was a complete Nihilist in religion, and even in politics he disclaimed any didactic intention. Possessing to a supreme degree the genius of observation and of psychological analysis, he contented himself with reproducing the reality which surrounded him, and the society and personalities which he knew. This surrounding reality, this society, and these personalities he saw thus through an artistic temperament, which received its profoundest impressions from its environment. To understand this temperament of his, his moral physiognomy, his jarring discords, his eccentricities, his contrasts, one must transport oneself to the Russia of former days.

Tradition has it that Turgeniev was a fatherly and patriarchal "grand old man," six feet in height, with white hair and a flowing beard, the soul of a child in the body of a giant, full of kindness and good nature, ingenuousness, and simplicity. In reality, no one was less ingenuous than Turgeniev, as Daudet and Zola learnt to their sorrow. The simplicity of the Slav, indeed, is very often mingled with the duplicity of the Byzantine.

Turgeniev is full of contradictions and fundamentally obscure; and these contradictions explain the contradictory judgments of which he has been the subject, especially in Russia, on the part of the Slavophiles, as well as the "Zapadniki." He is at once a mystic and a mystifier, an enthusiast and a sceptic, keen on revolution, and yet without illusions concerning revolutionaries ("Fathers and Children"); gentle and violent; a believer in ideas, and yet knowing all the time that these ideas will be dissipated in "Smoke." ("Smoke.")

Very intelligent, very yielding, and very feeble, he was always influenced by his surroundings. Very young and very old, at once barbaric and refined, he is the product of a civilisation which, one might say, was putrescent before it was ripe. When it was the fashion to be Byronic, and to assume a romantic pose, Turgeniev startled Herzen and Tolstoy by his dandified affectation as he sported an eyeglass in the Perspective Nevski. When he was in Germany he was a Gallophobe. When he was in Paris he was a Gallophile; yet he did not hesitate to write some very bitter criticisms on the country of his adoption to his friends in Russia.

In fine, his was a nature wavering and complex, a character profoundly sympathetic, but undecided and vacillating, a luminous intelligence, but lacking focus. His virtues really belonged to him; his faults he owed to his education, and to the demoralising conditions of his exiled and uprooted existence.

And as these conditions explained in a great measure the personality of the novelist, they also explained the physiognomy of his characters, the atmosphere of his work. That atmosphere is depressing, and the physiognomy of the "heroes" is still more so. These heroes have nothing heroic about them. They are nearly all without energy, or they waste what energy they have in words, or in evanescent accessions of violence. They descant incessantly upon the Russian genius, its destiny, and its superiority over the European genius; but they submit to all the indignities of the present moment. Nearly all are "Useless Men." (See "The Diary of a Useless Man.") They go from one extreme to another, not having their centre of gravity within themselves. They ask from love both the joys and the sufferings of life, but in that very love they reveal the same want of character, of stability and consistence.

Sometimes they sacrifice to a caprice the woman they love; sometimes they commit suicide when crossed in love, without any resource against temptation or misfortune. This paralysis of the will, this "aboulie"—no one has described and diagnosed it with a surer penetration than Turgeniev, because he himself was so profoundly affected by it, and because it is the constitutional malady of the Russian soul. How can one escape being "aboulique" like Roudine in a country where the will of one individual can break everything and substitute itself for everything? How can one help being fantastic like Irène in a country where despotism and caprice reign? How can one avoid violence and Nihilism like that of Bazaroff under a régime where nothing can be obtained by reason and persuasion, and where one must be either a victim or a despot?

IV.

As a writer, Turgeniev is without a rival. He is the purest of stylists, the first classical prose writer of his country. Like Pouchkine, he had the most intimate knowledge and mastery of the resources and the riches of the Russian tongue. I remember once, when I was in the Crimea, and wishing to learn the Russian language, I asked Maxime Gorki what would be the best method to follow. Gorki, the least artistic, the least westernised of writers, sent me first of all to Turgeniev. It is a fact that foreigners begin their study of Russian by reading Turgeniev. It is he who initiates them into the secrets of the most complex, the most finely graded, the most varied and most subtle of modern languages—perhaps of all languages the sole heir to the genius of the Greek tongue.

But Turgeniev is still more; he is a master of European literature. He has neither the inspiration of Gogol, nor the epic grandeur or the prophetic breath of Tolstoy, nor the profound tragedy of Dostoievski, nor the democratic sentiment of Gorki and Tchekhof. His horizon is as limited and monotonous as the horizon of the steppes. He works with certain ever-recurring types of lovers, proprietors, peasants, intellectuals, and revolutionaries. If his talent remains personal and original, if he has not (whatever may be said against him) copied from his predecessors, he is for ever copying himself. But in this limited world, which is his own, Turgeniev is without a rival. The best judges in all countries—Mérimée, Taine, and Hennequin in France; Brandes in Denmark; Henry James in America; Galsworthy in England,—have recognised, in spite of the obscuring medium of translation, the mastery of his art. He has colour, meaning, order, composition. He has moderation and proportion. He knows how to sum up a situation in a few lines, how to draw a character with a few strokes. He has none of the tedious speeches which make Dostoievski, and sometimes Tolstoy, so difficult to read. He excels in telling a story. He probably inspired Maupassant, and there is no doubt that Tchekhof owed much to him.

As an artist Turgeniev seems to have profited by all his experiences, even by the harshness of the Censorship; and the failings of mankind ministered to his art no less than its virtues. Narrowly watched by Censors, he was forced into those reticences and reserves, and into that veiled delicacy of allusion which heightens artistic effect. Being a pessimist, he had no illusions about his characters, but maintained throughout a Shakespearean objectivity towards them. Had he been more optimistic and idealistic, and more of a reformer, he would have interposed his own reflections between his characters and the reader, using them, too, as vehicles of his own favourite doctrine. But being a fatalist, he believed in the immutability of his characters, and made them all act according to the strict logic of their temperaments.

It should be added that, though Turgeniev contemplates the "Human Comedy" with the disillusioned smile of the sceptic, his smile is often mixed with tears, and his scepticism never excludes tenderness, emotion, and sympathy. So far from excluding goodness and indulgence, his fatalism rather implies them; for to him to understand all is to pardon all. One pre-eminently Christian virtue has survived the shipwreck of his Christianity—the virtue of resignation, and he has kept the best part of Christian piety, which is pity. Like all great Russian writers, he has, amid the loss of many beliefs, retained the religion of human suffering.

LITERARY NOTES

THE two great events of the spring publishing season have been the Definitive Edition of the Works of Francis Thompson, published in three attractive and beautifully printed volumes by Messrs. Burns and Oates, and the Collected Poems of Mrs. Alice Meynell, issued by the same firm a few weeks ago, and already in its third large edition. We hope to notice both these significant literary phenomena at greater length in the near future. Meanwhile, what calls for comment is the fact that poetry of the highest and least immediately appealing type is finding an increasing public. Nothing could be further from the popular exploitation of sentiment and exaggeration of impressionism than Mrs. Meynell's pure and austere Muse, yet her reticent and elusive verse has attained a success which present-day imitators of Mr. Kipling do not even trust themselves to dream of. Of Francis Thompson one would like to say much. His magnificent and fastidious work has been little short of a redemptive force in the history of modern poetry. A comparison with Crashaw has been pressed until it became glaringly untrue, yet for sheer religious ecstasy and depth of "perception" (in Coventry Patmore's sense of the word) there have only been two poets in the whole of our literature—Crashaw and Thompson. All who came between them fell short of the highest potency of the terms. Of all things written on Thompson, a verse, a short poem, evoked by his line, "Remember me, poor thief of song," and published, if I mistake not, anonymously, clings to the memory:—

"Remember me, poor thief of song";
Ah, yes, dear brother, while the world remains,
If any of our age
Stood on the Angels' side,
Is it not thou?

Forgiven now is every wrong;
The mystery of all thy mortal pains
Is over. In thy page,
Almost heatified,
And on thy brow

Is delved the undefiled, the quenchless dream,
And through thy grandiose auriferous rhyme
There runs a shining seam
That shames the brazen penury of our time."

One has long taken the overwhelming preponderance of fiction in our present-day literary output for granted, but it was never quite so forcibly brought home to the mind than in looking over the enlarged edition of Dr. Baker's Guide to the Best Fiction in English, just issued by Messrs. Routledge. This literary guide-book contains not only the names of 7,000 works of fiction, ranging from the Anglo-Saxon version of Apollonius to the latest Post-Wellsian production, but a short note on each, giving the theme, date, and other bibliographical information, and including a brief characterisation of the style of the book. It should save many a librarian's time and temper, though one doubts if the class of reader who expects a detailed description of every ephemeral novel from his librarian will ever be induced to consult such a work of reference. The work is very thoroughly and competently done, the novels of living writers occupying 127 pages. Over 130 pages treat of translations of foreign novels, including Japanese, modern Greek and Bulgarian, Bosnian and Yiddish works, the three last being represented by one translation each.

* * * * *

It is pleasant to note that Messrs. Macmillan's new Shilling Theological Library, the first twelve volumes of which are expected next month, will include not only time-honoured theological classics, but modern works of such freshness, verve, and grip as Mr. Wm. Temple's "The Faith and Modern Thought," Mr. Bernard Lucas's "The Faith of a Christian," and the brilliant and thoughtful anonymous book, "Pro Christo et Ecclesia."

* * * * *

The American Bookman, always pre-eminently readable, reminds us, in a bright article with illustrations, that Mr. G. K. Chesterton once upon a time did valiantly as illustrator of one of his own books, the now almost forgotten "Greybeards at Play," with the sub-title, "Literature and Art for Old Gentlemen." To judge by the specimens given, G. K. C. has done us all a grave wrong in allowing his pencil to remain idle since then. His illustrations really illustrate with an effect even more startling than the Mr. Kipling's "Just So" pictures. To be convinced of this the sceptic need only look at the picture of the philosopher in tune with all nature, illustrating his touching assertion that

"The aged pig will often wear
That sad sweet smile of mine."

* * * * *

Of books other than fiction the summer season shows the usual dearth. Among the few notable publications one might mention "Ireland under the Commonwealth," published by the University of Manchester Publications Committee. This work, which runs to two volumes, incorporates the documents upon which the late J. P. Prendergast based his well-known account of the Cromwellian settlement in Ireland, and which are the only authoritative sources for a study of this period. They are edited, with notes and historical introduction, by Mr. Robert Dunlop, and will help to further an adequate understanding of the whole Irish question, past and present.

* * * * *

Mr. A. J. Whyte's new annotated edition of Scordello is not the only indication of a persistent interest in Browning. Miss Mayne, the author of a remarkably interesting and original biography of Byron, is engaged upon a book on the female characters of Browning, to be published in the autumn by Messrs. Chatto and Windus.

THE NATIONAL THEATRE MOVEMENT

BY WILLIAM ARCHER

THOUGH far from hopeless, the position of the National Theatre enterprise, disclosed at the recent Mansion House meeting, is equally far from satisfactory. Very soon after the movement was definitely set on foot, in 1908, the Committee was able to announce that an anonymous donor, now known to be Sir Carl Meyer, had started the subscription with a munificent gift of £70,000. This was not only encouraging in itself, but particularly satisfactory, inasmuch as the interest on this substantial sum furnished the Committee with ample means for carrying on its campaign. Everything, then, looked smiling. It seemed incredible that other men of wealth and culture should not be moved to emulate Sir Carl Meyer's generosity; and when once the quarter of a million required for the site and the building was secured, it was confidently believed that a wide popular subscription would furnish the endowment-fund for a worthy Shakespeare Memorial National Theatre, to be opened in 1916, with celebrations appropriate to the tercentenary of the poet's death.

Five years have passed, and though strenuous efforts have been made, and something, no doubt, has been accomplished, the one outstanding fact is that not a single man of means has come forward with a donation in any way comparable to that of Sir Carl Meyer. It seems to me, I own, that this is not only discouraging from the point of view of the particular enterprise in question, but thoroughly discreditable to what may be called our intellectual patriotism. One is sick of reiterating the obvious and shameful fact that the England of Shakespeare is the one great European country which accords no national recognition to the art which Shakespeare's genius placed in the forefront of her national glories. One is tired of pointing out that only some half-dozen of his plays can really be said to hold the stage at all, and that a foreigner may live for months in the city which gave birth to this glorious literature without a single opportunity of seeing a single specimen of it on the stage. These melancholy paradoxes are accepted as tedious truisms by persons who could, almost with one stroke of the pen, relieve their country of so grave a reproach and inferiority. Down to 1908, there was some excuse for inertia, for there existed no definite scheme and mechanism for the establishment of a National Theatre. That difficulty has now been removed. The mechanism, the organisation, is there; all that is wanted is the money—the price of something like 200 motor-cars—one-tenth part of the cost of a single battleship. But no one, or two, or three men can be found to provide this indispensable part of our national equipment.

Does the fault lie with the Executive Committee? Being myself one of its members, I could not, if I would, criticise it; but if I felt that it was in any way to blame, I would resign to-morrow and say so. It is perhaps rather too large and not very homogeneous; but several of its members have worked for the cause with untiring energy and devotion; and I have the less scruple in saying this, as I have myself been too much away from England of late years to take much part in its proceedings. No serious share of the blame, I am sure, lies at the door of the Committee. They have simply been "up against" a dead wall of unintelligent apathy on the part of those who ought to have competed for the honour of ranking as Founders of the National Theatre.

Is there anything to be said in excuse for the shyness of the millionaire? Yes, there is this to be said, that he may well have been bewildered and put off by the running-fire of foolish, and ungenerous, and carping, and paralysing criticism to which the project is constantly subjected at the hands of malicious foes and officious friends. We are told, in the first place, that the national theatres of the Continent are mere incubuses on living art. This is absolutely untrue. They are not outpost theatres, and it is not desirable that they should be. Here or there, one of them may be allowed to stagnate and lose its vitality; but in the main they admirably perform their function of cultivating the classical drama of the country, and bearing constant testimony to the dignity and civic importance of dramatic art. Again, it is said that we are beginning at the wrong end; that we do not want a monumental building to start with; that we have neither the plays nor the actors to put into it; that we ought to begin with a repertory theatre on a small scale, and perhaps work up to the great National Theatre of our dreams. All these allegations have been considered and disposed of again and again by those who have seriously studied the question. We do want a noble building, not only to testify to our pride in Shakespeare and his art, but to be its own advertisement, and proclaim to all the world that here the drama is no mere article of commerce, but a great art cultivated for its own sake. To say that, apart from the classical drama, we have no plays worthy of such a theatre, shows a ludicrous blindness to the most palpable literary phenomenon of the period—the rise of a vigorous living drama. To say that we lack actors is an ignorant libel: talent abounds on every hand, and the practical training of two or three seasons would (under competent management) give us a company that need not fear comparison with that of any National Theatre in Europe. As for the suggestion of starting "in a small way," can we find encouragement in the history of Lord Howard de Walden's experiment at the Haymarket, where the effort to create a repertory theatre broke down before it was even initiated? Everyone who has studied the matter knows that, under metropolitan conditions, the thing must be done on a large scale, or it cannot be done at all. Finally, the failure of the so-called Millionaires' Theatre in New York is often alleged as a discouragement, though the reason was obvious from the outset—namely, that the building was designed for an opera-house rather than for a theatre. Mr. Granville Barker, in my hearing, warned the founders, a year before it opened, that it could not succeed; but they were too deeply committed to take his warning.

Is there no one in this enormously wealthy England of ours who is fascinated by the opportunity of showing the millionaires of New York that England is abreast of them in liberality, and ahead of them in practical sense? Is there no one who realises that £150,000 could not possibly be employed in a more beneficent and at the same time sportsmanslike fashion than in endowing the metropolis of the Empire with a permanent and worthy home for the art in which England once excelled all the world, and might, but for adverse economic conditions, again take the lead?

EVERYMAN'S GERMAN PAGE

ICH GROLLE NICHT

Ich grolle nicht, und wenn das Herz auch bricht,
Ewig verlornes Lieb! ich grolle nicht.
Wie du auch strahlst in Diamantenpracht,
Es sällt kein Strahl in deines Herzens Nacht.

Das weiss ich längst. Ich sah dich ja im Traum,
Und sah die Nacht in deines Herzens Raum,
Und sah die Schlang', die dir am Herzen frisst,
Ich sah, mein Lieb, wie sehr du elend bist.

Ja, du bist elend, und ich grolle nicht:—
Mein Lieb, wir sollen beide elend sein,
Bis uns der Tod das kranke Herze bricht,
Mein Lieb, wir sollen beide elend sein.

Unsichtbar zuckt auch Schmerz um deinen Mund,
Verborgne Thräne trübt des Auges Schein,
Der stolze Busen begt geheime Wund',—
Mein Lieb, wir sollen beide elend sein.

NIETZSCHE: APHOR. 40

"Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft"

SOLDATEN und Führer haben immer noch ein viel höheres Verhalten zu einander als Arbeiter und Arbeitgeber. Einstweilen wenigstens steht alle militärisch begründete Kultur noch hoch über aller sogenannten industriellen Kultur: letztere in ihrer jetzigen Gestalt ist überhaupt die gemeinste Daseinsform, die es bisher gegeben hat. Hier wirkt einfach das Gesetz der Not: man will leben und muss sich verkaufen, aber man verachtet den, der diese Not ausnützt und sich den Arbeiter kauft. Es ist seltsam, dass die Unterwerfung unter mächtige, furchterregende, ja schreckliche Personen, unter Tyrannen und Heerführer, bei weitem nicht so peinlich empfunden wird als diese Unterwerfung unter bekannte und uninteressante Personen, wie es alle Grössen der Industrie sind: in dem Arbeitgeber sieht der Arbeiter gewöhnlich nur einen listigen, ausaugenden, auf alle Not spekulierenden Hund von Menschen, dessen Name, Gestalt, Sitte und Ruf ihm ganz gleichgültig sind. Den Fabrikanten und Gross-Unternehmern des Handels fehlten bisher wahrscheinlich allzusehr alle jene Formen und Abzeichen der höheren Rasse, welche erst die Personen interessant werden lassen; hätten sie die Vornehmheit des Geburts-Adels im Blick und in der Gebärde, so gäbe es vielleicht keinen Sozialismus der Massen. Denn diese sind im Grunde bereit zur Skeaverei jeder Art, vorausgesetzt, dass der Höhere über ihnen sich beständig als höher, als zum Befehlen geboren legitimiert—durch die vornehme Form! Der gemeinste Mann fühlt, dass die Vornehmheit nicht zu improvisieren ist, und dass er in ihr die Frucht langer Zeiten zu ehren hat,—aber die Abwesenheit der höheren Form und die berüchtigte Fabrikanten-Vulgarität mit roten, feisten Händen bringen ihn auf den Gedanken, dass nur Zufall und Glück hier den Einen über den Anderen erhoben habe: wohlan, so schliesst er bei sich, versuchen wir einmal den Zufall und das Glück! Werfen wir einmal die Würfel!—und der Sozialismus beginnt.

ICH GROLLE NICHT

From Heine

I BEAR no grudge, though shattered is my heart,
O love for ever lost, no grudge I bear;
Even though thou shin'st in diamond splendour bright,
No ray of joy lights up thy heart's dark night.

I've known it long. I saw in dreaming sleep
Thy soul o'ercome with darkening sorrow deep,
And saw the serpent gnawing at thy heart,
I saw, my love, how steeped in pain thou art.

Yea, thou art wretched, and I hate thee not:
Beloved, misery must be our fate!
Till death brings to a close our sorrowing lot,
My loved one, misery must be our fate.

Around thy mouth quivers an unseen pain,
A hidden tear bedims thine eye's bright light;
Thy proud breast cherishes a secret wound;
Love, thou must share the darkness of my night.

S. F. BUTCHART.

NIETZSCHE: APHOR. 40

"The Joyful Wisdom"

SOLDIERS and their leaders have always a much higher mode of comportment toward one another than workmen and their employers. At present at least all militarily established civilisation still stands high above all so-called industrial civilisation; the latter, in its present form, is in general the meanest mode of existence that has ever been. It is simply the law of necessity that operates here: people want to live, and have to sell themselves; but they despise him who exploits their necessity, and purchases the workman. It is curious that the subjection to powerful, fear-inspiring, and even dreadful individuals, to tyrants and leaders of armies, is not at all felt so painfully as the subjection to such undistinguished and uninteresting persons as the captains of industry; in the employer the workman usually sees merely a crafty, blood-sucking dog of a man, speculating on every necessity, whose name, form, character, and reputation are altogether indifferent to him. It is probable that the manufacturers and great magnates of commerce have hitherto lacked too much all those forms and attributes of a superior race which alone make persons interesting; if they had had the nobility of the nobly born in their looks and bearing, there would perhaps have been no socialism in the masses of the people. For these are really ready for slavery of every kind, provided that the superior class above them constantly shows itself legitimately superior, and born to command—by its noble presence! The commonest man feels that nobility is not to be improvised, and that it is his part to honour it as the fruit of protracted race-culture; but the absence of superior presence, and the notorious vulgarity of manufacturers, with red, fat hands, brings up the thought to him that it is only chance and fortune that has here elevated the one above the other; well, then—so he reasons with himself—let us in our turn tempt chance and fortune! Let us in our turn throw the dice—and socialism commences.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

FANNY BURNEY'S "EVELINA" * * * BY ANNA BRANSON

I.

IN the London Chronicle for January 27-9, 1778, Mr. Thomas Lowndes, of 77, Fleet Street, advertised as on sale at his place of business "Evelina: or, A Young Lady's Entrance into the World," in three volumes, 12mo, price 7s. 6d. sewed, and 9s. bound. There was no author's name printed on the title-page, and soon all literary London was agog with curiosity. Who could have written it? Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, Sterne, and Goldsmith were dead; Walpole's "Castle of Otranto" and Johnson's "Rasselas" were as far removed from "Evelina" as "Evelina" from the "Plot, and elopement, passion, rape, and rapture" with which the circulating libraries had perverted public taste. Burke sat up all night to finish it; Sir Joshua Reynolds could not paint for interest in Evelina's career, and said he would give fifty pounds to know the name of the author (Mr. Lowndes had paid only twenty for the copyright!); and Dr. Johnson, in the pride of his dictatorship, declared that there were passages in it which might do honour to Richardson, and that it was better than Fielding. When Fanny Burney, who had created Evelina in her own image, read this verdict in the garden at Chesington, she exultantly "danced a jig to Mr. Crisp, without any preparation, music, or explanation,—to his no small amazement, and diversion." So she told Sir Walter Scott forty-eight years afterwards.

II.

Few readers, save those with a decided flair for literary origins, now read Richardson and Fielding with keen interest; but the charm of "Evelina" is almost as potent as in the days when it was first published, because, as Mrs. Thrale said, "There's human life in 'Evelina.' It's writ by some one that knows the top and the bottom, the highest and the lowest of mankind." Dr. Johnson called Miss Burney a little character-monger, and the epithet describes her genius wonderfully. In delineating the foibles of her creations she used description sparingly; she let them speak for themselves. It has been objected that they always speak in character; that Mr. Villars is always saying, "God bless you, my child," Mr. Smith always deferring smugly to the ladies, Mme. Duval eternally vulgar, Lord Orville usually too good to be true. It was this very accenting of salient characteristics in conversation that led Sheridan to beg her for a comedy, which he promised to accept and present, "unsight, unseen, and make her a bow and my best thanks into the bargain."

III.

Most readers of "Evelina" will agree with Dr. Johnson that Mr. Smith, whom American slang would dub "a cheap sport," is the best piece of portraiture in the book; Dr. Johnson went further. "Harry Fielding never drew so good a character," he said to Mrs. Thrale. "Such a fine varnish of low politeness!—such a struggle to appear a gentleman! Madam, there is no character better drawn anywhere—in any book, or by any author!"

It was Mr. Smith who Polly Branghton assured Evelina was "quite like one of the quality, and dresses as fine, and goes to balls and dances, and everything quite in taste." It was Mr. Smith who, when the Miss

Branghtons borrowed his room over their father's shop for a tea-party, said to Evelina:

"Why, Ma'am, the truth is, Miss Bidy and Miss Polly take no care of anything, else, I'm sure, they should always be welcome to my room; for I am never so happy as in obliging the ladies,—that's my character, Ma'am; but really, the last time they had it, everything was made so greasy and so nasty, that, upon my word, to a man who wishes to have things a little genteel, it was quite cruel.

"Now as to you, Ma'am, it's quite another thing; for I should not mind if everything I had was spoilt, for the sake of having the pleasure to oblige you; and I assure you, Ma'am, it makes me quite happy, that I have a room good enough to receive you."

IV.

There are the hopeless family bickerings of the Branghtons, Evelina's vulgar cousins, done to the very life.

"Don't you think, Miss, it's very dull sitting upstairs here? we'd better go down to shop, and then we shall see the people go by."

"Lord, Poll," said the brother, "you're always wanting to be staring and gaping; and I'm sure you needn't be so fond of showing yourself, for you're ugly enough to frighten a horse."

"Ugly, indeed! I wonder which is best, you or me. But, I tell you what, Tom, you've no need to give yourself such airs, for if you do, I'll tell Miss of you know what——"

"Indeed," cried I, "I do not desire to hear any secrets."

"Oh, but I'm resolved I'll tell you, because Tom's so very spiteful. You must know, Miss, 't'other night——"

"Poll," cried the brother, "if you tell of that, Miss shall know all about your meeting young Brown—you know when!—So I'll be quits with you, one way or another."

V.

No less true to the life of the day and to exasperated human nature of all days is the conversation in Mrs. Beaumont's drawing-room at Bristol Hot Wells. Lady Louisa Larpent, a languishing, lackadaisical creature, addresses Lord Merton.

"I a'n't half well; it's quite horrid to have such weak nerves. . . . I'm a sad weak creature,—don't you think I am, My Lord?"

"O by no means," answered he; "your Ladyship is merely delicate,—and devil take me if ever I had the least passion for an Amazon!"

"I have the honour to be quite of your Lordship's opinion," said Mr. Lovel, looking maliciously at Mrs. Selwyn, "for I have an insuperable aversion to strength, either of body or mind, in a female."

"Faith, and so have I," said Mr. Coverley; "for egad, I'd as soon see woman chop wood as hear her chop logic."

"So would every man in his senses," said Lord Merton; "for a woman wants nothing to recommend her but beauty and good nature; in everything else she is either impertinent or unnatural. For my part, deuce take me if I ever want to hear a word of sense from a woman as long as I live!"

"It has always been agreed," said Mrs. Selwyn,

FOOT'S

ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

PLAYER'S

Navy Mixture

Out of the sweetest and ripest leaves of the tobacco plant "pipe perfect" Player's Navy Mixture is made.

Player's Navy Mixture is everything that a tobacco can be.

It is cool and even burning, with a bouquet as distinct and delicate as that of some rare vintage wine.

Then fill your pipe with this best of Mixtures and know all the joy that a perfect tobacco can bring.

IN THREE STRENGTHS:

Mild 5^{D.} per oz. Medium 5^{D.} per oz.

White Label 4¹/₂ ^{D.} per oz.

looking round her with the utmost contempt, "that no man ought to be connected with a woman whose understanding is superior to his own. Now I very much fear, that to accommodate all this good company, according to such a rule, would be utterly impracticable, unless we should choose subjects from Swift's hospital of idiots."

VI.

Least plausible of all the characters in the book is Captain Mirvan, of the Royal Navy. His profanity, Evelina declares, is more than she can transcribe; his horseplay and rudeness are more than her readers can believe. Various naval officers whom Miss Burney met at Bath in the year following "Evelina's" success complained that she had been unjust to their profession, but she defended herself stoutly. "The more I see of sea-captains," she wrote, "the less reason I have to be ashamed of Captain Mirvan; for they have all so irresistible a propensity to wanton mischief,—to roasting beaux, and detesting old women, that I quite rejoice I showed the book to no one ere printed, lest I should have been prevailed upon to soften his character."

The heroics of Sir John Belmont, when he at last is brought face to face with his neglected daughter, are much overdone to our modern taste. From his "Lift up thy head,—if my sight has not blasted thee,—lift up thy head, thou image of my long-lost Caroline!" he goes in a crescendo of remorse to "Adieu, my child;—be not angry,—I cannot stay with thee,—oh Evelina! thy countenance is a dagger to my heart!" and he leaves the reader a little ashamed of having witnessed such an unrestrained exhibition of stagey distress.

VII.

"Evelina" ends, of course, in the happy-ever-after style flattered by countless imitators. It is truly a relief, after Lord Orville has tactlessly turned up on every one of the numerous occasions when Evelina is surrounded by the noisy Branghtons, or just escaping from Sir Clement Willoughby's arms, or going to a rendezvous with the melancholy Scot, Mr. Macartney, to have him finally fall on his knees, and in due course of time receive the joint blessings of Mr. Villars, Sir John Belmont, and Mrs. Selwyn.

"To draw characters from nature, though not from life, and to mark the manners of the times, is the attempted plan of the following letters," Fanny Burney wrote in the preface to "Evelina." The continuing appeal of this her first novel is proof that she succeeded in her attempt. More than that, she made the novel respectable, after it had deteriorated from its promising beginnings into filth and folly unspeakable; and by virtue of her sex and her success, she vanquished the silly convention that it was "unbecoming a female" (how the eighteenth century loved that word!) to write novels, so making the path smooth for Maria Edgeworth, Jane Austen, Charlotte Brontë, and the many other women who have been mighty with the pen.

Competition on the Life and Work of the Woman Teacher

Owing to the very large response to our suggestion for this competition we have not yet been able to publish the result. An unusually large number of excellent papers have been received, and the process of selection has taken longer than anticipated. We hope, however, to publish the result before the end of the month.

FOREST MUSIC

By J. W. MARRIOTT

THE subdued light of a forest at mid-day reminds one of a cathedral—a great green cathedral with Gothic arches and fantastic tracery; but in the hour before dusk these associations with sacred architecture are more impressive still, and one has an impulse to doff the hat or to speak in whispers. The spilt sunlight lies in great splashes on the mossy floors; the tree-trunks become pillars of wrought gold; the sunset glows in crimson and orange through the foliage, producing the effect of stained-glass windows. Above all there is a pervading sense that the whole temple is thrillingly alive and breathing a hallowed joy. Every leaf is listening, every rafter is conscious and expectant, every column is dumb with sentient awe. The trees of the field may clap their hands; but the forest is no place for applause. It is a sanctuary for reverence and revelation and a cloistered calm.

The very music of the forest is cathedral music. We do not mean the birds' songs. Every phase of Nature has its distinctive music. Spring is a Serenade and Autumn a Nocturne; the morning light is a Sonata, tranquil and changeful; there are Pastorales in the rich meadow grass, and Barcarolles in the river's placid motion towards the sea. Every bank of flowers is a fairy chorus and every silver birch an Ariel-song. An avenue of chestnuts is a Galop. . . . In the infinite orchestra of Nature we may hear gay Gavottes, Intermezzos, Fantasias, the whole blending in one gigantic Fugue, whose diapason is the thunder of the seas. There is music everywhere—lyric, idyllic, epic—entering the gates of sight as well as of sound. For do not painters speak of their "harmonies"? Were not Turner's visions aptly described as "colour-symphonies"? Has not Whistler painted nocturnes in silver and grey? An ingenious musician has recently attempted to interpret his themes in colour; why should we not transpose natural colours into music? The mystic does it incessantly and inevitably, while an experience from "The Dream of Gerontius" is more remarkable still:—

"I cannot of that music rightly say Whether I hear, or touch, or taste the tones."

And why not "see" them too? But the reverse is equally possible, and one perceives a burst of light like a burst of song. A pear-tree bursts into blossom as a lark bursts into rapturous carolling at dawn. A garden breaks into flowers as a nation breaks into hurrahs of victory. For him who converts sight into music, the mountains and hills break forth into singing; and there is a great poetic image of the mountains dancing like rams and the little hills skipping like lambs.

The sun becomes prodigal in autumn, and goes into a far country to spend his substance; but he returns in spring, and the land is filled with music and dancing. . . .

But the forest music suggests the organ and a sacred choir. Its joy is holy; its anthem swells and rolls like a tide along its aisles; it inspires peace and benediction. That is why every tree is harkening so tensely: and he that hath ears to hear will understand.

£40,000

has been the cost of the beautiful set of Eight large handsome Volumes, bound in half-French Morocco leather, elaborately gilded, consisting of—

THE LIVING RACES OF MANKIND.
THE LIVING ANIMALS OF THE WORLD.
THE WONDERS OF THE WORLD.
MARVELS OF THE UNIVERSE.

THE PICK OF THE WORLD

from your Arm Chair for 2/6 down

Nearly 5,000 Large Beautiful Illustrations are included in the Works, which are printed throughout on the finest English Art Paper, and 142 Magnificent Coloured Plates.

The Text is written by the World's pre-eminent Specialists, and comprises over a million words.

FREE { 4 SPECIMEN COLOURED PLATES.
4 BEAUTIFUL ART BOOKLETS.

The Unlucky Scarab at work.

As a special offer to readers of "EVERYMAN" we will, for one week only, send Four Fine Coloured Plates and Four Beautiful Art Booklets free, showing how you can possess these Works for only 2/6 down.

To THE STANDARD ART BOOK CO., Ltd.,
33, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

Please send me, post free, the Four Beautiful Coloured Plates and Art Booklets as advertised.

Name.....

Address.....

UNCLE LÉCHAUDEL * * * BY ANDRÉ THEURIET

I.

"What!" said my friend Jacques, "haven't I ever told you of my uncle Léchaudel's adventure? It's worth its weight in gold, seeing that it cost me a legacy of two hundred thousand francs.

"My uncle Mélasippe Léchaudel, of Rupt-aux-Nonnains, in Lorraine, set up as a druggist in Juvigny-en-Barrois. At fifty, having made his fortune, he sold his business and retired to a comfortable house, in the upper part of the town, with a courtyard in front tapestried with aristolochia and a good fruit garden behind, where he lived at his ease with his housekeeper Catherine. My uncle was a perfect type of the successful country tradesman, equally stingy and conceited, stuck-up, self-satisfied, and solemn. On the pretext that he had sold medicinal herbs for twenty years, he boasted himself an expert in botany and got himself elected a member of the Juvigny Scientific Society, before which he read thrilling papers on such subjects as the firebacks of the old houses of Barrois; his colleagues in return used sometimes to send him as a delegate to the annual meeting of learned societies at the Sorbonne, and this gave him the chance of a cheap ticket to Paris and me the pleasure of his visit. As I was generally understood to be his heir, I felt bound to look after him, and of course gave him board and lodging for the fortnight of his stay.

"These visits were not exactly a joy. Mélasippe Léchaudel tyrannically abused his position as an uncle with a will to make. No sooner had he got his boots off and washed his hands than he took possession of my favourite armchair, borrowed my slippers, drank my best cognac, unbuttoned his waistcoat, and said with a sigh of content:

"Ah, that makes me feel better. . . . Now then, Jacques, I'm going to read you my last communication on a sixteenth century fireback discovered in the old château of Tronville. . . ."

"And there I had to sit mum and listen to a minute disquisition on the thickness of the fireback, the quality of the iron, the name of the founder, and the date when it was cast.

"But this was nothing to the fatigue-duty of taking him walks along the streets. Though he had seen Paris but four times in twenty years, Uncle Léchaudel flattered himself that he knew everything by instinct and could explain everything. His addled brain was stuffed full of crazy notions. With the countryman's hostile contempt for the capital, my egregious uncle combined the firm conviction that no one could possibly take him for a provincial. He was determined to pass for a thorough Parisian, and when he went out by himself he would rather have cut out his tongue than ask his way. On the other hand, the indifference of the people he met in the street was unendurable; he considered it almost an insult, as if it were intended for a personal slight to his position and his title as the delegate of the Scientific Society. Accordingly, when he went for a walk, his affectation was to speak very loud, so as to attract the passers' attention. People turned round for a moment to look at the pompous gesticulation of this tall, gaunt person who wore a country doctor's hat and a long overcoat made in the style of twenty years ago; and then, with an understanding smile, they went on their way. As for him nothing could ever disconcert him, and he away. He disparaged whatever he saw with the malicious humour characteristic of the small townsman, and his universal standard of comparison was the use and custom of his own obscure nook. Raising his voice at every step he would exclaim sententiously in the drawling whine of the Lorrainer, 'At Juvigny we should not permit such things! . . . The Juvigny authorities know their duty better than that. . . . At Juvigny the level of public morality is higher.' I only waited for the moment when he would declare that the sun at Juvigny rose earlier than in Paris, and I wished the devil would fly away with this lunatic uncle whom I was compelled to pilot along the boulevards.

II.

"The last time I had the pleasure of seeing him was the year of the Universal Exhibition, 1889. It was in June that he quartered himself on me, still in the same old broad-brimmed hat and magisterial overcoat.

"'You perceive,' said he, with a contemptuous sneer playing about the corners of his mouth, 'that I, too, have become one of the gaping sheep of Panurge, and, taking advantage of an excursion train, I have come up for a look at this great international fair which you people call the Universal Exhibition. I knew before I started that I shouldn't find anything new, nor anything up to my intellectual level, but it gives me the pleasure of a fortnight of your company.'

"It was a pleasure I could have done without; but I tried to look as happy as I could, and I conscientiously set to work to fulfil my duties of hospitality. For a whole week I trotted my uncle round the Champ de Mars and the Esplanade des Invalides. Rain or shine, there we were every afternoon. I did the honours of the Centennial Exhibition, of the Street in Cairo, of the Machinery Department, and of the Japanese Village. He was never tired and never surprised; every single thing he saw was rubbish, and he was eternally finding fault. At the Eiffel Tower he merely grumbled, 'Well, I thought it was higher than that.' He complained that the illuminated fountains did not go on playing long enough; he called them a 'fair do,' and was disposed to blame me for it. No eating-house, neither grill-room nor Roman restaurant, could please him. But he allowed me to foot the bill, and contented himself with adding up the items and explaining that at Juvigny we could have got the same fare for half the money. After which he carefully folded up the receipt and stowed it away in his sheepskin pocket-book, probably to dazzle his colleagues of the Scientific Society with the details of his Parisian extravagances.

"By the end of the week I was knocked up. To get a respite I invented an engagement to dinner and made my excuses for leaving him to himself for one evening.

"'Don't let that trouble you,' he answered. 'I don't at all mind for once being on my own and poking round where I please. I'm big enough to take care of myself; I know Paris as well as I know my own pocket, and after looking at the museums and churches, I'll dine in style at a restaurant.'

"We parted at the corner of the embankment, and I was much relieved to see his country doctor's hat and long overcoat dwindling in the distance. The sky was threatening, but off I went to dine by myself at Bellevue, and though it came on to drizzle I found the country lovely, such a joy was it to have my ears free at last from the pompous snuffle and the irritating snarls of the ex-druggist-shopkeeper.

"I came home at eleven, to find Mélasippe Léchaudel already sound asleep. I took very good care not to waken him, and retired peacefully to my bed.

"Next day, however, I felt some remorse at having deserted my uncle, and knocked at his door. I found him in his shirt-sleeves carefully brushing his overcoat, with a clouded face, and looking thoroughly sulky and cross.

"'Well, uncle,' said I cheerfully, 'what sort of an evening did you have?'

"His answer was somewhat evasive: 'Oh, like any other evening in Paris . . . pretty so-so.'

"But the frown on his forehead remained there, and no smile came to those sulky lips of his. I scented some vexatious mischance.

"'You had a good dinner at any rate?'

"'A good dinner!' he cried furiously. 'No, confound it! I was robbed by bandits. Ah, and it's all your fault, too; why couldn't you be at the pains to send me to at least a moderately honest robber?'

"Hereupon, by insidious questionings, I succeeded in inducing his mortified vanity to reveal his misadventure.

"After he left me he went to the Louvre, and when the galleries closed at five he betook himself to Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois and Saint-Roch, both of them places where you don't have to pay. Coming out of the second church he found it was raining, and being a man careful of 'his duds' he took refuge in the arcades of the Palais Royal, where he proposed to dine. In the days when he used to buy his drugs in the Rue des Lombards, his wholesale merchant had taken him to Tavernier's, and he had a clear recollection of this restaurant, where, for 2 fr. 50 c., they offered you your choice of three dishes, besides soup, dessert, and a half-bottle of wine. So towards six o'clock, feeling hungry, he set out to find the restaurant of his youth; but he hunted the arcades in vain; Tavernier had vanished. He told himself that possibly his memory deceived him, and, with his silly conceit of never asking information, he ventured to cross the thoroughfare and continued his researches along the Rue Vivienne. But no restaurant at fixed prices could he see there. It was raining; his coat and hat were getting wet; he hastened his steps, thinking to explore the Rue Richelieu, got lost, and finally emerged on the boulevard, fairly knocked up and in a violent perspiration, cursing the rain and still on the look-out for a cheap dinner. He saw plenty of cafés with brightly lit windows, but he shrank from them as from fire, having been told that that was where you got skinned. However, the evening was drawing in, the rain wouldn't stop, his tummy cried 'famine,' his legs were tottering, and, to crown all, the prospect of spoiling coat and hat wrung his heart. At this moment, through the plate-glass front of a grand café, all lit up, he saw tables laid and comfortable chairs, while a delicious odour of cookery assailed his nostrils. Confused and exhausted, he pushed the door open, entered like a desperate man, and found himself in the Café Riche.

III.

"The instant he had taken his seat waiters hurried to serve him. A majestic head waiter offered him the carte. 'Would monsieur prefer a bisque soup or consommé à la reine? For an entrée, if I may advise, I should say Venetian sole. . . .'

"'Right you are,' stuttered Léchaudel, overpowered. 'Trot out your consommé and your sole.'

"The wine waiter came to his rescue, insinuating, 'Which is monsieur's wine? A Burgundy or Bordeaux?'

"'Burgundy,' was the impatient answer.

"'Fleury? Chambertin? Corton?' went on the other.

"'Oh, anything you like.'

"When he had done justice to the soup and the sole and tossed off a glass of wine his brain grew clearer; he recovered his wits, and therewith his prudent economy. He looked round him, studying the luxurious surroundings, the well-to-do appearance of the guests, the smartness of the waiters, and he comprehended that he certainly was not in a restaurant at fixed prices. Anxiety spoilt his appetite, and he trembled for his purse.

"'Ah, but,' he went on with angry pride, 'I had taken good care to keep the carte, and when that daddylonglegs of a waiter returned to the charge I shut him up by asking for the dessert. He brought me a basket of strawberries, which I was almost too worried to touch, I was in such a stew to get out of that den; and then I asked for the bill. Guess what it ran into? Twenty-seven francs, nephew mine. The wine alone was charged eight francs. . . . Simple robbery. . . . I went out testifying aloud. It was pouring outside, and I had to take a cab. There you are! That's my evening out!' And he added bitterly, 'It's your negligence I have to thank for my misfortunes.'

"I saw plainly that what was hurting him was his twenty-seven-franc dinner, and set my wits to work to pacify him. 'I am so very sorry about it, uncle; but to-night we'll make amends. I'll take you to dine at an English tavern. . . .'

"'Never again,' he shouted. 'No more robbery for me, thank you! My trunk is packed and I'm off to Juvigny. Call me a cab!'

"And for all my entreaties off to Juvigny he went. I never saw him again. He died the year after, carried off by a fever epidemic. I went to pay him the last offices at Juvigny, and was present when the will was read. Not a stiver for me, dear boy! Uncle Léchaudel had a grudge against me for that Café Riche dinner, and he left every penny to his housekeeper."—Translated by R. B. Townshend.

THE TEN MOST POPULAR ARTICLES IN "EVERYMAN"

WE propose opening a Referendum upon the ten most popular articles which have appeared in the first twenty-six numbers of EVERYMAN. Readers are invited to send in a list of the ten articles which have been of the greatest interest to them, placing them in what they regard as their order of merit, and we offer two prizes of £2 and £1 respectively for the two lists corresponding most closely to the ten articles receiving the largest number of votes from our readers. Lists, marked "EVERYMAN Referendum," should reach the Competition Editor, 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh, by July 1st.

Vol. I. of EVERYMAN, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d., carriage paid 4s., will be forwarded on application to the EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C. Cases for binding can also be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 8d.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

INDUSTRIAL SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article on "Industrial Scientific Management" by Joseph Fels in your May 30th issue of EVERYMAN states a case against this system which is open to some criticism, so may I offer the following points for your consideration?

The system, properly carried out, means a reduced cost of production and a correspondingly increased profit. There is no getting away from the fact that this condition of affairs will lead to more extensive advertising on the part of the manufacturer, resulting in keener competition and larger selling staffs, also reduced selling prices.

When machinery was first introduced into the manufacture of goods there was a great outcry, but are we any worse off now than we were before? To my mind we are much better placed. To-day most of the things we purchase are "standardised" and turned out by the thousand, with the result that we buy a much cheaper article and are more sure of the quality, etc.

The so-called "reduction" in labour is nothing more or less than a redistribution of labour, and in the present case would mean grading the better-class men into better-class positions. Where it is found possible to reduce the production cost of any article manufactured by a number of firms there is a two-fold redistribution, in both money and men. The first is reduced selling price, resulting in cheaper living, and the second increased "marketing" facilities, resulting in an increased staff. Mr. Fels will doubtless admit that the class of men employed in the selling staff usually commands a higher average wage than the man employed in the works.—I am, sir, etc.,

Hull.

ARTHUR L. BURKE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I be allowed in your columns to enunciate a few corollaries that would ensue upon the adoption of scientific management of industry, and which would possibly modify the results deduced by Mr. Joseph Fels as following upon the introduction of the same in your issue of May 30th?

As an inevitable consequent to the production of the commodities of life with minimum effort would be the transvaluation of the social raison d'être of man; the employer's view, under the new system, would remain the same, viz., that his employee is simply a wealth-producer. On the other hand, the employee's view of himself as a wealth-producer would lose its force, as wealth is produced more easily for, but little weight is paid to, a thing that is easily obtained. Man's views would be shunted off from things of the body to those of the mind and soul. This change, in its turn, would react upon the relative values of "waiters, servants, chauffeurs, butlers," etc., in the social machine.

Further, would not industrial scientific management herald the adoption of universal co-partnership? If wealth is to be produced more easily, for whom has it to be so? For the few or for the many? Common sense or moral right will decide.

Industrial scientific management is an economic idea, but the latter may draw in its train ideas that are not economic in their nature, so closely is our present economic system woven into the warp and woof of all our life.

May I thank Mr. Joseph Fels for an article that stimulates thought?—I am, sir, etc.,

J. LISTER HENDERSON, B.A.

West Hartlepool, June 8th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Joseph Fels, in his recent article under the above title, has apparently neglected the fact that real wealth is the result of useful production, coupled with natural resources, the distribution of money only affecting real wealth in so much as it affects useful production. Mr. Fels is, no doubt, perfectly right in laying down the principle that the physical, material, and moral health of a nation is dependent upon a just distribution of its wealth, but the way to arrive at the just distribution is not necessarily by making three men continue to do work which may be done equally well by one.

If, by the adoption of a more scientific method, one man can be made to do, without increased exertion, the work of, say, three, then the remaining two are free to turn their hands to useful production of some other kind.

It is easier to theorise or to apply any principle in a simple case than it is to apply the same principle under the complex economic and social conditions of the present day, and any sudden development or application of a new method may cause a temporary disorganisation, with resulting hardships to a great many. A man trained as a specialist naturally finds a difficulty in taking up any other occupation, but man is a brainy animal, and has constantly adapted himself to altered conditions.

Even at the present time practically the whole civilised world is calling out for a further development of the areas of food supply.

From the above remarks one might draw the conclusion that scientific methods and machinery can, in the long run, produce nothing but good; but, apart from temporary disorganisation, there is the evil which Mr. Fels mentions, viz., the increased inequality in the distribution of money.

This is a real evil to the community from another point of view besides that which Mr. Fels takes, since, though the capitalist may or may not work himself, his money enables him to employ, directly and indirectly, numbers of men who are, as a result, working idle, and are contributing nothing of actual value to the community.

There is another cause, however, of retardation of production, probably much greater than the wrongly spent money of the rich; that is, the disinclination frequent amongst workers of all classes, especially among organised workers, to give the best that is in them.

That this should be so is but natural, especially with the present feeling of antagonism between labour and capital, since the benefit appears to go to the employer, and the worker does not realise that he is under any obligation to the State.

The only sound method of procedure by which to treat both the cases of the employer and the worker so as to obtain a lasting remedy is the intellectual and moral development of the whole race from top to bottom, which would make Socialism possible—and unnecessary.

To return to the original point. If Mr. Fels's ideas on saving of labour had been applied a hundred or two years ago we might have been practically without machinery to-day.

In any case, in an enlightened community the tendency is to further, not to retard, the development of scientific methods; and, when all is said and done, Mr. Taylor's industrial scientific management will probably not produce results by any means as startling as he anticipates.—I am, sir, etc.,

Ballykilbeg, Co. Down. WILLIAM JOHNSTON.

THE NEW EMIGRATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Does not Mr. Chiozza Money in his forecast of the future leave out one most important factor, viz., the continually increasing displacement of human labour by machinery? So far from there being too few workers to carry on our industrial activities, the truth is that every year labour is being discarded in a hundred trades. If the supply is falling, the demand is falling still more. Are unemployed men with half-starved families a source of strength to the nation? If anyone thinks so, let him consider the state of things, say, in West Ham to-day. Bad as unemployment in such areas is, it would be much worse if there were no emigration. But, says Mr. Money, national organisation can enlarge our industries. Obviously, it can, but not all in a moment. The process is very slow. The presence of unemployment shows this, and for some of the evil of unemployment emigration offers a quick and effective remedy. Better that some of our workers should go to new Englands across the sea than that they should perish in the old, which, for the time being, has no use for them.—I am, sir, etc.,

Poplar, E., June 9th, 1913. W. G. MARTLEY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Money's articles on "The New Emigration" are opportune, and do not exaggerate the danger. The loss of so many wealth-producers and the prospective burden of the less fit and the old-age pensioners are not the only evils.

With the decrease of our wealth-producers there is an increase of non-producers in Government and other officials, whose work, however necessary, does not produce wealth, while it further burdens the over-taxed producers who remain.

Mr. Money thinks the emigration due to the Canadian Government's advertising of cheap land, and this might be neutralised by beautifying our homes and making life here more attractive.

There is, no doubt, something in this, but not enough either to explain the cause or to effect the cure of "The New Emigration."

The cause of emigration and of the social disaffection generally will, I think, be found in our violation of the primary laws of communal life.

PROTECTION AND CULTIVATION.

It is the lack of security to guarantee possession that prevents primitive man from cultivating to produce capital. Until a community of protection is formed on some contract or covenant basis, men do not labour, and so do not progress.

As I read the Book of Genesis, Adam was not the first man, but the first working man. He began to work only after he had entered a protected garden provided for the purpose of labour.

Observation and necessity alike prove protection to be the absolute condition of human labour, just as labour is proved to be the absolute condition of social

THE WORKS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON

IN three volumes, two of Poetry and one of Prose, edited, with notes, by his Literary Executor. In this definite edition of Thompson's work about one-fourth of the Poetry, and almost all the Prose, is new to book form. With three portraits in photogravure. Demy 8vo, special Buckram gilt, bevelled boards. The volumes are obtainable singly or in sets.

Now ready. 6s. net each.

"Such poems as 'The Anthem of Earth,' with its superb close, 'The Hound of Heaven,' and 'New Year's Chimes,' are not only great things in themselves, but are full of that incommensurable quality that marks the highest. Some have disparaged Thompson as the poet of a circle; others have thought of him as a 'religious poet,' meaning something between a poet proper and a hymnwriter. Whereas he was altogether of the wider company, having his place in the highway of the poets, with a fame that will increase when many more notable names have diminished in glory. . . . In his essay on 'Shakespeare's Prose' he says that 'It might almost be erected into a rule that a great poet is, if he please, also a master of prose'; and the saying is true of himself."—The Times.

"He is most often compared with Crashaw, Herbert and others of their group. But if he is of the school of Donne, he is also of the school of Shakespeare; he is the disciple of Milton, the familiar of Pope and Dryden, in sympathy with the Lake poets, a companion spirit with Shelley and Keats. Withal, Thompson has the original authentic note of the great singer. . . . In these books we have, then, the publication of a great poet's life-work."—Daily Telegraph.

THE POETRY OF ALICE MEYNELL

IN one volume, containing "Poems," "Later Poems," and an important section of new work (one-fourth of the whole). With a portrait in photogravure, after John S. Sargent, R.A. Imperial 8vo, Buckram, 5s. net. Third Impression.

BURNS & OATES Ltd · 28 ORCHARD ST · W and civilised life. In the early stages of communal life, as J. S. Mill has observed, labour is divided into two classes—the one productive, the other protective—and this division should obtain during the whole course of civil life.

From the beginning producing workers have provided not only for the protective workers, but for those who are either too young or too old to provide for themselves; and they are still the universal providers, but we no longer protect them.

Britain has for sixty-five years denied her wealth-producers their contract protection, but during that period she has compelled them to do labour that only protected men have any right to do.

Instead of the protecting care given to their productive workers by other civilised people, the British workers receive only cruel neglect. "Protect labour" is the law of civilisation, but "Neglect labour" is the law of Great Britain. Although this policy of neglect is primitive, being identical with the methods of savage men, it is dignified with such titles as "Scientific Political Economy" and "Laissez Faire."

A gardener lazy enough to adopt the free trade policy of laissez faire would see his finest blooms degenerate back to the weeds from which they were cultivated, and his grapes become wild grapes.

Were the State to abolish family protection, and in its place establish laissez faire, an immoral trade would soon become prosperous and profitable. Some might attempt to justify by certain phrases used in justification of free trade in imports.

Is the abolition of trade protection moral? Certainly not. It outrages the contract of mutual protection on which civil society is founded.

If Britain wishes to prevent emigration, let her do as other nations have done, suppress the aboriginal system of laissez faire and establish again the covenant of protection.—I am, sir, etc.,

R. GUNN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It does not seem to occur to Mr. Chiozza Money that the fall in the death-rate is due entirely to the fall in the birth-rate. The vital statistics of all civilised nations show that where the birth-rate falls the death-rate also falls, and what matters to a nation is not the birth-rate, but the survival-rate. The only four countries (Bulgaria, Ceylon, Japan, and Ontario) which show a rise in the birth-rate show a corresponding rise in the death-rate. To put the fall in the death-rate down to sanitation, medical science and progress generally shows a complete misapprehension of the facts—first, because before 1876, after which the birth-rate began to fall, there were very great improvements in sanitation, etc., but the death-rate did not fall; and, second, in the four countries, with rising birth-rates, sanitation has, at least, not gone back, yet the death-rate has also risen. The problem is really a biological one. Man shares with all other animals the tendency to reproduce more rapidly than the food supply, and all his wonderful inventions have never enabled him to make the food supply catch up the increase in the population, except occasionally for short periods. The development of agricultural machinery, the opening up of new countries, the breaking up of fresh land, all take time, and during that time population grows just as fast as the food supply. That it never grows faster is self-evident—the people who are under-fed simply die off.

The birth-rate may be (and is) more rapid than the increase in the food supply, but the survival-rate must keep within its limits. Mr. Money deplores the emigration-rate, and there are few who would not agree that it is a source of weakness to the Mother-country; but how else does he propose to develop new land to supply the additional food which is essential without a fall in the birth-rate or a rise in the death-rate? The emigration-rate is caused by the growth of the population. Again, how many years does he expect our coal and iron supply to last? Granting, for the sake of argument, that national organisation of land, of transport, and of power might enable the United Kingdom to "easily support more than twice its present population," how soon would it be possible to get such organisation into working order, and what is to be done when the population has doubled? It is easy to say that poverty, overcrowding, and unemployment are due to maldistribution of the national wealth, but it must not be forgotten that the food supply is the first necessity of a people, and that the present system of society has been evolved through the struggle for food. Those who desire a different system must recognise that the first step towards the success of any form of Socialism must be the elimination of the crude struggle for existence, and that this can only take place through the limitation of births. When our death-rate goes down to 10 per 1,000, and our average unemployment rate goes down to something less than that of our best times, it will be time to talk of the benefits of a higher birth-rate.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. ROBERTA REES.

London, S.E.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Chiozza Money very rightly says that "we ought to be able to bring the death-rate down to 10 per 1,000, or less," for 10 per 1,000 is the mortality-rate of a well-fed community, and may, for the present, be considered the normal. As the birth-rate falls, i.e., as parental prudence extends downwards, we are steadily approaching this normal. Indeed, we shall reach it by 1921, unless "the new emigration," which takes away such a large proportion of our effectives and so much capital, is, to some extent, neutralising the good effects of the falling birth-rate. But Mr. Money is alarmed at the thought of the birth-rate going on and on declining and the present rate of emigration continuing. As they will be automatically checked in due season by rising wages and improving conditions generally, his anxiety hardly seems justified.—I am, sir, etc.,

B. DUNLOP, M.B.

Alexandra Court, S.W., June 10th, 1913.

WOMAN IN THE FINANCIAL WORLD.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your issue of May 30th is contained, under the article "Woman in the Financial World," a glaring misstatement to the effect that "there is in the City a lady who is a fully qualified chartered accountant." The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, rightly or wrongly, has not admitted women to its examinations, although proposals to do so have from time to time been made; a search for a woman's name in its register of members would prove fruitless. Perhaps your contributor is thinking of some other of the numerous associations of accountants which of late years have come into existence, and many of which, I believe, receive women as members.—I am, sir, etc.,

REGINALD H. S. COBBITT,

Brockley, S.E.

Chartered Accountant.

OUR HOLIDAY TOURS.

A FORTNIGHT IN TERRITET AND CHAMONIX FOR "EVERYMAN" READERS.

THE four R's of a holiday are Rest, Renewal, Recuperation, and Restoration. The Continental holidays arranged for readers of EVERYMAN accomplish all the R's stand for and more, for we can include two other nouns which are equally important—enjoyment and happiness. Such a combination provides, as far as is possible, an ideal holiday. Doubtless the great success of EVERYMAN tours is largely due to the manner in which we have arranged these holidays. The tours are planned to especially appeal to the particular tastes of EVERYMAN readers, and included in the itineraries of the tours are just such places as we believe will most interest and delight our readers.

Many of those who have sent for particulars of our tours and for our Tours Book have not quite decided whether or no they will avail themselves of EVERYMAN Continental Tours. To these we especially appeal to come to an early decision, because we are particularly anxious that none shall be disappointed. Already some of our most attractive tours have almost their full complement of tourists, and we have set a limit to the number that shall compose each party, because the enjoyment of all largely depends upon the individual attention that our conductors give to every member of each party.

SWITZERLAND.

"Blue, and baseless, and beautiful
Did the boundless mountains bear
Their folded shadows into the golden air."
—RUSKIN.

EVERYMAN Switzerland Tourists leave London on July 12th for a fortnight's personally conducted Tour to TERRITET and CHAMONIX. This ideal fortnight gives a week in the lovely lakeside resort of TERRITET and a week at CHAMONIX, nestling under the glorious Mont Blanc Range.

TERRITET.

This little gem clustering around the Lake of Geneva is justly the pride of the Swiss Riviera. Nothing can surpass it in beauty, with the blue waters of the lake in front and the towering Rochers-de-Naye at the back. Byron, it will be remembered, lived for some time near Montreux, and he ever extolled its beauties; of Territet he said that it was "more beautiful than a dream."

Montreux-Territet is unrivalled as a centre for beautiful walks. The Castle of Chillon, immortalised by Byron, stands picturesquely on the edge of the Lake. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries it was the residence of the Counts of Savoy, and as long ago as 820 the Castle was used as a prison for Wala, the cousin of Charlemagne. Its real claim to notoriety, however, is its association with Bonivard, who was incarcerated here until liberty came with the triumph of the Bernese, when they became masters of the Pays de Vaud in 1536.

CHAMONIX.

Nearest to Mont Blanc, the monarch of the Alps, Chamonix has a charm and fascination above any other of the Alpine villages in the higher altitudes.

From early morning, when the great granite mountain is lighted up by the brilliant rays of the rising sun, in the full blaze of the summer noon, when the eternal snows on the summit of the mountain remain placid and undisturbed, in the evening, when the glow of the twilight suffuses the mountain peaks with a crimson hue, and at night, when the two streets of the village stretch like a cross of light in the darkness of the Valley, Chamonix is a place apart with a fascination peculiarly its own.

Nowhere amongst the Alps is the air crisper or more exhilarating than in Chamonix; to breathe the pure health-giving air is to drink in new life and strength, and the jaded, toil-worn worker quickly recovers his lost vitality and energy. No one feels tired or "out-of-sorts" in Chamonix; the only regret is that one cannot live there always.

The excursions to be enjoyed by EVERYMAN tourists during this delightful holiday include:

TOUR OF THE LAKE AND VISIT TO GENEVA.—This Excursion is the whole length of the beautiful Lake of Geneva, about 40 miles.

EXCURSION TO CHAMPERY.—This is one of the quaintest and most fascinating, as well as one of the most characteristic villages in Switzerland.

EXCURSION TO GRUYERE.—The train ascends the mountains behind Territet to Les Avants, from whence a delightful view of the Lake far below can be obtained.

EXCURSION TO THE ROCHERS-DE-NAYE.—One of the most magnificent views of Switzerland is to be obtained from the summit, including the Bernese Oberland.

VISIT TO VILLARS-SUR-OLLON AND THE CHAMOISSAIRE.—One of the most magnificent Excursions in Western Switzerland.

ASCENT OF LA FLEGERE (6,000 ft.)—The ascent, which is an easy one, takes between four and five hours from leaving and returning to Chamonix.

EXCURSION TO THE GLACIER DES BOSSONS.

EXCURSION TO THE MER DE GLACE.—The finest Excursion in the Valley of Chamonix.

DRIVE TO THE GORGE DE LA DIOSAZ.

Unless immediate application is made, we cannot guarantee a place in this tour, although at the time of going to press there are a few vacancies. Similar tours are arranged for July 18th, August 1st and 15th.

OTHER ARRANGEMENTS.

On various dates during July, August and September EVERYMAN parties leave London for many attractive Continental centres. A fortnight's conducted tour to Rouen and the Valley of the Seine and Paris. A week's conducted tour to Paris. A fortnight's tour to Montreux-Territet. A fortnight's tour to Chamonix and the Mont Blanc Range. A week's conducted tour to Holland and the Zuyder-Zee, etc., etc.

INDEPENDENT TOURS.

Those who prefer to travel independently have the trouble of making arrangements taken entirely off their shoulders, as we provide a carefully planned programme in which all arrangements are made. EVERYMAN will arrange every detail of your holiday beforehand. Times of arrival are notified to the hotel proprietors with whom accommodation has been booked beforehand. Travellers are met at the stations, and, in fact, every item of the itinerary of an enjoyable holiday is made in advance.

THE "EVERYMAN" TOURS BOOK.

All particulars of our Conducted Tours to the Continent, all excursions and prices, as well as particulars of EVERYMAN Independent Tours, are to be found in the Tours Booklet which we have prepared for our readers. It contains also a brief description of the tours, and interesting facts about the many excursions in connection with the tours, as well as many illustrations. As the supply of this booklet is limited, early application is necessary. Address your application to EVERYMAN Tours Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, London, W.C.

"EVERYMAN, I WILL GO WITH THEE AND BE THY GUIDE. IN THY MOST NEED TO GO BY THY SIDE."

The entire change of environment, the freedom from all vexatious details, the one inclusive charge, and the desire of Everyman conductors for the welfare of all tourists combine to make our Holiday Tours not only enjoyable, but unique.

Will readers who contemplate joining one of our Tours kindly come to a decision as early as possible?

We have no wish to hurry anyone, but the numbers of applications already to hand indicate that the parties will be completed much earlier than we anticipated.

Read this Book before you plan your holiday.

It will save you buying new suits.

"Modern Beau Brummels" is a little book we have just published. It tells you how to get better wear out of your clothes—how, for a few shillings, they can be kept looking fresh and smart. The cover of this book is reproduced from a fine water-colour by Will Houghton, and the letterpress is illustrated with clever pen-and-ink sketches by "Thorpe." You really ought to read it—and you only have to send a post-card for a free copy. Among other useful information it explains how we clean and tailor-press a Suit for 3/9 in Four Days, so that it looks as good as new.

Achille Serre Ltd.

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

57

Kill that Germ!

with
Hall's
Distemper

Hall's Distemper is the greatest protection the householder can have from unclean and infectious walls because when first applied it is a thorough disinfectant and germ destroyer.

It is also the most pleasing of wall-coverings, quick, clean, and inexpensive to apply, and quite free from the objectionable smell of paint.

If you strip your walls of the layers of wallpaper and decorate with Hall's Distemper, your rooms will have a purer atmosphere, and you will gain the refreshing effect of a change to a new home.

"How to Decorate Your Home." Write to-day for this beautifully illustrated pamphlet, showing in colours how to artistically decorate every room in the house. Post free from the Sole Manufacturers:—

SISSONS BROTHERS & CO., LIMITED, HULL.

London Office—199a, Borough High Street, S.E.
Liverpool: 65, Mount Pleasant. Glasgow: 113, Bath Street. Reading: 6, Gun Street.

IRISH PROTESTANTS AND HOME RULE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I think the rather extraordinary letter from "An Irish Reader of EVERYMAN," which appears in your issue for June 6th, merits a reply, in order to give your readers an opportunity of hearing the other side.

Your correspondent makes some quotations from Mr. J. M. Hone's article, and, as a result, proceeds to lay down some startling propositions of a general nature.

I beg to join issue with him on these propositions, namely, "Every Irishman, down to the pauper in the workhouse, knows that nine out of every ten educated Irishmen are Unionists"; "The whole force and basis of Home Rule rests on the ignorant and uneducated voters." Where has your "Irish Reader" been for the past few years that he does not know that the Home Rule movement has been supported, and is being supported, by the leading professional and commercial men, both in Dublin and throughout the country—with the exception, perhaps, of Belfast and the North of Ireland, where these classes are mainly Protestant and Trinity College graduates. Perhaps your "Irish Reader" is not aware that it was only a generation or so ago that Catholics were permitted to enter any of the professions in Ireland? If your "Irish Reader" will look at the newspaper reports of various Home Rule demonstrations, he will find the names of leading Catholic professional men given as being present as supporters.

I also deny his assertion that if the uneducated voters were struck off the list, not a single Nationalist member would have a chance of re-election. The present Irish Party comprises three King's Counsel, seven or eight barristers, and as many solicitors. Are all these uneducated and unthinking men who are not in the habit of reading for themselves?

I will give your "Irish Reader" some facts to read over and think out for himself.

Ireland's government costs ten millions, roughly, at the present moment. Up to some years ago, it was only seven millions. If "Irish Reader" compares these figures with the figures giving the cost of government of countries like Belgium and Holland, he will learn something. If he compares the figures given as the total cost of government of Norway and Sweden during the time that these countries formed a united kingdom, maintaining its own Army and Navy, paying a Civil Service and keeping its Royal Household, he will find that it cost more to govern Ireland annually than it did to govern Norway and Sweden. A still more forcible comparison of the gross extravagance prevailing in the government of Ireland is afforded by taking the following facts and figures:—

Scotland, although somewhat smaller, I believe, in area, than Ireland, has a larger population than Ireland. The number of Government officials assessed for income-tax in Scotland in 1908-9 was 938; in Ireland, 4,560. The salaries in Scotland were £315,000; in Ireland, £1,435,000. These figures appear in the Report of the Inland Revenue Commissioners for 1908, and speak for themselves.

For every £3 spent by Ireland on law and justice Scotland spends £1, although the volume of crime is greater in Scotland. The Law Courts in Ireland cost £368,714; in Scotland, £202,608. The Irish Prisons Board, with only 2,500 convicts, costs £107,000 per annum; the Scottish Prisons Board, with 2,900 convicts, costs £87,000. In Ireland the police force costs nearly £1,500,000; in Scotland, £500,000. In fact, in Ireland, while the population has been decreasing, the cost of government has been increasing. Examination of the statistics will prove this fact.

Mention of the cost of administration of law and justice reminds me incidentally that there are offices in connection with this charge in Ireland in which a large number of nominated appointments are made, and in these offices nobody but a Protestant need apply. And this in a country where the total non-Catholic population is barely a fourth of the entire!

Is it any wonder that the narrow-minded minority in Ireland, who for nigh a century have enjoyed all the fruits of office and exercised all the patronage, are now shrieking in open defiance of the law, and threatening rebellion (save the mark!)? And these be the forces of "law and order" in Ireland!

In reply to the last paragraph of your "Irish Reader's" letter, I would state that it is very easy to make an insinuation of the kind contained therein. Let him come into the open and justify his statement. There are no more kindly hearted, tolerant, or fair-minded people than the Irish people south of the Boyne, and as I lived for some years in the North, I know what I am writing from personal experience. The first and most lasting impression made on my mind at sight of the first Orange procession I had ever seen was that, viewed as a whole, I had never seen such a large body of men comprising such a limited number of intelligent-looking beings.

With regard to "Irishman's" letter, I am inclined to agree with him when he suggests that it is a fallacy to judge the merits or otherwise of political and social reforms by claiming that intellect and education are on one or the other side; but on the question of the measurement of opinion by means of the comparative wealth of Protestants and Catholics, I would differ from him strongly. There are excellent historical authorities accounting for the fact that the Protestants in Ireland are, as a rule, wealthy. He is, I am sure, mindful of the continuous Plantations, and the determined efforts by successive rulers to wipe out the Catholics in Ireland, and I feel assured that he will not argue that the present position is one arising from a normal state of things in the past.

Apologising for trespassing at such length,—I am, sir, etc., GALWEGIAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“An Irish Reader of EVERYMAN” says:—

1. Every Irishman, down to the pauper in the workhouse, knows that nine out of every ten educated Irishmen are Unionists.

2. That the whole force and basis of Home Rule rests on the ignorant and uneducated voters of the farming class.

3. And he defines the educated as those who read and think for themselves.

Taking his definition of education first, I would suggest that, besides merely reading and thinking for himself, a man's education is surely expressed in the delicacy of his feelings, and your correspondent's unnecessary and contemptuous dragging in of "the pauper in the workhouse" speaks volumes on that score. I trust his nine out of ten "educated" Irishmen possess finer sensibilities.

It appears logical to the "educated" mind of your correspondent that eminent Protestants who are not Unionists are of necessity cranks.

Were Mr. Bonar Law to come into power, whose votes would put him there—those of the "educated" or of those others? Or does your correspondent's education tell him that the average British voter is

The Collar that is Better.

Better in material because it wears longer than most collars do—better in style because it carries that touch of distinctive appearance possessed by no other—better in fit because it is cut on an entirely new principle which ensures it setting naturally round the neck. These are the three points of "betterness" about

"HORBRO" COLLARS

.. "Horbro" Collars are made in 36 shapes and quarter fittings in nearly every shape—thus ensuring that exactitude of style and fit which are essential to appearance and comfort.

6d. each 5/6 per Dozen.

.. Write to-day for the Collar Folder illustrating 36 styles and giving full details. Kindly mention this paper

388, STRAND, W.C. And Branches throughout London.

The NEW EMIGRATION.

TO understand how this may be stopped by

Perpetual Leases,

giving Tenants Fixity of Tenure and of RENT, read the works issued by the

REDEMPTION OF LABOUR LEAGUE.

List of Publications and Illustrated Leaflet of the SHARNAL STREET, Kent, Small Holdings Colony, where the Land is held by Tenants on Leases for

10,000 Years,

free on application to the Hon. Secs.:

CHAS. F. LAMBLE and MARK B. F. MAJOR,

Redemption of Labour League,

7, Queen Street Place, London, E.C.

Free copies of the works may be had by Public Libraries on application.

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A Remarkable Offer.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vambery, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"'Chambers's Encyclopædia' has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

A FREE BOOK.

TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, Post Free, and without any obligation on my part, Illustrated Booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

.....

"educated" and the Irish the reverse? I should very much like to have his ideas on the British Constitution.

Only for the land there would be no "Home Rule" question! Agrarian legislation is proceeding swimmingly, yet Derry falls into the Home Rule ranks.

The "educated" nine-tenths existing in the imagination of your correspondent will find their level in a decade or two of Home Rule. Their last appeal is to passion and prejudice; as for the ignorant farmer, he only knows that his race has been all but extirpated under English rule, that his sons and daughters—the flower of his flock—still flee in thousands, whilst a narrow and bigoted ascendancy still monopolise every-thing worth having.

Your correspondent fears to divulge his name. He knows, and accordingly abuses, the magnanimity of the ignorant Irish Catholic.—I am, sir, etc.,

A MERE CATHOLIC NATIONALIST.

Cork, June 9th, 1913.

THE POSITION OF THE ENGLISH AUTHOR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The most interesting article under this heading in last week's EVERYMAN most distinctly proves, I think, the truth of the theory which I have heard expressed before, that no one, unless he or she have private means, should take up literature as a profession. I am excepting, of course, those engaged in regular journalism. Writing, like painting, seems to me to be more suited to times of leisure than to times of pressure, and if all authors had work of quite a different character to do to provide them with bread and butter, and only wrote in their spare time, it might have a salutary effect all round.

The author himself would benefit, in that he would not suffer from drought, of which we hear so many complain. His work would enable him to bring to his writings a larger and more varied experience of life, consequently infusing them with a greater freshness and vivacity. Thus would the general public benefit, and also—though there would, perhaps, be a slight decrease in the number of books published—a greater number of new writers would be able to make a name.

"Every dog has his day," and every author should be content to have his little day—and can be, as long as he has not all his eggs in one basket. We cannot all be Scotts or Dickenses; but all who have the talent can add their little quota to the literature of their day.

Socially speaking, I should say that a business man who can write is more noticed by any "set" in society than the professional writer who can do no business.

As you say, "authors do not yearn" for it. It is enough for them that they want to write, and to get those thoughts that will keep hammering at their brains out on paper. If they are the source of a guinea or two in their pockets, well and good; if not, and they have other and more remunerative irons in the fire, they have no need to care.—I am, sir, etc.,

Cardiff. S. H. E. L.

MADemoiselle IXE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In reading a paragraph in your delightful paper last night, I noticed that "Mademoiselle Ixe" was mentioned as a pseudonym. Wasn't it the title of a book—the first of the Pseudonym Library—by "Lanoë Falconer"?—I am, sir, etc.,

Detmark Hill.

F. M. C.

THE TRAIL OF THE TOPICAL

It is inevitably a temptation to an author with a facile pen to make a bid for immediate popularity with a novel centred on a burning question of the day. Sometimes the attempt at ephemeral success crystallises into a permanent triumph, as in the case of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which, written to depict the horrors of slavery, and to enlist recruits in the campaign for its abolition, remains to this day an indelible record of the power of genius stirred by emotion. Wilkie Collins, flaming with indignation at the injustice of the marriage law, which seemed to him deliberately designed to frustrate human effort, wrote "No Name," and incidentally created Captain Wragge, designed to live with the immortal Micawber, Dick Swiveller, and the inimitable Marchioness.

Other examples come to mind, taken from the ranks of minor novelists, like James Payn and Anthony Trollope. China was a burning question at the date "By Proxy" was published, but interest and significance is still attached to the clever and workmanlike narrative. To take a topic of the day for the motive of a novel, as we have seen, does not preclude its permanence in literature, given the driving power of enthusiasm, indignation, and strong moral force.

Sincere emotion leaves its impress apart from literary skill or craftsmanship. Indeed, it has a power so strong that it possesses a language almost of its own—hall-marked and unmistakable, so that the letters of the illiterate, written under the stress of passion, either of grief, remorse, or love, suddenly break into sheer eloquence. But when the topical novel is devoid of this driving power, when the personality of the writer leaves no impress on the page, it drops lifeless to the ground, to be swept up with the literary windfalls of the previous season. The writing may be clever, the characterisation convincing, to no profit. The success of the topical tale is dependent on its enthusiasm, even as the novel with a purpose is dependent on the skill with which the author keeps the purpose hidden.

The attention and discussion aroused by the White Slave Bill produced a plentiful crop of novels, and it is a notable fact, and serves to bear out the contention, that of these novels not one has attained anything more than an ephemeral success. The latest addition to the crop is furnished by Nora Vynne.

SO IT IS WITH THE DAMSEL (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.) is written with a certain skill, and in style is not unpleasing; but, like the rest of the literary harvesting from this particular sensation, there is a lack of moral force—the driving power is lacking. The story is written for the moment, and contains nothing permanent or significant. The heroine, after the fashion beloved of serialists, falls into the hands of the "traffickers," and in the process displays an infantile imbecility that, in any other setting, an author of the capacity of Miss Vynne would not credit her heroine with possessing. She is "shipped abroad," following once more the established precedent of the "scare," and, having awakened the interest of her readers and sharpened the imagination as to the terrors awaiting the unhappy victim, the author permits her to escape from the house where she is confined, and to break through the net her captors have spread for her enmeshing. Had the author contented herself with the development of the love romance which runs through the volume, and in refreshing contrast to the distasteful theme with which the book is chiefly concerned, she might have achieved a certain distinction. She possesses qualities of imagination that, given fair play, might bear good fruit.

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers" scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

- | | |
|--|--|
| Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech"; | A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.I.S. (President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing"; |
| ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech"; | ALBERT CREW (Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings"; |
| J. L. GRIFFITHS (U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking"; | GENERAL EDITOR, A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law). |

But "The Book of Public Speaking" is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World's Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

- | | | |
|----------------------|--------------------|--------------------|
| Lord Rosebery | Joseph Chamberlain | Lord Fisher |
| Lord Beaconsfield | Max O'Rell | Abraham Lincoln |
| H. H. Asquith | R. Waldo Emerson | Justin McCarthy |
| A. J. Balfour | Harold Cox | Viscount Milner |
| W. E. Gladstone | Woodrow Wilson | M. Poincaré |
| Sir Edward Clarke | G. Bernard Shaw | Whitelaw Reid |
| Andrew Lang | Charles Dickens | Theodore Roosevelt |
| D. Lloyd George | John Bright | Philip Snowden |
| Winston Churchill | Chauncey Depew | Ian MacLaren |
| Mark Twain | Sir A. Conan Doyle | Augustine Birrell |
| Spencer Leigh Hughes | Sir Edward Grey | Sir A. W. Pinner |
| Sir Henry Irving | Earl Halsbury | Etc., etc. |

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

FREE BOOKLET.

The Publishers have prepared an interesting illustrated Booklet—which they will send free—describing the work and their offer to deliver the complete work as published for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

To the CAXTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge and without any obligation on my part, full particulars of "The Book of Public Speaking."

Name.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address.....

Learn to Sketch in Two Hours . .

. . . An entirely new method of teaching drawing has been invented by A. A. Braun, Director of the Association of Designers, Artists, and Illustrators (the well-known commercial studio). The A.B.C. or Hieroglyphic System of Drawing, which is taught by correspondence, enables students to produce creditable sketches after the first lesson. The complete Course contains hundreds of original devices (the outcome of experience) for obtaining immediate facility in remunerative commercial drawing. Write to-day for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of leading illustrators, to

A.B.C. SCHOOL OF DRAWING, 46, Chancery Lane, London.

LEARN FRENCH by Rosenblum's Anglo-French Journal, 1d., monthly, 1/6, post free from Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, London, W.C. T.P.'s Weekly says: "Admirably adapted for students of French."

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8s. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

SLOAN-DUPLOYAN SHORTHAND ("New Rapid" Improved Lessons), endorsed by over 10,000 students, produce a guaranteed speed of 80 words per minute in four weeks. Send for Illustrated Handbook and Free Lesson.—Shorthand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Telephone: 6111 Holborn.) (N.B.—No connection with J. M. Sloan of Ramsgate.)

THE WILL and the WAY.

Where there's a will there's always a way. Everyone knows this, and realises that it is the will that bothers most people. If they could only develop their will-power, self-control, and self-reliance, they know they would find their way to success. There is an easy, practical, scientific, sure means of developing your Will-Power, in the Concentro Course—"Scientific Concentration." A great number of students in every part of the civilised world are developing their will by means of this famous system of training. They are also developing, steadily and surely, their powers of Attention, Observation, Memory, Speaking, Thinking, and obtaining marvellous control over both mind and body. Every Concentro student receives personal direction, according to their requirements, through the Concentro Report system. Editors of well-known Journals recommend "Scientific Concentration." Learn what it will do for you, by sending to-day for their Free Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/ per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

MSS. CRITICISED AND REVISED. Write for terms to Mr. LEPECHT (Box N), Oaklea Cottage, Silverhill Park, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. Money refunded if not satisfactory.

A.R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 80, Goswell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

But the trail of the "topical" is spread over her pages from first to last. She is uninspired by genuine, if mistaken, indignation on behalf of young girls entrapped by benevolent-looking old ladies; and, indeed, it is difficult to imagine anyone possessed of a modicum of the critical faculty being stirred by the legends and fables that obscure the issues underlying the White Slave Scare. Mrs. Billington-Greig, in an able article in the English Review, points out how baseless a fabrication the traffic has proved itself to be. Other women writers—notably Mrs. Nesbit-Bland—have dissected the stories clustering round the scare piecemeal, and proved them utterly unworthy of belief, and incapable of substantiation. It has been left for novelists to turn the scare to advantage; but in seeking for something new in human nature the author to-day too often loses sight of that which is everlasting, and, to achieve a quick popularity, often barter the chances of achieving a permanent success.

J. K. P.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. ROBERT W. CHAMBERS is invariably charming in his studies of femininity. His latest novel, JAPONETTE (Appletons, 6s.), deals with two sisters Silvette and Diana—Japonette of the story. There is a restraint and delicacy about the author's style that enables him to deal with situations that the ordinary modern writer cannot handle. He treats those problems that arise out of the attraction of sex with a strength and at the same time a restraint that is admirably effective. There has been a fashion in these later days to present a type of woman who finds no satisfaction or consolation in the affection and comradeship of one of her own sex. The intimate friendship existing between the two sisters is convincingly portrayed; their mutual sympathy and understanding, their knowledge of when to speak and when to be silent, the courage that each finds in the other make the history of their struggles and ultimate achievement a rare and exquisite thing. The author is not quite so successful in his portrayal of young men. There is always a suggestion of sketchiness in his heroes, the woman is invariably the dominant factor of the piece; but in his studies of the middle-aged man he is triumphant. We all know the charming man of the world, whose ideals are undimmed, whose chivalry remains untarnished; he has been exploited by many generations of novelists. Mr. Chambers has given us a new variety, a less showy but more truthful type. Rivett the elder, in his attachment and fidelity for the two sisters, is one of the best things in the book, and his quiet humour and fundamental honesty are never shown to greater effect than in his scene of Colonel Curmew. The latter is a faithful but unpleasant portrait of the man who wilfully misunderstands unconventional but ingenuous young women. He confronts Diana with a distinctly insulting proposal, and finds himself promptly knocked down by Rivett, who arrives at the psychological moment and teaches Curmew a lesson he does not easily forget. Finally the sisters marry prosperously and well. Diana is mated to the hero Jim, who persistently worships her, in spite of a continued course of discouragement to which she treats him for his own good. Mr. Chambers has written at his best throughout a dainty romance.

Derek Vane has just issued A PARADISE OF FOOLS (Everett and Co., 6s.). This story obtained the prize of £250 from a newspaper in Chicago, and the fact that it earned this distinction prepares us very obviously for highly spiced and sensational fare. It is, indeed, an epic of crime, hairbreadth escapes, murderous happenings, and love of the melodramatic variety. We have no quarrel with the melodramatic—some of the most successful stories in the world may fairly be said to come under this heading; but the author has not grasped the significance of the fact that a superstructure of sensation should grow out of the foundation of a plot so constructed as to admit the inclusion of many and exciting incidents. There is little or no plot in the novel, and the incidents therein depicted have little relation one to the other. The style is crude and at times slipshod. We recall with regret certain fugitive sketches and short stories that we have previously read by Derek Vane, and we wish that this author would return to the quieter paths and less sensational avenues of her previous literary efforts.

THE DISTANT DRUM is a story of marriage in New York. The author writes with a power, incision, and a certain elemental humour that marks out the book from the ordinary novel dealing with matrimonial tangles. The gist of the story lies in the facilities offered by American laws for getting rid of an undesirable husband. Yvonne, wife to Bunny Thorne—the names are irresistibly Yankee—grows tired of him, and desires a little change and variety. She invites the man with whom she has commenced the first chapters of an intrigue home; Bunny not unnaturally objects to her entertaining this type of visitor, and ejects him. Yvonne, under the influence of veronal, sues her husband for attempted murder, and gives such a garbled account of the circumstances that Bunny is committed for trial. He resolutely refuses to say a word in his defence, such defence being inevitably a reflection on his wife, and entailing the confession of her intrigues and her drugging habits. The scene in court is well written, and the excitement worked up with skill, and the reader is left with the conviction that Bunny will be sent to the Tombs and Yvonne escape, after the traditional fashion of the beautiful adventuress, from the consequences of her intrigues and baseless fabrications. Bunny, however, is set free, and the fashion of his rescue from the very teeth of conviction is the one blot on a cleverly contrived and well-sustained effort. The ruse adopted is a very old one, and does not deceive the reader for a moment. We refrain from giving the mystery away, as up to that point the story is eminently readable, and is told with vigour and capacity.

Mr. John Harvey, adopting a well-worn tradition, has launched MY FATHER'S SON (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) with a prefatory statement that the MS. of the novel came into his hands from the supposed writer. The book is a series of somewhat morbid introspections. William Penn is a flabby person, always thinking of himself, taking his moral temperature, plumbing the shallows of his emotions, and suffering agonies of mind when the lead strikes the bottom. He is a puny creature about whom to write so long a book. The style is lame, and drags wearisomely, and the hero's opinion of himself will largely be endorsed by those who read about him. "I do not know what I am; I am one of those uneasy persons who must for ever be tormented by doubt of himself." The first thing a man must do to create a really virile interest or feeling in other people is to forget himself, or, if he cannot do that, he must at least Revolution in Typewriter Prices!

This great Boon now within the reach of Everyman. Ideal for Journalists, Secretaries, Clergymen.

BENNETT PORTABLE TYPEWRITER

Guaranteed for 12 Months.

£4:4:0

MONEY BACK
IF NOT FULLY SATISFIED AFTER 10 DAYS' TRIAL.

The "Bennett" begins a new era in typewriter construction. It embodies the good points of standard machines with advantages all its own. The "Bennett" writes as clearly, easily and as well as any standard make costing five times as much, keeps its alignment perfectly, and stands the racket of everyday use. The "Bennett" is portable; can be carried from room to room, or taken away when travelling. It only weighs 5 lbs. in case. Thousands in use, giving every satisfaction.

Send Cheque or P.O. Order to-day, or at least write for illustrated pamphlet.

BENNETT TYPEWRITER CO., 75, CANNON ST., LONDON, E.C.
General Agents for Great Britain: H. STEAD & CO., 46, Boar Land, Leeds.
DISTRICT AGENTS WANTED.

Just Published.

A NEW NOVEL BY MARRIOTT WATSON

ROSALIND IN ARDEN

A charming romance in which the nimble wits of the hero are matched against the ruthless cunning of the cutest of American plutocrats.

There is a strong love theme in the foreground, and in the background yet an echo of the same, the whole of which is surrounded with an atmosphere at once wholesome and delightful.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

'THE SECRET OF SUCCESS'

said LORD HALDANE, "is to ask the highest, the best. It is possible, if you have genius, to appeal to almost everybody." This is the genius of the HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE. It gives only the best, it appeals to everybody who wishes to be anybody.

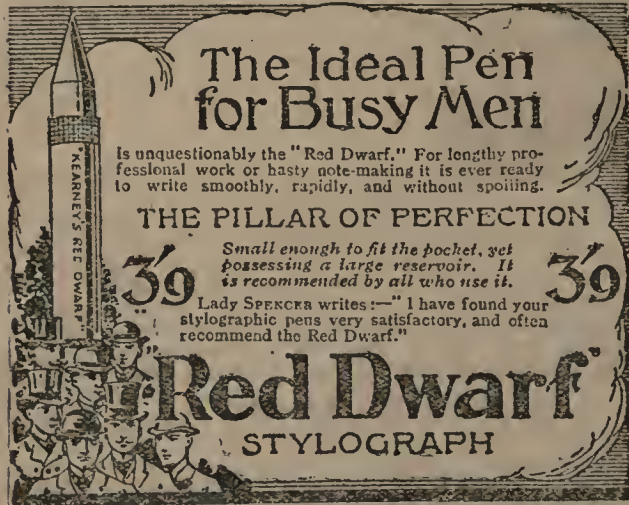

70 Vols. now ready. Price 1s. net each.

Of all booksellers. Write for Illustrated Descriptive List, post free, from

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, W.C.

STAMMERING.—Descriptive booklet sent free to any sufferer mentioning EVERYMAN, by W. A. YEARSLEY & T. E. BIRCH, "Rosador," St. Annes-on-Sea, Gold Medal Speech Specialists.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

The Ideal Pen for Busy Men

Is unquestionably the "Red Dwarf." For lengthy professional work or hasty note-making it is ever ready to write smoothly, rapidly, and without spoiling.

THE PILLAR OF PERFECTION

Small enough to fit the pocket, yet possessing a large reservoir. It is recommended by all who use it.

3/9

Lady SPEKORA writes:—"I have found your stylographic pens very satisfactory, and often recommend the Red Dwarf."

Red Dwarf
STYLOGRAPH

SLOAN-DUPLOYAN SHORTHAND is acquired in a few weeks and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use. See EVERYMAN, Feb. to May, for series of remarkable testimonies. Illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc., free.—SLOAN SHORTHAND CO., Ramsgate.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. "Thought: Its Ten Laws." Companion Card. Teach the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

FREE on receipt of postcard, fully illustrated art catalogue of Riley's Billiard Tables

For the Home Cash or Easy Payments. Send for it to-day. Prices from £37/6. The popular size, 6 ft. 4 in., costs only £25/5/0. Seven days' free trial.

E. J. RILEY, Ltd., Oadine Works, ACCRINGTON.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

A HOUSE FOR 6d. A DAY.—Sixpence a day paid for five years will enable you to secure a house worth £300 in any part of the United Kingdom. Full particulars on application to J. J. Green, 246, Bishops-gate, London, E.C. Mention EVERYMAN.

SAVE £5 2s. 6d. by taking up the famous "St. Settel Course" of Will-Culture, which contains information worth FIVE GUINEAS to you. By means of this simple yet ingenious system your Will-Power can be developed to double its present strength in from 3 to 4 months. Your powers of Concentration, Memory, Self-Reliance, Observation and Personal Magnetism are enormously increased. "The St. Settel Course" is warmly recommended by "Public Opinion," "Pittman's Journal," "Great The Christian Age," "Young Man," Rev. T. A. Seed, and the whole course is only 2/6 (abroad 6d. extra). NO GIFT CERTIFICATE. The Course is sent in plastic, sealed to-day. Next week will see you delighted with your progress. BETTER INSTITUTE (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

Regd. A. R. O. L.

successfully conceal the fact that he remembers. To talk about oneself in such a fashion as to amuse and intrigue one's hearers needs an artist in words, if not in humour. These attributes the hero does not possess, and Mr. Harvey has been unable to persuade us that he does.

• • •

THE OUTLAW (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) goes with a swing. Mr. David Hennessey writes graphically of the bush. He portrays men and things with strength and, at the same time, a reticence that brings home to the reader the fact that "out yonder" a man's chief asset is character. There is no room for him if he cannot think for himself, if he has not the courage to decide when and how he shall overthrow tradition and act on his own initiative, even though his course flies in the face of the conventional code. The author's outlaws impress one with a reality not always found in the more picturesque variety prevalent in the monthly magazines. His women are simple, elementary creatures, with none of the subtlety or the coquetry of the city type. There is, indeed, an atmosphere of freshness and simplicity about the story that lifts it far above the ordinary yarn of the colonies. There is a breadth of outlook and a capacity for understanding the temptations that come to a man in the lonely places of the earth not often found in fiction. We congratulate the author on his achievement, and shall look with interest for his next venture.

• • •

TEMPORARY INSANITY, by Miss E. G. Lewis (Murray and Evenden, 6s.), is written in a distinctly amateurish way, and though the theme of the book is not without originality, the author rather overdoes it in the way in which she makes her heroine subjected to shocks, which cause her memory to come and go. The result is bewildering—not only to the heroine, one might say, but also to the reader. The book opens well, and the earlier chapters show a promise which is unfortunately not fulfilled in the later part of the book. Barbara is the wife of a clerk who drinks, and upon the simultaneous discovery of this fact and of the love which her husband's friend, Basil Ingraham, bears for her, she cuts her husband's throat with a razor, and then tries to poison herself. She does not die, but the shock is so great that her memory utterly forsakes her, and upon recovery she knows nothing of the tragedy. A verdict of "Suicide during temporary insanity" is returned by the coroner, and Barbara goes to live in the country with her children, totally ignorant of the tragedy in which she has played so large a part. Basil is the only person who knows what has happened, and he saw the whole thing through a window. He subsequently goes abroad as a Volunteer in the Boer War. Barbara, in what amounts to her new personality, develops a literary capacity, and writes books which attract a large amount of attention, including that of her lover, who is ignorant of the identity of the writer. The books deal with the question of temporary insanity, and in the form of essays discuss the vexed question of whether a person who in a moment of passion commits a criminal act should be punished, or whether he should rather not be treated as if he had been suffering from a disease, and was not responsible. In the end Barbara marries Basil, and she certainly deserves to achieve the happiness which is eventually hers—for the unfortunate lady is so constantly being knocked about the head, and her mind is so frequently being changed—one week she remembers the tragedy, and the other she forgets, her literary ability being likewise subject to similar quick changes—that in more senses than one she may be regarded as a heroine—rather let us say heroic, in that she survives these extraordinary vicissitudes. The author certainly does not seem to be overburdened with any sense of the seriousness of Barbara's crime, and gives one the idea that these things are of such everyday occurrence in even the best regulated families, that really they are not of importance. The suggestion is not reassuring.

• • •

THE SIN OF EVE, by Miss May Edginton (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). This is distinctly up-to-date and very good reading. Ellen Flamartin is the daughter of a parson who emigrates to Canada for the reason that he found a country living in England insufficient for his needs—he being a man of large ideas, and, in the words of his Bishop, "a firebrand." His daughter inherits her father's unconventionality, together with a tremendous desire to reform the world, to which end she comes to London and joins the Militant Suffragettes. Miss Edginton has very cleverly depicted the struggle which goes on in the mind of Ellen, who, while despising what she is so fond of calling the "inessentials of life," finds it rather difficult to get away from them, especially as she is a strikingly pretty girl and has many admirers. Her chief sin is indeed that of Eve—curiosity—and it lands her in many tight corners. She is a lovable girl, and a very human one; her character is one of which the author should be proud, for she has managed to portray a modern woman with a mania for Work (with a capital W) who does not bore either her readers or herself. We are glad to say that in the end Ellen finds that after all is said and done a woman is only half a woman who does not enter the Kingdom of Love.

• • •

The output of Mr. Max Pemberton is a large one. There are moments when those who have followed his literary career wish he had lessened the quantity of his words and concentrated more closely on the quality. Certain of his books are eminently readable; he has a quick eye for surface characterisation, and possesses the faculty of weaving a story that shall include the latest items of topical interest. Thus his tale of an aviator, one of the latest novels he has produced, was pleasant, even inspiring, to read, and with that, so with other and earlier efforts. But only in one of his many volumes has he achieved certain effects, common to writers of a certain high level, that is rarely found in the popular authors of to-day. "The Lodestar" contained the germ of a great book. There were scenes of London life in its pages painted with a skill and insight that came as a surprise. The characterisation was clever, and at times subtle, and suggested a capacity for creative art notably absent from other volumes bearing his name. The book in our judgment did not sustain the promise of its early chapters; but it contained enough of originality and power to justify the hope that one day Mr. Pemberton would forsake the easy road of popularity for the narrow path that leads to artistic achievement. There has been no sequel to the promise of "The Lodestar." LEILA AND HER LOVER (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.) is eminently readable. Brightly, even frothily written, it skims over the surface of things, and is eminently suited for the pauses in the band at a fashionable seaside resort. Max Pemberton is always in evidence on the front at a popular watering-place, and we do not grudge him his vogue, if that vogue contents him. But, remembering certain touches in "The Lodestar," we could wish that his easy triumph would leave him unsatisfied, his popularity find him desirous of achieving more lasting things. There are so many writers

HIDDEN POWER.

Remarkable Results Follow Experiments of Clever Scientist.
MARVELS OF THE MIND.

Initiation FREE to Our Readers.

There are hundreds, nay, thousands, of capable men and women to-day needlessly living a life of mediocrity, obscurity, and failure, whose very existence constitute an "apparently intended" succession of endless toil, trouble, and misery. Fatalists, no doubt, exclaim that all such things must be, but just ask yourself this question: Is there one single sound reason why every being should not attain success and happiness? No—most emphatically there is not.

Every human soul is heir to a rich and glorious possession—the sacred cherished gifts of inborn capacities and talents. Everyone is born suitably equipped to play his or her rôle in the game of life, and given opportunities which, when grasped, lead to unbounded success and perfect happiness.

Mr. Frank Hartley, the greatest psychometriculturist, positively denies that failure in any sense of the term necessarily exists. He maintains that the power to succeed lies within the reach of all; it is, in fact, inherent, a potent dormant force, requiring but a certain amount of scientific development to manifest itself in every individual. Hundreds upon hundreds of people in every walk of life who have followed his method testify to the wonderful results which this truly remarkable man has enabled them to accomplish.

£1,000 GUARANTEE.

Just read the following remarkable letter. Mr. Frank Hartley possesses thousands of similar ones, and he will hand a cheque for £1,000 to any London Hospital, fund, or charity, if anyone can prove that these are not absolutely genuine.

Professor Le D—, Fellow of the British Institute of Mental Science and Graduate of the American College of Sciences (Diploma and Honours), writes, March 3rd, 1913:—

"I have carefully examined your system on Personal Magnetism, etc., and find it far superior to any I have ever read. As a Psychologist I may say you have given the very secrets away to the world.—Yours very faithfully, "LE D—."

No matter your age or position in life, whether you are engaged in artistic pursuits, in commerce, in finance, you may be either employer, employee, or independent, Mr. Frank Hartley will help you attain your most cherished secret ambitions. Every word you speak, every emanating thought, every moment you live is either right or wrong, and the secret of success in every phase of life lies in bringing your every wish, thought, and action into perfect harmony with your immediate surroundings and the hidden forces of nature.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

So absolutely convinced is Mr. Hartley of the infallibility of his system that he offers to send a free copy of his wonderful book, entitled "The Temple of the Mind," to any of our readers interested, and, further, to initiate them free of charge into his wonderful secret success method.

There is no age limit, no question of position, or obstacle of any kind. All you have to do is to write to Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 106, London Institute of Menti Culture, 9, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C. (mention you are a reader of EVERYMAN), and he will send you a free copy of his wonderful book, full particulars of his method, and show you what you must do in order to attain Success, Power, Personal Influence, and Perfect Happiness.

Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring his book and information.

WEAK SIGHT CURED IN ONE MONTH

SPECTACLES CAN BE DISCARDED ENTIRELY.

10 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

The remarkable new treatment for weak sight discovered by Dr. C. G. Percival, the eminent specialist, has cured many thousands of sufferers. One month effects a complete cure in most cases, and spectacles can be discarded entirely.

The whole medical faculty approves of the massage principle of this new treatment. A speedy cure is assured in all cases of near sight, far sight, and aching or strained eyes. Since it was first announced thousands have written saying that they discarded their spectacles in one month.

So positive is Dr. Percival that his System will cure you that he will gladly send it on ten days' free trial. You may test it, and if it fails to benefit your sight, it will not cost you a single penny. Try it for ten days. If it does not improve your sight you pay nothing.

Write now for your free trial, enclosing 2d. (abroad four foreign) stamps for postage, to Dr. C. G. Percival (Dept. 95), 43-45, Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITING carefully and quickly executed by expert male typist, from 8d. per 1,000 words. With carbon copy, 1d. extra per 1,000 words.—C. A. GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

ARE YOUR NERVES WRONG? Are you depressed, sleepless or irritable? Specialist advises absolutely free by letter.—Write, "Specialist," c/o EVERYMAN Office.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clemeot's Inn, W.C.

GLAISHER'S BOOK CATALOGUES.—PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS in Great Variety and at Greatly Reduced Prices. Supplementary List for June, 1913, Now Ready. Gratis and Post Free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

CAN YOU SKETCH? Learn to draw for the Press. We give a thorough COURSE OF INSTRUCTION by POST, in MAGAZINE, BOOK and NEWSPAPER ILLUSTRATION. PUPILS' DRAWINGS SOLD TO THE LEADING PERIODICALS. Write for Prospectus (post free) to Dept. 17, THE LONDON SKETCH SCHOOL, 11, Chalsey Road, Erockley, London.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

TOURS.

PRIVATE SOCIAL TOURS (Ladies and Gentlemen). July 4th. Austro-Italian TYROL (Dolomiten Alps). Magnificent scenery. Aug. 1st. RUSSIA (Caucasus, Volga, Crimea, St. Petersburg, Moscow). Aug. 15th. SWITZERLAND. 3 weeks, 16 gns. Later, SPAIN, IT. LAKES, ALGERIA, EGYPT.—Miss Bishop, Haslemere, Wimbledon Pk. Rd., Wimbledon.

ROUND Switzerland, 19 days' Tour, £11 17s. 6d. Paris, Montreux, Chamonix, Zermatt, Stresa, Lugano and Lueerne; also Lugano Tours, £5 5s.; Montreux Tours, £5 5s. ONLY ADDRESS—GEORGE LUNN'S TOURS, LTD., 23, Old Jewry, E.C.

SWISS TOURS, £4 19s. 6d.; BELGIUM (a fortnight), £4 17s. 6d. RHINE, HOLLAND, SCOTLAND, IRELAND. Write for the "A1" Holiday Guide.—"A1" TRAVEL OFFICES, 3, New Oxford Street, W.C.

£5 5s.—SWITZERLAND, PARIS, THE RHINE. Special Tour to VIENNA and HEIDELBERG.—Standard Tours, Ltd., Originators of FULLY INCLUSIVE FIVE GUINEA TOURS, 59b-61, New Oxford Street. Booklet "G" free.

one can read in the pauses of the band. There are few who show the power even faintly suggested in "The Lodestar."

Messrs. Sampson Low have published a tale of the great Boer War, MAJOR GREVILLE, V.C. (6s.). The author, G. Munnik, is a Senator of the present Transvaal Parliament, and his story, written without pretensions to literary style, contains some pregnant suggestions and crude criticisms. Those chapters dealing with specific engagements of the war are written with a restraint that must inevitably ensue on the lapse of time and the amelioration of racial antagonism. The fact that the hero of the story is an English officer enables the author to deal tactfully with Boer triumphs and British reverses, and what his descriptives lack in emotional power and effectiveness they make up in calmness of judgment and serenity of outlook that shows the man who takes long views. That the war was made not by the people of two nations, but by their Governments, is emphasised, and the respect engendered by the soldiers on either side for the bravery of their enemies is convincingly pointed out. The author touches only with reticence on the horrors of the battlefield, and certain passages gain rather than lose by this treatment. We quote the following as an example of Mr. Munnik's style:—

"The picture suggested, grim, stark, and pitiless, has both pathos and power.

"The sight that presented itself to them, as they emerged from behind the sheltering boulders, was as terrible as it was unexpected. Lying in the trenches and on the broken ground in rear were hundreds of dead men, their bodies twisted into every conceivable attitude. In some places they had fallen one on top of the other, Britons and Boers side by side. Others sprawled over the blood-spattered rocks, killed as they were taking aim. Death seemed to have leashed the kopje's summit."

The love interest of the story is a minor consideration, but is skilfully woven into the general plan, and serves to soften the grimness of the military portion. We recommend the book most cordially to our readers.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

The Editor cannot under any circumstances enter into correspondence regarding unsolicited contributions. It must be understood that these are sent at the author's risk, and that the Editor is not responsible for their safe custody or return.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C. Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN," Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.

GENERAL

BROWNING'S SORDELLO

Being the Text of the Poem, with Introductions, Notes and Index by the Rev. ARTHUR JAMES WHYTE, M.A., Clough Memorial Prizeman, Gold Medallist and Senior Moderator in History in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

SWINBURNE: An Estimate

By JOHN DRINKWATER

Small Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

Morning Post.—"From beginning to end of this delicate and charming volume passages will be found which will reward a reader even though he may have been familiar with his Swinburne for forty years."

FRANCE TO-DAY: Its Religious Orientation.

By PAUL SABATIER.

Translated by HENRY BRYAN BINNS. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

DREAMS AND THE WAY OF DREAMS.

By R. L. HINE

Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Manchester Courier.—"Mr. Hine has accomplished his object, and written a book of real literary merit. Every reader with imagination will find something to give him pleasure in these pages."

LONDON'S UNDERWORLD

By THOMAS HOLMES

New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"It is good that rare men like Mr. Holmes exist, for there are not many of us who could spend a long lifetime amongst the human wrecks of the underworld and still retain any confidence or hope in human nature. This is a book that will make people think, and, in a way, it ought to make us hopeful."

MYSTICAL BOOKS

THE MYSTIC WAY

By EVELYN UNDERHILL

Square Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"Miss Underhill's book is a triumph in erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS

By EDMUND G. GARDNER

Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"A deep and sympathetic student of Dante and of the mediæval mystics, he brings to this inquiry the rare combination of qualities that it demands, vision and scholarship, and that extreme delicacy of touch which makes possible an orderly marshalling and presentation of almost intangible things."

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED

Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

Glasgow Herald.—"The whole book is one that has value not only as a most helpful exposition of some phases of Dante's thought, but also as a capable and unpedantic survey of scholasticism itself."

DANTE'S THE DIVINE COMEDY.

Newly Translated by C. E. WHEELER. In three volumes, with Photogravure Frontispiece to each. Square Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net per volume.

1. HELL; 2. PURGATORY; 3. PARADISE.

Spectator.—"Mr. Wheeler's version is admirable for its conscientious workmanship."

Fall Mall.—"It is quite indispensable to English students of Dante."

IMMANENCE. A Volume of Verse

By EVELYN UNDERHILL

4s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"The richness and loftiness of her work cannot fail to find admirers even among those who are far from sharing her view of life."

A SERIES OF GREAT BEAUTY

THE ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN

1/- net monthly

Edited by C. H. COLLINS-BAKER

1/- net monthly

CONTENTS OF PART 5 (NOW READY).

HEAD OF THE CHRIST ... Lorenzo Lotto
AN INTERIOR ... Jan Vermeer
MRS. COLLMANN ... Alfred Stevens
CANTORIA RELIEF ...

THE HOLY FAMILY ... Leonardo di Vinci
THE RAINBOW ... P. Wilson Steer
LUSTRE VASE, Persian (Syrian) Pottery
... Luca della Robbia

Each Part contains seven magnificent reproductions of the masterpieces of Painting, Sculpture, etc., each of which is accompanied by an interesting descriptive note by the editor. No effort has been spared to make the prints in every respect worthy of the originals.

SEND FOR PROSPECTUS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

OETZMANN & CO LTD.

Nr. TOTTENHAM COURT RD., W.

Telegrams: "OETZMANN, LONDON."

Telephone: MAYFAIR 101.

Stations: Met. Rly., EUSTON SQ.; Tube, WARREN STREET.

Rush-seated Occasional Chair, 6/6; Arm Chair, to match, 10/6

Mahogany Inlaid Music Cabinet, with oval door and inlaid panels, and fitted with shelves... £1:17:6

CASEMENT CLOTH

in the newest and most fashionable shades, suitable for CURTAINS, LOOSE COVERS, COSTUMES, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, &c.

31 ins. wide, 6d. per yard. 52 ins. wide, 1s. 0½d. per yard.

Will wash and wear well.

FADELESS FABRICS

The "Eureka," guaranteed fast under any climatic conditions the whole world over. 30 ins. wide, 8½d. per yard; 50 ins. wide, 1s. 2½d. per yard.

PATTERNS POST FREE.

Illustrated "WINDOW FURNISHING UP-TO-DATE," POST FREE, Booklet.

THE "EXTRA GUEST" FOLDING BEDSTEAD.

Pitch Pine Frame, with Woven Wire Mattress ... 5 9

Complete, with Overlay Mattress and Feather Pillow ... 12/9

COUNTRY COTTAGES

CHARMINGLY AND INEXPENSIVELY

FURNISHED.

Illustrated Booklet,

"OUR COTTAGE"

Post Free.

THE ROTARY CYCLOSTYLE

Gestetner's Patent.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEPARTURE IN DUPLICATING MACHINES.

2,000 Copies from One Original.

HANDWRITING—TYPEWRITING—DRAWING—MUSIC.

THE DUPLICATOR FOR FINEST WORK. SPEED, CLEANLINESS, AND RELIABILITY.

Full particulars on application to—

The CYCLOSTYLE CO., 50, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Telephone 5454 Gerrard.

Wholesale & Export: TOTTENHAM HALE, LONDON, N.

I want you to know why you can carry the Seal Pen flat in your pocket

Safety—always safety—is the feature of the Seal. The first principle is the sinking nib—it disappears into the barrel of the pen. The cap contains a threaded plug (1) which screws down inside the barrel and seals the pen—like a screw stopper in a bottle. Safety!

The plug has a metal pin (2) which protects the nib should you attempt to replace the cap without first sinking the nib. Safety again!

When the nib is projected the threaded rod (3) screws into the neck of the barrel and prevents the nib receding whilst in use. Safety again!

The Seal Pen

Safety is but one of the good points. It cannot "sweat"—it does not soil your fingers. It writes instantly always for the nib is in the ink whilst the pen is sealed. The Seal has a large ink capacity, fills without taking apart, has a solid 14-carat gold nib, is guaranteed for two years, and the price is five and six. 36 styles to choose from.

Your Stationer Sells the Seal

W.H. Smith & Son, Manufacturing Stationers, Kean St., Kingsway, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 37. Vol. 2. [REGISTERED
AT THE O.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JUNE 27, 1913

One Penny.

A. W. H. CAPPYN.

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS,
NATUS 1865

For Character Sketch, see page 328.

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Portrait of William Butler Yeats | 321 |
| History in the Making—Notes of the Week | 322 |
| Freedom in Russia—By Dr. Percy Dearmer... .. | 323 |
| In Phœacia—By James Elroy Flecker | 324 |
| The Curse of Usury. Shall we Abolish the Pawnbroker?— By our Special Commissioner | 324 |
| The Back Road—By D. H. L. | 325 |
| A Countryman in London. The Life of a Bricklayer's Labourer—By Thomas Holmes | 326 |
| Rolling Down to Rio | 327 |
| W. B. Yeats: A Character Sketch—By J. M. Hone | 328 |
| Literary Notes | 329 |
| Letters to Living Authors. II.: To William Wymark Jacobs—By Lewis Melville | 330 |
| Masterpiece for the Week. William Canton's "A Child's Book of Saints"—By E. Hermann... .. | 331 |
| Everyman's French Page. The Secret of Wisdom—By Honoré de Balzac | 332 |
| Samuel Augustus Barnett. An Appreciation—By P. W. Wilson | 333 |
| From London to Paris. A National Highway—By G. Alexander | 334 |
| Mateo Falcone. Short Story. Part I.—By Prosper Mérimée | 336 |
| Correspondence— | |
| The Continental Sunday | 338 |
| The Suffrage Question | 340 |
| Oscar Wilde | 343 |
| George Borrow | 344 |
| Traffic in Women | 345 |
| The Surplusage of Women | 346 |
| The Declining Birth-rate | 347 |
| People and Puppets—By J. K. P. | 347 |
| Books of the Week | 349 |

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SELDOM has any State function excited such enthusiasm as stirred the pulse of the Empire when, as the Daily Mail happily puts it, New France and Young England grasped hands in the persons of M. Poincaré and the Prince of Wales. In London the President has won golden opinions by a certain blitheness of bearing and a simple but genial dignity—qualities that, even in this age of sensationalism, appeal to the Britisher. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of the visit, and while prophecy remains the most gratuitous form of error, it is not too much to hope that a new chapter of even closer friendship and warmer relations has been opened between the two great Democratic nations in Europe. As Rudyard Kipling says in his fine poem in the Morning Post:—

"From each other's throat we wrenched, valour's last reward,

That extorted word of praise gasped 'twixt lunge and guard.

In each other's cup we poured mingled blood and tears,
Brutal joys, unmeasured hopes, intolerable fears,
All that soiled or salted life for a thousand years.
Proved beyond the need of proof, matched in every clime,
O companion, we have lived greatly through all time!
Yoked in knowledge and remorse now we come to rest,
Laughing at old villainies that Time has turned to jest;
Pardoning old necessity no pardon can efface—
That undying sin we shared in Rouen market-place."

It is not certain whether the most astonishing event which has occurred in England for many a long day is not the release this week of the Suffragette leaders. Thirty years ago Mr. Gladstone uttered his memorable warning anent Irish revolt to the effect "that the resources of civilisation are not yet exhausted." To-day the Suffragettes can boast that they have "made hay" of those resources. They have, in fact, reduced law to a farce. Whether one condemns or approves them and their methods, that is the one great staggering fact which confronts us. For observe the sequence of events. Not two weeks ago Mr. Justice Phillimore, in sentencing the prisoners, said, "I shall take upon myself the responsibility of saying"—to the Home Secretary—"that, at any rate, the ringleaders of you shall not be released upon any consideration." Since then six out of the seven prisoners have been released, and the other may be liberated at any moment! The law, in a word, is impotent, and its solemnity becomes ludicrous. We have only to recall the gravity of the charge on which the prisoners were convicted to realise that their release marks something like an epoch, and is the greatest triumph that the militants have yet achieved.

Mr. Lloyd George has timed his grant to medical research admirably. Probably never were his political fortunes at a lower ebb than during the week preceding that in which he conciliated his own side by his apology for a certain investment, and, having disarmed his opponents by that apology, propitiated many of them and many of his medical critics by the grant in question; but it is doubtful whether his Insurance Amendment Bill will have the same soothing effect on the country at large. "The last thing to be civilised by man is woman," said George Meredith. The last persons to be reconciled to insurance are the insured.

One of the quaintest tragi-comedies of modern politics is surely that now being enacted by Mr. Joynson-Hicks, M.P., who is proceeding on a tour, which may be triumphal or the reverse, throughout England looking for aeroplanes. Provided that he finds 125 specimens of the new arm, he will apologise to Colonel Seely, whom he has taxed with saying the thing that is not. Provided he does not find them, he will—but there is no saying what he will do. And so from hangar to hangar he goes, from aerodrome to aerodrome, with witnesses and a note-book. If by chance he hears one buzzing in the air above, his car gives chase, and tense is the anxiety to discover whether or not the monoplane has been counted by him before. It is all very ridiculous, no doubt. But let us remember this: behind it there lies a problem of fearful seriousness that we simply cannot afford to ignore. The next war will be won from the air, and unfortunately it is our plans, not our aeroplanes, that are in the air.

Once again the world has heard with a shrug of polite incredulity the twin announcements that the interminable affaire Marconi is at an end, and that the long-delayed Liberal land campaign is really and truly about to begin. I say twin announcements because one always follows the other at a brief interval, and both, alas! belie the hopes of their parents. Somehow the curtain is never rung down on the realistic modern drama of wireless finance, and so, of course, it never gets rung up on the pastoral play, a revised version of "The Deserted Village," that Mr. George is so anxious to present. Will history again repeat itself? Perhaps—but with a difference! This time it is hinted that Mr. Asquith himself will take the lead, and it is whispered also, as we are unfeignedly sorry to say, that behind Mr. George's retirement into the country during the week of the French President's visit lies a tragedy of shattered health that will keep the Chancellor in his tent for many a long day to come.

FREEDOM IN RUSSIA BY

DR. PERCY DEARMER

WE hear of Russia when catastrophes occur. At other times, while the English papers give us the daily gossip of Paris, Berlin, and Vienna, we are content to live in ignorance about the vast Empire which is to exercise so potent an influence upon Asia—and upon that peninsula of the Asiatic continent which we call Europe. We are content, I have said; but whether we are content or not with our ignorance, we have to bear it; and when we seek enlightenment from Russian friends, we are likely to get statements so contradictory that our confusion is but increased. If we seek information from the Russian newspapers, we may fare even worse, for the Russian Press is not free. Perhaps the most we can do is to attempt, with the modesty which the circumstances require, to record the impression made upon a sympathetic Englishman by the present position of Russia.

Two Views of Russia

The Russian revolutionary exile—still more the Pole or Jew who has left the Russian Empire for our own country—will tell us heartrending tales of persecution and cruelty, and all he tells us may be confined strictly to verifiable facts. The ordinary Russian will talk more about the social life of his country and less about its politics; he will ignore the revolutionaries almost as completely as we ignore the group of anarchists who still machinate in London. If we mention the scandals of the Secret Police, he will probably agree with us that it is time this exceptional force came to an end. If we mention the treatment of political prisoners or the cruel repression of the Poles, he may shrug his shoulders and ask us whether we should like the administration of our own country judged in Russia by the testimony of militant suffragettes. If we complain of some act of tyranny on the part of an official, he will remind us how distant from headquarters most Russian provinces are, and how easy it is for one bad man to ignore instructions, even to defer for years the carrying out of new laws, and generally to play the tyrant.

"Nichavo"

The need of social reform he will probably not deny, nor the hardships of the poor, which are borne with such singular patience and courage; but he will urge that the Russian Government is at work upon these things, that it is far ahead of England in the national ownership of railways, mines, and forests, that while our Government wastes the time of Parliament in exploiting political dissensions, in discussing the government of Ireland or the disestablishment of the Welsh Church, his Government is working out the problems of social reform. He may very likely add that the Nihilism of the past has brought about the present condition of things, and that Russia is still paying the price of the murder of Alexander II., who had done so much for the liberation of the people, and had actually sent to the Official Messenger the announcement that the elective bodies of the Empire would be asked to send deputies to the Council of State—on March 13th, 1881, the very day of his assassination. What wonder, he will say, that an era of repression has followed, that revolutionaries are harried, that during the month of April last twenty-seven newspapers were fined and nineteen confiscated and prosecuted? They go on just the same! It is all part of the game. Nichavo! And how can an Englishman object to the principle of censorship when he endures a censorship of the drama which would be inconceivable in Russia. "Monna Vanna" is acted in St. Petersburg; it may not be acted in London.

To this the Englishman would probably reply that his "ordinary" friend takes a slack and casual view of things; that this very Russian fault is really responsible for the present evils, which are largely due to a dilatory and corrupt bureaucracy. Also that his friend does not appreciate the value of liberty; he is prepared to do things for the people, but not for them to be done by the people, and consequently they are badly done, as the Japanese war showed with painful vividness.

The Russian revolutionary would be furious at the "ordinary" point of view, and angry with the Englishman for not dealing more severely with it. And no wonder, for he has suffered, and he knows. The record has been black indeed.

The Trail of Islam

I think the only excuse—or rather, explanation—is that Russia is a younger nation than France or England. She did not begin to emerge from heathenism till well on in the ninth century; her first Christian Prince, Vladimir, was baptised in A.D. 980, whereas Columba came to Britain in 563, and Æthelbert was baptised by Augustine in 597. There is thus a difference of three centuries between us; and the partial suppression of Christianity during the two centuries of the Tartar domination of Russia (1240-1480) must also be taken into account, as well as her isolation from the older civilisation of Greece by that other Moslem invasion which had submerged the ancient empire of Byzantium while the Tartars still ruled over Russia. The geographical isolation of Russia from the West was, of course, in the nature of things (though it was enormously intensified by the Tartar domination); but it would not have affected her progress if she had had the fellowship of civilisation in Asia Minor and Greece and among the races to the north of Greece and of the Black Sea.

Islam again! We cannot, indeed, understand European history or the position of Europe to-day while we continue to forget the effects of the Moslem invasions. I have in former articles described some of these effects upon the core of our great Mediterranean civilisation. I am glad here to draw the reader's attention to the fact that Russia was for more than two centuries under Mohammedan rule; and there are still other problems to be considered—that of the Moors in Spain, for instance. Here we have only to point out that Russia, like Spain, has had her history broken by a long interval of alien rule, while her conversion to Christian civilisation was about six or seven hundred years later than that of Spain. Now, it seems to me indisputable that one result of Christianity upon a nation is the gradual growth in liberty, and that the Christian nations have brought constitutional and democratic government into the world. The process, like all processes, is gradual, but it is very sure; and when a Church so far forgets its religion as to support the principle of autocracy, it is overturned by the very nation which had learnt from it the infinite value of the humblest human being. Therefore I am not surprised that Russia, which is abreast of us in so many things, is still behind in this principle of democratic freedom. What wonder that cruelties and oppressions are still practised in Russia which were taken for granted in the England of Henry VIII.?

The Dawn of Day

But England, under the heel of that autocrat three centuries and a half ago, was on the eve of a great outburst of liberty. I believe the same is true of Russia to-day. Our revolutionary Russian friends are sometimes pessimistic, but Slavs are naturally pessimistic. When we look back upon the history of Russia since Napoleon retreated from Moscow, we cannot be blind to the fact of a great and wonderful change. Russia has indeed moved far more rapidly even than the West, because she had more leeway to make up. She has not yet attained to free Parliamentary Government; but neither had England under the military dictatorship of Cromwell—which yet we look back upon as a stage in the march of freedom. Russia is still in the bitter pangs of a new birth, but they are birth-pangs, and not the pains of death. The Duma has been crippled, but it exists; and as I write it has just condemned the Government by a large majority for illegally prolonging the exceptional laws of repression. The English Parliament has also been crippled more than once; but it went on, as the Duma will go on. And in spite of those Russian friends who believe that the entente with England has strengthened the bureaucracy, I am convinced that in the end the British friendship will prove a strong force in aid of Russian freedom.

IN PHÆACIA

HAD I that haze of streaming blue,
That sea below, the summer faced,
I'd work and weave a dress for you,
And kneel to clasp it round your waist,
'And broider with those burning bright
Threads of the Sun across the sea,
'And bind it with the silver light
That wavers in the olive tree.

Had I the gold that like a river
Pours through our garden, eve by eve,
Our garden that goes on for ever,
Out of the world, as we believe;—
Had I that glory on the vine,
That splendour soft on tower and town,
I would be forging that sunshine,
'And you should wear a golden crown.

Through the great pinewood I have been,
An hour before the lustre dies,
Nor such a colour have yet seen
As the forest in your eyes,
The misty forest down whose deep
'And twilight paths I love to stroll,
To meadows quieter than sleep,
'And pools more secret than the soul.

Could I but steal that awful throne,
'Ablaze with dreams and songs and stars,
Where sits night, a man of stone,
On the frozen mountain spars,
I'd break his arms, for he is old,
'And set my lady there to rule,
Gowned with silver, crowned with gold,
'And in her eyes the woodland pool.

JAMES ELROY FLECKER.

THE CURSE OF USURY.

SHALL WE ABOLISH THE PAWNBROKER?

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

PART II.

To find the true method of deliverance from the pawnbroker, we must initiate a system that, while it frees the poor from his excessive charges and appalling rates of interest, yet retains that elasticity and ubiquity which marks his method of conducting business. For such a system we must look, not to Paris and the Monte de Piété, but to America, where the Provident Loan Societies have achieved an astounding, though little known success.

The Monte de Piété has justified itself only because of its monopoly. In France, the pawnbroker is not suffered to exist. Here, his name is legion. Suppose we adopt the suggestion, now strongly urged by certain social reformers, and vest his privileges in the State;

We Abolish at One Stroke some 20,000 Flourishing Tradesmen

Their business would be gone. Their stock and goodwill rendered valueless. Their capital become a debt they could never repay. Their individual experience of men and things, touching their business, rendered useless. Inevitably they would have to be compensated. Almost inevitably the details would be adjusted generously and in their favour. The first effect of the proposed reform would be to pay untold millions to buy out men who are battering on the poor.

Even so, I may be told, it might prove profitable. It is claimed that the fortunes made by pawnbrokers are so stupendous that, after compensation has been awarded, the State could still "make good" on the proposition. But this is doubtful. First of all, if the pawnbroker reaps a rich harvest from the poor, he does so only by charging excessive interest, which under the new plan is impossible. We should have, in fact, to buy "Uncle" out on one schedule of profits, and then conduct the business according to another and a much lower schedule.

That Way Disaster Lies

Then, again, pawnbroking depends enormously on the individual knowledge of customers—their positions in life, their prospects, and plans. Hence it is almost an heredity business passing from father to son, who can discern almost instinctively the value both of the goods pawned and of the customer's promise to redeem them.

But if the State "went buzzing into this new business" it would find these things out only at the cost of bitter experience!

"Ah, but," it may be said, "the State need not abolish the monopoly. All that is necessary is for some of the more progressive municipalities to undertake the business in competition with existing agencies. If they succeed, the rest will follow."

But is that possible? The rates that the pawnbroker is allowed to charge have been fixed by Parliament, and even Parliament will be slow to give a municipality powers to render its own enactments waste paper. Having given pawnbrokers a monopoly of their business at certain fixed rates, it could not abolish that monopoly and sanction lower rates without stultifying itself.

For these reasons, so it seems to me,

We must Abandon the Idea of Municipal Pawnbroking

The provident loan societies of the United States rose, like the present agitation, directly out of the feeling against the exactions of the pawnbroker, but in their scheme the reformers relied not upon the State so much as on the efforts of private individuals, who, given sound management, were prepared to risk their money in order to defeat an evil that had become notorious. The original title of the pioneer society was that of the "Pawners' Bank" of Boston, a name changed afterwards to the Collateral Loan Company. The government was in the hands of seven directors, five chosen by the stockholders, one appointed by the Governor of the Commonwealth, and one by the Mayor of the city. The capital was provided by public-spirited citizens, eager to redeem the poor from the usurers battenng on them. They subscribed some £70,000, which they agreed to lend "on all goods and chattels . . . discriminating in favour of small loans to the indigent," at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month. The society, in fact, carried on the business of pawnbroking on strictly business lines, but contenting itself with a moderate profit. Its success was soon apparent: first, in a considerable reduction in the rates of interest charged by the pawnbrokers of the city, and, later on, by a host of imitators, until finally

The System of which it was the Exemplar spread through every State of the Union, exercising a most salutary check on the exactions of the pawnbroker. In nearly every case these provident loan societies have proved successful. The rate of interest charged is often, as in the case of the Working Men's Loan Association of Boston, as low as 1 per cent. per month, and the dividend, in the case of the Collateral Loan Company, was not to exceed 8 per cent., the surplus going to the benefit of the poor. In some instances these provident loan societies were started without expectation of any dividend at all, as in the case of the New York Loan Company, who, nevertheless, paid a 6 per cent. dividend on capital and carried 4,309.94 dollars to reserve, although "several of the pawnbrokers found it necessary to reduce their rates of interest." Later, many of these societies, notably that of Buffalo, commenced to lend money on bills of sale on furniture, charging, instead of 10 and 15 per cent. per month, only 5, and still managing to pay a handsome dividend. Did space permit, I could give interesting figures of the work of these provident loan societies in Baltimore, Worcester, Providence, R.I., Chicago, and other cities. At Boston the Working Men's Loan Association paid a dividend of 2 per cent., followed by one of 4, and since then 6 per cent. dividends have been Constantly Paid and a Regular Surplus Secured, while the average loan has decreased considerably. In a word, these societies have proved conclusively that it is quite possible to conduct pawnbroking on commercial lines without charging excessive interest.

Here, it seems to me, is our road to deliverance. Why should we not repeat in England the experiment which has been so strikingly successful on the "other side"? If we wait for the State we may grow old before action is taken. But it should be easily possible to organise and capitalise such a society as I have described, to obtain for it the most influential support and thoroughly capable management without any undue delay. It could be started at once—on a small scale, if need be, and could expand as it achieved success. It could keep clearly in view the needs of the poor, adjusting itself to existing conditions, and, with the experience gained, entering on fresh fields of activity. Doubtless its beginnings would be diminutive, but we are told to Despise not the day of small things. Planned aright, and conducted in the true spirit, it could achieve for the poor of our great cities benefits as great as Father Raifessen won by his credit banks for the peasants of Austria. There are plenty of men and women who would lend their names, their money, and their services to such an effort. Who will initiate it?

THE BACK ROAD

THE gravel crunched, and a boy, moving slowly along, passed the janitor's house, and stood for the first time in the Back Road. His eyes grew moist, and he sniffled softly to himself as he strove to hold back the eager tears. He felt somehow the charm of the green hills and the tall trees, and, so comforted, he wandered on between the leafy giants.

That night in the dormitory he overheard a conversation of absorbing interest—three boys discussing the deeds actual and potential of the captain. The voices sank to thin sibilants, growing thinner and fainter in the new boy's ears as he floated away into the land of dreams. The captain was there, but changed. He raced express trains, he sprang backwards across the river, he felled the rector with his right, the janitor with his left, and, not so improbable, he butted Farmer Heeltap's bull to the scathe of the latter.

The end of school life had come, and the boy's last day wore to evening. The roar of the river rose louder with the falling shadows, and a huge orange moon swung slowly up from the Saline Hills. The boy and the girl were seated beneath the kindly tree that bore their initials cunningly entwined. She was silent, his own lips were sealed; but he drew closer to her, and drew her closer to himself. Her eyes flashed softly in the golden moonlight, a shining mist whirled around him, and in that enchanted haze he kissed her with the ineffable tenderness and self-forgetfulness of youth.

October, with a shrill wind driving a thin rain before it. The gravel crunched, and a man bronzed and bearded passed the janitor's house, and stood in the Back Road. He turned mechanically to the left, and stopped before a mighty tree. High up he saw what had once been a cunning device of interwoven letters, but the swelling bark had writhed and sundered them.

He fumbled with his stick and moved uneasily with his feet, and his mouth twitched at the corners. A vociferous band of schoolboys strolling past fell silent for a moment to gaze curiously at the stranger. The stranger glanced at them in his turn, murmured a few half-audible words, and turned away. One of the boys declared he had heard something about "all gone," and "familiar faces," but the others laughed, and told him to shut up.

And the stranger walked dully onward, the black current of his thought running through dead rainbow hopes. And before and behind stretched the black ribbon of the road between gay ridges of withered leaves.

D. H. L.

A COUNTRYMAN IN LONDON

THE LIFE OF A BRICKLAYER'S LABOURER * * BY THOMAS HOLMES

A Working Man's Budget

"YES, I am sometimes sick of it, for, after all, I do not live, I only exist." "But," I said, "you are healthy and young, you have a bright face, a clear skin, and you appear—to be the embodiment of muscular strength. You have regular work, a decent home, a good wife, and your four children look particularly happy."

"Yes," he said, "I have very good health; for three years I have not lost a day, excepting the usual holidays. I would not have lost those days if I were not compelled, for I am not paid when I do not work." He was silent for a time whilst both of us thoughtfully smoked our cigars, and then: "Yes, I have a good wife—no working man has a better—and our children are healthy; they have got healthy appetites, too. But I ought not to complain about my life, for I would not like to change places with her, for how she manages to keep things straight I cannot imagine. I know that I am hard pressed every week-end, for on Friday night, when I return home from work, I find myself possessed of just four pennies to pay the rail fare to my work the next day. I never have more, and I cannot do with less, for though I live in Tottenham, my work lies all over the shop. I never ask them for a sub. What's the use? I should have to pay it back, so every Saturday I take my wages home, and we divide it. I give my wife 25s., and keep 5s for myself. What do I do with it? Well, it is easy to spend 5s. in a week. First, there's 2s. for my rail fare, 9d. for the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows and 3d. for the Labourers' Union, 6d. for tobacco, and that is the only luxury I allow myself. With the remainder I buy my own clothes and boots, for though only a labourer I must have good boots to keep my feet dry, and I must be decently clad, and, mind you, there is a great deal of wear and tear upon the clothing of a bricklayer's labourer, so, come what will, I must save at least one shilling every week for clothing; if I did not, I soon should get down at heel and ragged, and no employer likes to see his men in that condition.

"If there is a workman's collection because a mate is ill or has lost his wife, and I give threepence, half my tobacco is gone; if I give sixpence, why, then I am a total abstainer from tobacco for the whole week. I cannot do a kind action or give away a copper without being penalised, and it is this that makes the life of an honest working man so difficult and maddening; he can never feel that he has a single penny that he can spend without fear.

"See how I am often placed. I start from home at five o'clock every morning, taking with me breakfast and dinner that my wife has prepared. I get my breakfast at half-past eight, and I am ready for it, I tell you; my dinner at half-past twelve, and there's nothing left, you can guess. Sometimes I am delayed at work, and do not get home till 8.30 for supper and bed.

"Please remember that I am a big man, that I have been hard at work in the open air, and also that between 12.30 midday and 8.30 at night I am never able to treat myself to a cup of coffee and a bite of bread and cheese.

Twenty Years without a Holiday

"Of course, I often feel hungry, but I must not yield; if I did, things would soon go wrong, so I have to deny myself, and run my life to a settled order, always having before me the fear of being out of work or of illness. It is a pretty tight fit, is my life. Why, I have never had one day's holiday on my own since I have been in London, and that is twenty years; neither do I expect one for another fifteen years. Perhaps when the children are grown up I may get one."

"Well, now, let us talk about your wife's house-keeping. How does she spend her 25s. weekly?"

"My wife is as careful as I am, and a great deal better manager; but we have confidence in each other, and we know, both of us, how the money goes. She is not a Londoner; she came from a little place near Cambridge. I was born in the Isle of Ely. We never buy anything on credit; we never trouble the pawnbroker; we never pay into any coal, boot, drapery, or any other money club; we prefer to manage our own affairs and spend our own money."

"Well, all those things are what you don't do. Tell me what you really do." "It won't take me long to do that. First, we have a little house to ourselves, and that takes 8s. out of the 25s., for we cannot live in a piggery. Bread costs us 5s., meat of all kinds another 5s.; that leaves 7s. for every other purpose, including coals, boots, clothing, household necessaries. I can't tell you how my wife manages to get boots for the children; but I know that every night I have a mending job on, for my eldest boy is eleven, and fancies himself at football. But I know this, that every morning there is a meat pie ready for my dinner, and some cold meat and a bottle of tea for my breakfast. Bacon we dare not think of buying; it is too dear.

"We never buy fresh milk but once a week—on Sundays, when we have a rice pudding for the children. We have two tins of condensed skimmed milk every week. Fancy country people buying condensed milk! We pay fourpence—that is, a penny each—for the children's life assurance. When we are wanting new towels or other useful articles, we have to buy them one at a time when we have saved money for them. My wife has at last bought a new hearthrug. I cannot say how long she has been saving up for it, but, at any rate, it is paid for."

"But," I said, "you sometimes work overtime, for which you are paid extra." "Very true," he said; "but sometimes I have to lose odd hours because of the rain. I am paid 6½d. per hour, and time and a quarter for overtime. I calculate that my overtime just about makes up for my loss of time; and that is how I calculate my wages at 30s. weekly. But my overtime does not make up for the time that I lose at the regular holidays."

Why Men Leave the Country

"Why ever did you leave the country?" was my next question.

"What else could I do? I was a big, strong chap. I saw my father working for 12s. a week, and some married men were not earning that much. My father's house was not big enough or good enough, so when I was about nineteen I went to York to work as a labourer on the main sewer which was being made. I got 5½d. per hour. I shall never forget receiving my first week's wages, for I received my first golden sovereign, with some odd silver beside. I thought that I was a made man. When that job was finished I went with the contractor to other jobs in different towns, till at length I got to London, and then I left navvying and became a builder's labourer, for I was tired of a roving life. I always manage to keep my work with a firm so long as they have got anything to do, so I have been fortunate in that respect."

"But you have been out of work sometimes?"

"That I have, and well I know it, for I got up at three every morning, and set out on a heart-breaking search. It was not so bad when I was single, for I had saved some money; but it is a different matter when you have a wife and family and no reserve fund. I can tell you that I never want to undergo the experience again. Yet the fear of it is always with me, and I cannot get it out of my mind; perhaps I should be the happier if I could. I have walked and walked till I was sometimes dead beat, although I am good value for any employer's money. What a good many fellows do who are often out of work I cannot imagine. I am sure that I should go mad or do something desperate." Then he added, "I would like to be the Duke of Westminster just for one month," and for the first time during our interview he laughed.

"Would you like to go back to the country?" I asked him.

He replied, "I would. But if I did I should have to come back to London. I could not be content with the wages. There would be no decent home for us to live in; there would be no openings for my children. No, I must not go back unless things are greatly altered."

One other thing I ascertained from him, though he looked a bit angry when I asked him. I felt there was some pride in his voice when he said, "No, sir, my wife does not go out to work or take in any either; she has enough to do looking after the children, the home, and myself. I want her life to be easier, not harder."

ROLLING DOWN TO RIO *

"THE SEA AND THE JUNGLE" is a vivid and, we are extremely willing to believe, veracious account of a voyage to Brazil and up the Amazon. The author names no names, except that of the ship in which he sailed, the Capella, and that is no doubt a nom de guerre, and he has not much to say of the purpose of the voyage, at least as far as the principals, from a navigating point of view, are concerned. His own object in making the voyage he makes abundantly clear; he wants to get away from London, the Poor Law, the "8.35" from Suburbia to town—"it is always the 8.35"—and from the daily papers with their everlasting cries of "wolf," prophecies of instant ruin or revolution, and announcements that "the young prince did stop to look in at a toy-shop window in Regent Street the previous afternoon." Such meditations, indulged in during his daily progress in the "8.35," nearly drive him to arrest that progress by the employment of the communication cord.

He seizes, then, the opportunity offered him by a sea-faring friend, master, not of the Don or the Magdalena, but of the Capella, of the same tramp fraternity, and embarks on his adventurous journey. The voyage is not strictly one of exploration, but its course leads the Capella where no ocean-going ship has ever been before, and an incidental expedition takes the author through what was probably an absolutely unknown region.

Mr. Tomlinson's attitude towards the sea may almost be called amatory. He recurs more than once to its seductions and its disillusionments. He tells the story of a small boy, who, on first being taken down to the beach of a well-known watering-place, inquired of his father, "And where is the sea?" He himself speaks of the ocean as "It, the nameless thing, new-born with each dawn, but as old as the night," and concludes that it is "at its best at London, near midnight, when you are within the arms of a capacious chair, before a glowing fire, selecting phases of the voyage you will never make." Nevertheless, when a moment of kindness comes to compensate for days of coldness or cruelty, Mr. Tomlinson is ready with his praises. There is a passage we long to quote, of a time when "the gates of glory were somewhere ajar," but it is too long. There is a passage about an enormous wave that broke right on the top of the vessel. But they should be read. We have not yet said it, but we believe that this is one of the very best sea-books that ever was written. It is also one of the best "Inland Voyages." The phrase suggests Stevenson, but we think he would have been suggested, anyhow; there is the same dramatic feeling before the manifestations of tropical nature. Mr. Tomlinson tells us admirably what he saw and what he felt; we are almost equally grateful for his abstentions. When on the brink of attempting to anticipate questions about Brazilian national character, he says: "The wise and ribald part of me woke. . . . I stopped. For what do I know of the Brazilian character? Very little. Is there such a thing?" He is a little tempted to reduce it to the standard of a customs officer, who looked noble and picturesque, but appropriated the author's field-glasses to his own private uses. Failing the Brazilian men and women, Mr. Tomlinson describes the Brazilian forest and its denizens as they have never been described before. And the Amazon!—"a broad river flowing smooth and bright out of indefinite distance between dark forests to the wooded islands below; and by the islands suddenly accelerated and divided, in a slight descent, pouring to a lower level in taut floods as smooth, noiseless, and polished as mercury." Very lovingly does Mr. Tomlinson dwell on the animals he encountered—the insects, birds, and fishes—the semi-domestic or captive creatures that were within observation on board the Capella. The cockatoo that behaved "like a disrupted and angry rainbow" and the rebellious heifer that reflected his own ideas on society amused him most. The insects of an aggressive or ignoble kind must have loomed as large on the mind of the navigators as they did on that of the invaders of Russia in 1812.

* "The Sea and the Jungle." By H. M. Tomlinson. 7s. 6d. net. (Duckworth and Co.)

The accounts of various incidents and episodes, some of a historical nature, such as the attempt to bridge South America by a railway connecting Bolivia with the Amazon basin, are of peculiar interest. There are some good stories, too, told by chance acquaintances. We should imagine that Mr. Tomlinson is talking sound psychology when he says that the settlers in the lost and deadly regions of the Amazon regard laughter as "their only prophylactic." The author himself believes in laughter, but on less desperate grounds; his humour is delightful and continual. "Some men will touch their crowns to Carnegie in heaven." Mr. Tomlinson's views are as decided and violent as his humour is cheerful. He anathematizes self-restraint, and pleads, or rather shouts, for "more rollicking self-indulgence and a ruddy and bright-eyed insistence on the means to it." A man "who valued being alive more than his chance of old age"—that should make a fine epitaph—it will be Mr. Tomlinson's, by right of authorship, at any rate.

W. B. YEATS: A CHARACTER SKETCH

By J. M. HONE

MR. YEATS, the Irish propagandist, and Mr. Yeats, the Irish poet, are the same personage; but in the one capacity, that of propagandist, Mr. Yeats is chiefly famous in Ireland; in the other, that of poet, he is chiefly famous in Great Britain and abroad. The most remarkable thing one can say about Mr. Yeats is that he is, at the same time, a man of action and the most purely poetical of poets; which perhaps explains why Mr. Yeats, the most authentic voice in the English language to-day, has not displaced Tom Moore in the popular affections of Ireland. Poets to-day want to pronounce on current controversies, to deliver messages in verse on the affairs of their "day and generation," rather than on the affairs of all time. But few poets—few modern poets—have been men of action. Now, Mr. Yeats, on the other hand, has never composed propagandist poetry. He can point to a fine record of patriotic Irish work, and yet he can assert that he never wrote a line of deliberately patriotic verse. No one ever thought more deeply of, and for, literature, or was so jealous of its purity. Therefore no author of our time has so strictly avoided the platform and the pulpit tone. He quotes St. Thomas à Kempis: "The Holy Spirit has delivered me from a multitude of opinions." "Art," he says, "has no purpose but the praise of life." Life is more important than the cause. Addressing his dead companions, the poets of the 'nineties, he cries out:—

"I have kept my faith, though faith was tried,
To that rock-born, rock-wandering foot,
And the world's altered since you died,
And I am in no good repute.
With the loud host before the sea,
That think sword strokes were better meant
Than lovers' music—let that be,
So that the wandering foot's content."

I.

Of the little band of devoted poets who met round the "Cheshire Cheese" during the closing years of the last century, W. B. Yeats is now almost the sole survivor. Davidson committed suicide. Dowson died of consumption at the age of thirty. Lionel Johnson had a tragical and mysterious end. The minor figures perished as miserably. "'Twas wine, or woman, or some curse," says Mr. Yeats in reminiscent mood. But he remembers that his old companions

"Never made a poorer song
That they might have a heavier purse."

Luckier than the rest, Mr. Yeats was an Irishman, and could seek his dissipation in politics. And when the worst is said of patriotism, it will be allowed that it need have no ill-effects upon the health. Mr. Yeats is now a middle-aged man who has published a Collected Edition and established an Irish national theatre, an Irishman who dares to say what he thinks and encounter public disfavour: he may yet be Professor of English Literature at Trinity College, Dublin.

II.

Mr. Yeats was born in Ireland, and is, by extraction, a member of the "Protestant garrison," like Shaw and Wilde and Synge. But his appearance suggests to those who believe in race that there must be in his composition a Celtic, if not a pre-Aryan strain. When one learns that he is addicted to astrology, the suspicion is strengthened. His black eyes, raven hair, and look of an artist pur sang do not constitute a typical Irish type; but Mr. Yeats may say with a fellow-countryman, Lord Morris, that no one, drunk or sober, ever took him for an Englishman. George Moore, in his amusing book of Irish reminiscences, "Ave," tells of how an old French gentleman, probably a student of Gobineau, on hearing that Mr. Yeats practised magic, had the old problem of the poet revealed to him in a flash. "A Finnish ancestor," he muttered; "some Finnish ancestor a thousand years ago!" Yeats was brought up in Sligo, that is to say, in the heart of Irish Ireland, and the tender and spiritual quality of his earlier work, his preoccupation with Irish legend, and his delight in the folk imagination were derived from this experience. When he went to London as a young man he fell in with Henley, who soon afterwards declared that there were only two living poets, and that the "other" was Yeats. The "Wanderings of Oisín" and the "Ballads and Poems" contain the most beautiful of modern lyrics. Mr. Yeats's next books, the "Secret Rose" and the "Wind Among the Reeds," were written in a more elaborate style. One forgave, for the sake of a haunting music, a tendency to court the cryptic; but Mr. Yeats was now in danger of being imprisoned within a system that he had built for himself, partly out of Blake's prophetic writings and partly out of the theories of the symbolists. About this time certain persons in Ireland pressed Mr. Yeats into the service of the Irish dramatic movement, and henceforward he used most of his energies in writing the plays and in establishing the policy of a national theatre in Dublin.

III.

It was thus that Mr. Yeats became a figure in the national life of Ireland, one of the ablest and most pugnacious of Irish controversialists (which is saying a great deal) and the most eloquent of Irish orators. In his early life he had been associated with the extreme wing of the Nationalist party. Now he came into collision with this party. He had not renounced the political opinions of his youth. But the party which claimed him as a member wished that the Irish theatre should be the instrument of their propaganda. Mr. Yeats refused, and pleaded the liberty of art. He was criticised by all sides of Irish opinion. Some people wanted the theatre to attack the English; some people wanted it to attack the priests; others wished to be sure that it would not seem to do either the one or the other! The quarrel came to a head with the appearance of a new dramatist in Dublin, J. M. Synge, whose comedies of Irish life provoked an organised hostility among the Nationalists which only Mr. Yeats's strength of character and courage could encounter. It is as an educator as well as a poet that Mr. Yeats should be remembered by Irish posterity. Synge's plays were held to be inexpedient; it was said they would damage the Irish cause. The outcry against them was typical of the false standards of value in criticism that then obtained in Ireland. Mr. Yeats taught that the first of virtues was sincerity, and that the man who could be bullied into patriotism by his neighbours was worthless to his nation.

IV.

Devoted readers of Mr. Yeats's books have cursed the day when he was persuaded to undertake theatre business in Ireland. It seems to them a sacrilege that so rare a being as a poet should spend his time at propaganda. Others add that Mr. Yeats's genius is essentially lyrical, and that his plays are better suited to the study than to the footlights. Mr. Yeats has himself indicted a temperament which spurs to action:—

"All things can tempt me from the craft of verse:
One time it was a woman's face, or worse,
The seeming woes of my fool-driven land;
Now nothing but comes readier to the hand
Than this accustomed toil."

The delicate and sensitive quality of Mr. Yeats's style, the ethereal substance of his earlier and best-known verse, belie the man whose career shows, at all events, how false is the vulgar modern idea that poets, outside of their trade, are foolish and incapable folk. It is only as the critic of his own writings that Mr. Yeats becomes the prey of doubt and loses his power of swift decision. At the age of thirty-five he is said to have declared that he could happily spend the remainder of his life rewriting and revising. Some of his plays will be found in half a dozen versions. He has an itch for reconstruction and experiment, and this, not less than the demands made upon his time by the Irish dramatic movement, gives cause for discontent to his admirers, so long must they await the new poem or the new play.

* * *

LITERARY NOTES

Lovers of Mark Rutherford will look forward with keen anticipation to a study of the great writer by Sir William Robertson Nicoll. Sir William is an authority on Mark Rutherford. One could think of no one whose knowledge of the subject is more thorough or whose sympathy with it is more intimate and penetrative than the editor of the British Weekly. The best things ever written on Mark Rutherford appeared in that journal, some of them over the well-known signature of "Claudius Clear," and a book by the writer of these acute and profound pieces of literary criticism is worth waiting for.

* * * * *

Messrs. Maunsel and Co., the Irish publishers, to whom lovers of true poetry owe so much, have in preparation an important biographical work, "A Dictionary of Irish Artists," by Walter G. Strickland, of the National Gallery of Ireland. The dictionary will include not only notices of every Irish painter, sculptor, and engraver of any note who has worked in Ireland, but of all artists of Irish birth whose work has been done in England and elsewhere. It will be in two volumes, limited to one thousand sets, and may be expected on September 1st. Numerous portraits of artists will illustrate the text.

* * * * *

Ethel Carnie, the factory-girl poetess, has once more left the mill to devote herself to literature. Born of cotton-weaving parents in the Blackburn district, she was connected with factory life from the beginning, and her first-hand acquaintance with the actual routine of a mill-girl's existence ought to lend considerable interest to a serial story of mill life which she is contributing to the Christian Commonwealth. Her most notable achievement so far has been her volume of poems, "Songs of a Factory Girl." Miss Carnie wrote verse from early childhood. Starting her mill life at the age of eleven as a half-timer, she passed through the successive stages of "reacher," "winder," and "warper," and beguiled the hated working hours by expressing her thoughts rhythmically.

Of her book of poems, published before she was twenty-one, 500 copies sold within a month, and soon she left the mill to become associated with the now defunct Woman Worker (which had then just passed into the hands of the editor of the Clarion), the Tribune, and other papers. On the death of the Woman Worker, however, she returned to the mill, and worked at her old occupation until eighteen months ago. All who know her modest, sincere, and in the truest sense cultured rhymes will follow her future career with considerable interest.

* * * * *

It is rumoured that Mr. G. K. Chesterton is considering the possibility of dramatising one of his most successful stories in the Father Brown series. The result should be intensely interesting. G. K.'s epigrammatic style would lend itself to dramatic dialogue with considerable effect, and his sense of humour would permeate the plot. Whether or no his situations would be feasible or possible is not so conclusive. One point at least would not be in his favour. He has never yet succeeded in creating a woman in any of his stories. The nearest likeness to the reality was the acidulated lady in "Man Alive," but it is characteristic of him that he never, if it can possibly be avoided, introduces a female character at all.

* * *

"EVERYMAN" TOURS.

ARRANGEMENTS have now been completed for a week's holiday in Paris, where our readers will have an opportunity of realising for themselves the attractions of the city so graphically described by the Editor in his recent articles. The worry and fret of travelling, the catching of trains, the looking for rooms, the inevitable disappointments connected with hotel accommodation are annoyances that, though small in themselves, are liable to destroy all comfort and enjoyment. These petty details are spared to those who join EVERYMAN Tours. The fundamental principle of the system is that the traveller should journey with the greatest possible comfort and the minimum of worry. Congenial companionship on the drives and excursions in connection with the Paris week are ensured by the fact that the members of the touring party will find a common bond of interest in their paper. The list will shortly be complete, and in order to secure a vacancy application should be made at once to the Tours Department, EVERYMAN, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE TEN MOST POPULAR ARTICLES IN "EVERYMAN"

WE propose opening a Referendum upon the ten most popular articles which have appeared in the first twenty-six numbers of EVERYMAN. Readers are invited to send in a list of the ten articles which have been of the greatest interest to them, placing them in what they regard as their order of merit, and we offer two prizes of £2 and £1 respectively for the two lists corresponding most closely to the ten articles receiving the largest number of votes from our readers. Lists, marked "EVERYMAN Referendum," should reach the Competition Editor, 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh, by July 1st.

Vol. I. of EVERYMAN, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d., carriage paid 4s., will be forwarded on application to the EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C. Cases for binding can also be obtained at 1s. 6d. each, post free 1s. 3d.

LETTERS TO LIVING AUTHORS

II.—TO WILLIAM WYMARK JACOBS * * BY LEWIS MELVILLE

SIR,—During the sixteen years you were in the Civil Service you were, no doubt, a credit to your department and of considerable value to your country. Yet, in the last year of the past century, you were so wise as to retire, having, I assume, come to the conclusion, probably after a hard struggle with your modesty, that, while it was within the bounds of possibility there might be another who could adequately discharge your official duties, there was certainly no one else who could write the stories that had even then already made you famous. No one will deny that the conclusion at which you arrived was correct, and every-one to-day is grateful that, having arrived at that conclusion, you acted upon it. The gifts the gods bestowed upon you were not intended for decent burial in a Government office.

